This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

PREFACE.

In the fifty-first volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest contains a summary of the cases published from the 2nd of November, 1902, to the 29th of August, 1903 (both inclusive), in the WEEKLY REPORTER and from the beginning of September, 1902, to the end of August, 1903, in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports.

Privy Council.

(From the Royal Court of the Island of Jersey.)

May 14, 1902.

SPURRIER AND ANOTHER v. LA CLOCHE. (a.)

Insurance—Fire insurance—Arbitration—English contract—Conditions—Law of Jersey.

A fire policy was issued by an English company in favour of a Jersey gentleman upon property in Jersey. It was in English, and executed in Jersey by the agents of the insurance company. Among the conditions indorsed on the policy it was provided that no action should be brought for any money payable under the policy until the liability and the amount had been fixed by arbitration, and also that the submission to arbitrators should be subject to the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and might be made a rule of the High Court of Justice.

Held, that this was an English contract, and ought to be governed by English law; that, consequently, no action could be sustained in Jersey or in this country for any money payable under the policy unless and until the amount so payable had been settled by arbitration pursuant to the conditions.

Appeal against judgments of the Royal Court of Jersey.

The appellants were agents in Jersey of the Sun Fire Office.

The respondent effected in the island of Jersey with the appellants a policy of assurance against fire on certain postage stamps for the sum of £1,000 at the annual premium of £2 5s. and claimed on the policy.

The facts sufficiently appear in their lordships' judgment.

Cohen, K.C, and Wood Hill, for the appellants.

R. Storry Deans, for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir FORD NORTH) was delivered by Lord LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal in whether the Royal Court of Jersey has given due effect to an arbitration clause contained in a policy of assurance against loss by fire. The policy in question is dated the 4th of January, 1897. It is a fire policy for £1,000 issued by the Sun Fire Office in favour of a Jersey gentleman named La Cloche on a collection of foreign stamps. The policy is in the English language, but it was executed in Jersey by the agents of the company. By the terms of the policy the company agrees with the assured subject to the conditions indorsed to pay what may become due in case of loss out of its capital stock and funds. The witnessing part runs thus: "In witness whereof I for and on behalf of the said company have hereunto set my hand and seal this 4th day of January, 1897. Signed Spurrier and Le Cronier, agent to the Sun Fire Office. Signed and sealed at Jersey, where no stamps are in use, in the presence of Spurrier, Jersey," and then there was a seal.

The conditions indorsed are fourteen in number. They are in the English language. The twelfth condition, which is the only material one, is as follows:

"12. If any difference shall at any time arise between the company or the insured or any claimant under this policy as to the liability or the amount or extent of the liability of the company in respect of any claim for loss or damage by fire or as to any question, matter, or thing, concerning or arising out of any claim for loss or damage under this policy, every such difference as and when the same arises, shall be referred to the arbitration of some person to be appointed in writing by both parties, or two indifferent persons, one to be appointed in writing by the party claiming and the other by the company, within one calendar month after either party has been required so to do by the other party, and in case of disagreement between the arbitrators then to the decision of an umpire, who shall have been appointed in writing by the arbitrators before entering on the reference, and shall sit with the arbitrators, and preside at their meetings during the reference, unless the arbitrators shall otherwise agree in writing, and the death of any of the parties shall not revoke or affect the authority or powers of any arbitrator or umpire, and each party shall bear or pay his own costs of the reference and a moiety of the costs of the award, and in all other respects the submission to arbitrators shall be subject to the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, or any statutory modification thereof, and may be made a rule of her Majesty's High Court of Justice in any division, upon the application of either of the parties. And it is hereby expressly declared to be a condition precedent to the liability of the company in respect of any claim under this policy that the claim shall, if not admitted, be referred to and determined by such arbitrator, arbitrators, or umpire as aforesaid, and the claimant shall have no right of action against the company except for the amount of the claim if admitted, or the amount, if any, awarded by the award of such arbitrator, arbitrators, or umpire."

The first question which arises is whether this is to be regarded as an English contract or as a Jersey contract. Their lordships are of opinion that although this policy was made in Jersey and any money payable under it would have to be paid to the assured in Jersey, the nature of the transaction, the language in which the policy is expressed, and the terms of the agreement and of the conditions all show that the contract between the parties is an English contract, and that wherever sued upon its interpretation and effect ought, as a matter of law, to be governed by English and not by Jersey law. The intention of the parties is too plain to be mistaken; the contract to pay out of the funds of the company is of itself very significant; and the reference to the English Arbitration Acts shows that the arbitration proceedings were to be conducted according to English law and no other. That the intention of the parties to a contract is the true criterion by which to determine by what law it is to be governed is too clear for controversy (see Hamlyn & Co. v. Talisker Distillery Co., 71 L. T. Rep. 1, [1894] A. C. 202), and the intention here is unmistakable. It does not follow that the agents who signed the policy in Jersey were not liable to be sued in Jersey upon it; as their principals were in this country. But whatever would be a defence by the law of England for the company on the merits to an action against the company on the policy would be a defence for the agents if sued in Jersey for the nonpayment of money payable under the policy by the company. It follows from these observations that no action could be sustained in Jersey any more than in this country for any money payable under the policy unless and until the amount so payable had been settled by arbitration pursuant to the 12th condition: see Scott v. Avery, 4 W. R. 746, 5 H. L. Cas. 811; and Caledonian Insurance Co. v. Gilmour, [1893] A. C. 85, 41 W. R. Dig. 6. The contract is one on which no cause of action could accrue until the amount to be paid had been determined by arbitration, and by arbitration as provided by the contract. Mr. Deans contended that the arbitration clause was invalid by the law of Jersey because not only the amount payable, but also the liability to pay was to be decided by arbitration; and that this was an illegal attempt to oust the jurisdiction of the court, and went further than Scott v. Avery. But if a contract is so framed as to give no cause of action unless a certain condition is performed no question arises as to ousting the jurisdiction of any court. It was by not observing the difference between no cause of action and a defence which assumes a cause of action, but is based on the incompetence of a particular court to enforce it that the Court of Exchequer went wrong in Scott v. Avery. The oversight was pointed out and corrected in the Exchequer Chamber, 1 W. R. 457, 8 Exch. 487, and again in the House of Lords. Maule, J., put the matter in the true light in the Exchequer chamber; he then said: "There is no decision which prevents two persons from agreeing that a sum of money shall be payable on a contingency; but they cannot legally agree that where it is payable no action shall be maintained for it" (8 Exch., at p. 499). Mr. Deans cited no authority to show that by the law of Jersey such a condition as that which has to be considered in this case is invalid, and could be rejected even in a contract governed by the law of Jersey. Judging from the decision in the case of Southern v. Voisin (the 5th of July, 1892), it would seem that the law that is laid down in Scott v. Avery prevails in Jersey; and that the distinctions he drew between arbitrations in which liability is left to arbitrators, and those in which the amount payable only is so left, is immaterial where an award settling the amount is a condition precedent to the right to payment of anything. The foregoing observations really dispose of this appeal. What happened was as follows: In December, 1898, a fire occurred in the house of the assured, and his collection of stamps was damaged or destroyed. He gave notice of his loss and claimed £1,000. He appointed a Jersey gentleman (Guiton) his arbitrator. The Sun Fire Office appointed an English gentleman (Thwaites) their arbitrator The arbitrators could not agree upon an umpire. Thwaites wanted an English barrister. Guiton wanted some gentleman resident in Jersey, which would save expense. Neither can be blamed for not giving way to the other. No application was made under the English Acts to the courts of this country to appoint an umpire. The company could not proceed adversely to the assured, who was beyond the jurisdiction of the English courts, and the assured preferred to apply to the court in Jersey. Failure to agree upon an arbitrator brought the arbitration proceedings to a deadlock. On the 30th of September, 1899, the assured brought an action in the Royal Court in Jersey on the policy against the agents who signed it, and he claimed £1,000.

The defendants relied on the 12th condition and the absence of any award as a defence to the action. On the 9th of October, 1899, the Royal Court ordered that the arbitrator should be summoned to appear. Thwaites appeared by counsel and objected to the jurisdiction of the court over him. The court then ordered the defendants to appoint another arbitrator in his place. The defendants declined to do this, and the arbitrators were then dismissed from the action, which was remitted to the Greffier to assess the amount payable to the plaintiff. On the 6th of November, 1900, the plaintiff recovered judgment for £1,000, and on the 4th of December, 1900, the Appeal Court confirmed the preceding orders and judgment. The present appeal is from the judgment of the Appeal Court and from the orders and judgment thereby confirmed. On the merits of the case their lordships do not think it necessary to add anything to what has already been said. No reasons are given for the judgment appealed from, and their lordships cannot make any observations upon them. The judgment appears to them erroneous in principle. The order of the 6th of November, 1899, requiring the defendants to appoint another arbitrator in the place of Mr. Thwaites, appears to their lordships to be erroneous for two reasons—viz., (1) because Mr. Thwaites has done nothing to justify his removal, and (2) because, if he had, the court in Jersey was not the proper tribunal to remove him. The English Arbitration Act conferred no such power on any foreign court.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed and that the judgment of the Royal Court of Jersey of the 14th of December, 1900, and the orders and judgment thereby affirmed, ought to be reversed and that judgment ought to be given for the defendants with costs. The respondent having obtained leave to defend the appeal in formâ pauperis, no order can be made as to the costs of the appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) July 31, 1902.

RATCLIFF AND ANOTHER v. MENDELSSOHN. (a.)

Stock Exchange—Default of broker—Liquidation—Completion by jobber with broker's customers—Right of jobber to sue broker for differences.

A broker, who was a member of the London Stock Exchange, was declared a defaulter, there being then due from him to a jobber £986 in respect of the purchase and sale of shares. A further sum of £281 became due on the closing of the broker's accounts at the hammer prices. The broker's customer completed the transactions with the jobber on the next settling day and paid him the sums due, but by the rules of the Stock Exchange the jobber had to account for £281 of the amount so received to the official assignee of the Stock Exchange, who was carrying out the liquidation of the broker's estate. The jobber brought an action against the broker to recover the two sums of £986 and £281. At the date of the trial the liquidation was still proceeding, and the jobber had been paid a dividend.

Held, that the action was maintainable, and that the jobber could recover the amount claimed less the amount of the dividend received.

Judgment of Mathew, J. (50 W. R. 106, [1901] 2 K. B. 844), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., reported 50 W. R. 106, [1901] 2 K. B. 844.

The plaintiffs were jobbers on the London Stock Exchange. At the date of the mid-May settlement, on the 13th of May, 1901, there became due from the defendant, who was then a broker on the Stock Exchange, the sum of £986 for differences in respect of contracts for the sale and purchase of shares entered into by the defendant on behalf of customers with the plaintiffs. These contracts were carried over to the end of May settlement.

On the 16th of May the defendant was declared a defaulter on the Stock Exchange, and all his contracts then open were closed at the hammer prices in accordance with rule 177 of the Stock Exchange Rules and Regulations, the result being that a further sum of £281 was shown to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs. At the end of May settlement the defendant's customers either completed with the plaintiffs through other brokers or again carried over, and the plaintiffs received from such other brokers the sums due from the customers in respect of those transactions. By rule 155 of the Stock Exchange Rules and Regulations the plaintiffs would have to account to the official assignee for £281 of the amount received by them from the defendant's customers.

The plaintiffs claimed in the liquidation of the defendant's estate by the official assignee of the Stock Exchange and were paid a dividend of 2s. 6d. in the pound in respect of the two sums of £986 and £281, and there were other assets out of which a further dividend would be paid, but the amount thereof was doubtful.

The plaintiffs claimed in this action to recover £986 and £281.

The defence was, as to the whole claim, that the plaintiff's sole right was to prove in the Stock Exchange liquidation of the defendant's estate by the official assignee; and as to the claim for £281, that the plaintiffs had elected to complete the transactions with the defendant's customers, and had been paid or settled with by them.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-Law.

Mathew, J., held that the action was maintainable, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amounts claimed less the dividend received.

The defendant appealed.

Muir Mackenzie (J. R. Atkin with him), for the defendant. — The procedure under the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange (rules 150-180) operates as a complete cessio bonorum of the defaulter's estate: Richardson v. Stormont, Todd, & Co., 48 W. R. 451, [1900] 1 Q. B. 701. All the defendant's assets have been taken over by the official assignee, and he has been divested of them, and yet it is said that he can be sued for differences due from him, with the inevitable result that, as he cannot pay the debt, he will be made bankrupt, though it may turn out that he never really was insolvent. It is not necessary to contend that the liquidation proceedings on the Stock Exchange operate as a release of the defendant's indebtedness to the plaintiffs, it is sufficient to say that the right to sue is suspended until the liquidation is completed. The plaintiffs, having come in and claimed in the liquidation, cannot now sue: Whitmore v. Turquand, 9 W. R. 488, 3 De G. F. & J. 107. Differences due to a defaulter are not legally recoverable: Ex parte Grant, In re Plumbly, 28 W. R. 755, 13 Ch. D. 667. In Ex parte Ward, In re Ward, 30 W. R. 560, 20 Ch. D. 356, which is relied upon by the other side, the assets had been distributed and the Stock Exchange liquidation had come to an end, and the creditor was suing for the balance due to him. If, however, that case goes further and decides that a creditor who has claimed in the liquidation can sue before the liquidation is closed, it is inconsistent with the previous decision of the Court of Appeal in Whitmore v. Turquand—which was not cited in Ex parte Ward—and is wrong in principle, and ought not to be followed. The doctrine that the Stock Exchange liquidation is a complete cessio bonorum was not developed until Richardson v. Stormont, Todd, & Co., a decision much later than Ex parte Ward. Secondly, with regard to the claim for £281, the plaintiffs have elected to complete with the defendant's principals, and have been paid this sum. They are, therefore, in the same position as if there had been no default. The contract made by the defendant with the plaintiffs has been completed, and there is no longer any liability at law on that contract. There is no legal liability in respect of these differences (Ex parte Grant, In re Plumbly), and therefore the payment of the £281 by the plaintiffs to the official assignee cannot create a liability for the differences which does not exist at law.

He also referred to Ex parte Ward, In re Ward (No. 2), 31 W. R. 112, 22 Ch. D. 132.

Carrington (Rufus Isaacs, K.C., with him), for the plaintiffs.—The decision of this court in the first case of Ex parte Ward, In re Ward is conclusive in the plaintiffs' favour so far as regards the claim for £986. It was there decided that a creditor who has taken the benefit of the Stock Exchange distribution is not thereby precluded from suing for the debt. At that date it had been decided in Tomkins v. Saffery, 26 W. R. 62, 3 App. Cas. 213, that the Stock Exchange liquidation is a cessio bonorum. The judges in Ex parte Ward, In re Ward, with full knowledge of that decision, decided that the defaulting broker can be sued. With regard to the £281, the decision in Ex parte Ward, In re Ward (No. 2) covers that claim. That case shows that the plaintiffs are suing, not on the original contract, but on a contract arising out of the rules of the Stock Exchange. There has been no election to look to the defendants' customers only: Stoneham v. Wyman, 6 Com. Cas. 174.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., holding that the action is maintainable by the plaintiffs, who are members of the Stock Exchange, against the defendant, who is also a member of the Stock Exchange, to recover £986, the amount of differences on the purchase and sale of stocks and shares ascertained to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs on the 13th of May, the settling day, and £281, a sum ascertained to be due on the basis of the hammer prices of stocks and shares on the 16th of May, during the currency of the account, when the defendant was declared a defaulter. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for these two sums. First, with regard to the sum of £986, that is a sum ascertained to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs in the ordinary way on the settling day, and on that day it became a debt recoverable at common law. Has anything happened subsequently to cut down the right of the plaintiffs to sue for that debt? The only thing is that the defendant was declared a defaulter a few days afterwards and his assets are now in process of liquidation on the Stock Exchange by the official assignee. Unless that operates as a release of the debt, it seems to me to be no answer to the claim. The case is concluded by the authority of the earlier decision in Ex parte Ward, In re Ward, a decision upon almost identically the same facts as those in the present case. The head-note there (20 Ch. D. 356) states that "a creditor of a defaulter on the Stock Exchange who has taken the benefit of the private distribution of Stock Exchange assets, made by the official assignee of the Stock Exchange under its rules, is not precluded from afterwards taking ordinary legal proceedings for the recovery of his debt, though he must give credit for what he has received from the official assignee." That decision seems to me to be directly in point, and as it is a decision of this court it is binding on us. Therefore, with regard to the claim for £986 I agree with my brother Mathew that there is no defence to the action.

There remains the smaller sum of £281. Some complication is introduced by the fact that this sum represents the differences ascertained on the basis of the hammer prices on the 16th of December, during the currency of the account, before the time for the performance of the contract by the defendant's principals had arrived. The decision in Ex parte Ward, In re Ward (No. 2) shows that the differences so ascertained constitute a debt due from the defendant to the plaintiffs. That being so, the same principle applies as is applicable to the larger sum of £986. The head-note in Ex parte Ward, 22 Ch. D. 132, runs thus: "The amount of the differences due by a defaulter on the London Stock Exchange (as fixed by the official assignee of that body under its rules) to a Stock Exchange creditor, is a 'liquidated sum' within the meaning of section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and will support a bankruptcy petition by the creditor against the defaulter." In the course of the argument the reason why it is a debt was explained. Counsel for the debtor contended that the original contract between the debtor and the petitioners still subsisted, whereupon Jessel, M.R., asked: "How can there be two contracts?" and in the course of his judgment he said: "The purchaser in this case became a defaulter, and he must be treated like every other defaulter. It is really as if the rules of the Stock Exchange were imported into the contract. The provisions of the rule must be considered as inserted in the contract, and to that extent they alter the wording of the contract, so that we have the contract altered in this way—that the purchaser is to pay for the shares on the settling day, provided always that if he becomes a defaulter before then the amount due from him is to be ascertained in accordance with the rules of the Stock Exchange. If that is so, there appears to be no foundation for the argument that this rule is to be limited to ascertaining the amount to be claimed from the assignee of the Stock Exchange. The amount is ascertained for all Stock Exchange purposes—that is, for the purposes of the contract." The sum so ascertained is the sum due from the defendant to the plaintiffs, unless in this case again something has happened subsequently which amounts to a defence. The fact that the defendant's assets on the Stock Exchange are being administered is no defence according to the decision in the first case of Ex parte Ward. The liquidation on the Stock Exchange is no suspension of the right to sue, and the fact that when the ordinary settling day arrived the defendant's principals completed the transactions and paid the plaintiffs does not affect the plaintiffs' right of action. The plaintiffs, according to the rules of the Stock Exchange, have to account for the £281 to the official assignee for the purpose of securing equality of distribution among the Stock Exchange creditors. Therefore there is nothing to affect the ascertained rights of the plaintiffs. I must notice one other argument. During the course of the argument we were referred to the case of Whitmore v. Turquand, in the Court of Appeal, as a decision that if there is a cessio bonorum by a creditors' deed, and a creditor comes in under the deed and takes a dividend, that operates as a release of the debt though there is no release in terms, and it was said that the same principle applies to a cessio bonorum under a Stock Exchange liquidation. We are not, in the circumstances, compelled to say whether the decision in that case is reconcilable with the decisions in the subsequent cases of Ex parte Ward I do not say that they are not reconcilable. It is not necessary to go into that question. It is probable that if the case of Whitmore v. Turquand were looked into it would be found that it did not lay down so definite a principle as it is said to do. We are bound by the two later decisions of this court, and for these reasons I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is covered by the two decisions in Ex parte Ward, In re Ward.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the claim for £281, in Ex parte Ward, In re Ward (No. 2), Cotton, L.J., said: "Rule 170 in the case of a defaulter really alters the original contract, and provides a new contract as between the defaulter and his creditor, and then the amount of the liability is fixed and ascertained in accordance with that altered contract." With regard to the entire claim, in my opinion the right to proceed at law is not affected by the liquidation of the defendant's assets on the Stock Exchange by the official assignee. It is said that at the time when the cases of Ex parte Ward were decided it had not been definitely laid down that the operation of the Stock Exchange rules as to liquidation produces a cessio bonorum. That, however, is not borne out when we look at the cases, because James, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court in Ex parte Saffery, 25 W. R. 218, 4 Ch. D. 555, expressly so laid it down, and that view was confirmed when the case went to the House of Lords (Tomkins v. Saffery). It is not, in my opinion, open to us to give effect to the arguments advanced on behalf of the defendant.

Company — Promotion — Secret profit — Fiduciary relationship — Prospectus — Non-disclosure — Misrepresentation — Damages.

A company bought two music halls, the conveyance being taken to a nominee of the company who afterwards executed a declaration of trust in favour of the company. He then purported to resell the halls at a greatly enhanced price to another nominee of the company as trustee for another company not yet formed, which was intended to work the halls. The original purchase price was paid and the purchase price on the resale received by the first company, which settled the memorandum and articles of the second company, and registered it, and nominated the signatories to its memorandum and most of its directors, one of whom was a director of the first company. The prospectus of the second company represented the nominee of the first company as vendor of the halls, concealing the interest of the first company in them, and contained material misrepresentations.

Held, on the evidence, that the first company bought the halls with the intention of reselling them to the second company at an inflated price, that it promoted the second company, and that the prospectus of the second company was issued with the knowledge and privity of the first company, and that the first company therefore stood in a fiduciary relation to the future allottees of shares in the second company, and was liable for the damage sustained by that company through the breach of duty and fraud of the first company.

Decision of Wright, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wright, J.

The facts were as follows: The Consolidated Exploration and Finance Co. (Limited) (in this report referred to as the Finance Company) was incorporated in 1893 for the purposes, inter alia, of the investment of its funds in debentures or shares of any company, the establishment and working of financial, commercial, and industrial undertakings, and the purchase and sale of real and personal property of all kinds.

In December, 1896, the board of the Finance Company resolved to take over two music halls—the Empire Music Hall at Hanley and the Princess Palace Hall at Leeds—on the terms of draft contracts approved on the 21st of December, 1896.

These contracts were entered into by one Rands as the nominal purchaser, he being in reality a clerk employed and paid for the purpose by the Finance Company.

The contracts provided that a part of the purchase-money should be left on mortgage if Rands or his assignees, being a company formed to work the premises, should so require.

The total purchase-money of the two halls was £24,000, and the Finance Company paid the deposit.

On the 1st of February, 1897, Rands purported to sell the halls to one Carter (also a nominee of the Finance Company) as trustee for an intended company to be known as the Leeds and Hanley Theatres of Varieties (Limited) (in this report referred to as the Theatres Company). The purchase price was £75,000, which, under another document dated the 13th of February, was to be paid as to £17,500 in cash, as to £16,000 by mortgages to be given by the Theatres Company, as to £10,000 by debentures of that company, and as to £31,500 by fully-paid shares of it, Rands undertaking to pay all preliminary expenses and to spend up to about £5,000 in structural alterations.

On the 3rd of February Rands executed a declaration of trust, declaring he had entered into the contracts of purchase and sale only as trustee for the Finance Company, to which all moneys paid and all moneys shares, and benefits to be received from them belonged, and that he held the agreements and the properties comprised in them, and all profits and benefits in connection with them, as trustee for the Finance Company, which he appointed his attorney for carrying out the trust.

In the meantime the Finance Company had been promoting the Theatres Company, the prospectus of which was issued in January, 1897. In this document the above-mentioned contracts for the sale of the halls to Rands, and the sale by him to Carter as trustee for the company, were referred to, and it was stated that "the vendor, who has the fullest confidence in the success of the company, will defray all expenses of registration, printing, advertising, &c., up to and including allotment, and stipulates for the right to apply for and have allotted to him, in part payment of the purchase-money, one-third of the share capital issued on the same terms as the allotment is made to the public." There was also contained in it a valuation of the two halls at £75,000 by Messrs. Carter & Le Grand, described as "the well-known and old-established valuers to the licensed trade," but who had in fact been established for less than two years.

The Finance Company settled the memorandum and articles of the Theatres Company, and registered it on the 2nd of February, 1897. They also provided, paid, and indemnified the signatories to its memorandum, and nominated three of the directors, who held their first meeting on the 4th of February, and approved the prospectus and adopted the purchase by Carter. Two of these directors received their qualification from the Finance Company. One director, named Browne, was also a director of the Finance Company, and the minutes of the board meetings of that company showed that in December, 1896, and afterwards he did not vote on questions connected with the promotion of the Theatres Company, though he was present at all but one of the board meetings at which such questions were discussed. The purchase arrangements were carried out by the Finance Company signing a cheque for £6,000 for the original vendors on account of purchase-money, and receiving the same sum from the Theatres Company out of the proceeds of subscription for its shares, and by the Theatres Company paying the Finance Company the balance of the £17,500 which was to be paid in cash, and giving mortgages for the £16,000, debentures for the £10,000, and paying the £31,500 in fully-paid shares of £5 each. The Finance Company, on the other hand, paid the promotion expenses of the Theatres Company and the cost of structural alterations, which together absorbed all but £312 of the cash which it had received from the Theatres Company.

The halls were worked at a loss and sold by mortgagees for about £19,000, which left for the Finance Company, as holders of the £10,000 debentures, a sum of about £2,300. The Theatres Company was ordered to be wound up, and the official receiver and liquidator of the company issued this summons for a declaration that the Finance Company was liable to account to the Theatres Company for a secret profit made in the promotion of it and the sale to it of the two halls, or alternatively that the Finance Company might be ordered to make compensation for misfeasance in inducing the Theatres

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Company to purchase the halls without proper disclosure and at a fraudulent overvalue. The Finance Company was itself in liquidation, but possessed assets to the amount of about £12,000 to answer the claim. Wright, J., held that the Finance Company was accountable for the profit on the sale and purchase of the halls, and liable for the damage sustained by the Theatres Company through the purchase; and ordered the Finance Company to pay £12,000 with interest at 4 per cent. from the 28th of March, 1897, until payment, and costs.

The Finance Company appealed.

Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, K.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the appellants.—In no view of the case have the Theatres Company suffered £12,000 loss. The judgments in Gluckstein v. Barnes, [1900] A. C. 240, 48 W. R. Dig. 34; and in the Court of Appeal, sub. nom., in In re Olympia (Limited), [1898] 2 Ch. 153, 46 W. R. Dig. 32, do not in any way affect the present case. If misfeasance is charged it must be made out. It cannot be said that when the Finance Company bought the halls it stood in any fiduciary position towards the Theatres Company. That had not been formed and there can be no trustee without a cestui que trust. Here there was no one who could claim that at the time of the purchase the Finance Company held the halls on trust for them.

They also referred to Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co., 27 W. R. 65, 3 App. Cas. 1218, and in the Court of Appeal, 25 W. R. 436, 5 Ch. D. 73; Cavendish-Bentinck v. Fenn, 36 W. R. 641, 12 App. Cas. 652; Ladywell Mining Co. v. Brookes, 35 W. R. 785, 35 Ch. D. 400; and Burland v. Earle, 50 W. R. 241, [1902] A. C. 83.

Younger, K.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the respondents.—The Finance Company promoted and incorporated the Theatres Company in the strictest and fullest sense. At the date of the purchase the Finance Company was in a fiduciary position towards the intended Theatres Company, and was therefore not at liberty to make a profit. And the prospectus is the work of the Finance Company, and a deliberate fraud, and therefore even if we are wrong as to the fiduciary relationship, we can obtain on the ground of fraud the same relief as we should have been entitled to had we established that relationship. The fact that in Gluckstein v. Barnes the misrepresentation referred to the actual property was a mere accident. If you can prove fraud you can recover the profit made. [They also cited In re Brinsmead & Sons, [1897] 1 Ch. 406, 45 W. R. Dig. 35; In re Lady Forrest Murchison Gold Mine, [1901] 1 Ch. 582, 49 W. R. Dig. 28; and Lagunas Nitrate Co. v. Lagunas Syndicate, 48 W. R. 74, [1899] 2 Ch. 392, at p. 428.] There was no independent board to which to disclose the facts, and they were deliberately concealed. We are therefore entitled to profits without proof of damage, but we in fact lost much more than the £12,000 which Wright, J., gave us. The case can be distinguished from Cavendish-Bentinck v. Fenn on the grounds given by Lindley, L.J., in In re Olympia (Limited).

Macnaghten, K.C., in reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This case has been argued very well and at great length, though I will not say at too great length. Mr. Macnaghten and Mr. Younger each had numerous different ways of putting his case, and seemed to think each way as good as any other; but we see our way now, thanks to their arguments, to take a very definite line in this case. It will be best to state the facts shortly first. [His lordship stated them, and continued:] The first ground on which it is sought to make the Finance Company responsible to the Theatres Company is, that at the time when the Finance Company bought the property it was acting on behalf of the Theatres Company, though the latter was not yet incorporated. It is said that as the purchase was made for the benefit of the Theatres Company yet to be created it was made by the Finance Company as agents of or trustees for the Theatres Company, and that any excess in the sum paid by the Theatres Company above that paid by the Finance Company would be a sum paid for nothing, because they were entitled to have the property handed over at the price paid by their trustee or agent, and the Finance Company had no right to keep anything beyond the price actually paid by them. I do not see my way to arrive at this conclusion. I do not wish to lay down any proposition of law not necessary for the decision of the case, and I do not say it is impossible for a purchase to be made on behalf of a company as yet unformed; but I do not at present express any opinion on the question, and do not base my judgment on the view that the Finance Company were agents or trustees for the Theatres Company. Mr. Younger, however, put his case in another way, which is much more easy to accept. He says that from first to last it is plain that the Finance Company were acting as promoters of the Theatres Company. It seems clear from minutes of the board meetings of the Finance Company that that company was acting as promoter of the company which should buy the halls from it. This is shown first by the fact that Mr. Browne, who was a director of the Finance Company, and afterwards was nominated a director of the Theatres Company, did not vote on questions connected with the promotion of the Theatres Company when such questions arose at board meetings of the Finance Company; and it is evident that his not voting was deliberate, since he was present at all but one of the board meetings at which the question was discussed. Evidently he did not vote because it was intended that he should be a director of the Theatres Company when formed. And the intention of the Finance Company to promote the Theatres Company becomes avowed in the minutes as time goes on, and the minutes which show this continue even after the registration of the Theatres Company. I come to the conclusion that from first to last the Finance Company was the promoter of the Theatres Company, and intended to buy the halls and to create a board under its own control which should buy the halls at an inflated price. If so, it follows that throughout the period the Finance Company was in a fiduciary relation to the Theatres Company. The Finance Company nominated the directors of the Theatres Company, and gave two of them their qualifications, besides providing the signatories to the memorandum of association, and I do not mean that the Finance Company stood in a fiduciary relation to these directors or signatories, but to the future allottees of shares in the Theatre Company. It is clear from the minutes, as early as December, 1896, that the Finance Company had not only resolved to promote a company, but had decided what sort of company it should be, for a minute states that there is to be an appeal to the public to buy shares. This fiduciary relationship involved, inter alia, a duty on the part of the Finance Company to disclose the fact that it was the beneficial vendor of the halls. It is said that there is no proof that this was not disclosed. To my mind it is clear that no disclosure of the fact was made to the future allottees of shares; and any disclosure to the nominee directors was no disclosure at all. It is not clear who wrote the prospectus, but it is clear that it was issued with the knowledge and privity of the Finance Company. The prospectus seeks to represent to the public that the real vendor was Rands, who was represented as having such a belief in the Theatres Company that, having the option to take a larger sum in cash, he preferred shares. Not only was it not disclosed that the Finance Company was the real vendors, but these statements invite a contrary conclusion. I will call attention to the words of Baggallay, L.J., in Erlanger's case and of Jessel, M.R., in Re British Seamless Paper Box Co. 29 W. R. 690, 17 Ch. D. 467, quoted by Collins, L.J., in In re Olympia (Limited), as authority for including among the cestuis que trust of promoters persons who are invited to take shares. Baggallay, L.J., says: "The syndicate were in substance not only the vendors of the property, but also the promoters of the company, and in such a case the syndicate, as promoters, being in a fiduciary relation to the company, it was essential that the public, who were invited to become, and were expected to become, the shareholders of the company, and to constitute the company, shall have the fullest information as to all the surrounding circumstances." Jessel, M.R., says, in the Seamless Box case, "If promoters make an arrangement to get a profit for themselves out of what is apparently paid to the vendors, it is immaterial whether the contract with the vendors is approved of by the directors of the company, who are the promoters, just before the allotment or just after; in both cases it is intended to cheat the future shareholders; and of course it makes no difference whatever that the persons who, at the time the allotment was made, were in fact the promoters or their nominees knew of the fraud. You can defraud future allottees as well as present allottees." And the judgments of Brett and Cotton, L.JJ., in the same case on appeal, are to the same effect. These judgments afford ample authority for the proposition. The prospectus here not only does not disclose the interest of the Finance Company, but contains a positive suggestio falsi in its statements as to Rands. In view of this breach of duty the question arises whether the Theatres Company is entitled to any remedy against the Finance Company. In my judgment it is so entitled, but to a remedy in the nature of damages. I am not sure that in respect of this breach of duty the Theatres Company can maintain an action in the nature of one for money had and received, and I think it safer to say that it is entitled to damages. Mr. Macnaghten says no damages are proved. But here the Theatres Company has not tried to rescind the contract; indeed, in view of the amount raised on mortgage, it would be impossible to do so, since matters could not be put in statu quo.

The Theatres Company is entitled to damages for the breach of duty, and the damage consists in the fact that it has bought for £75,000 what the Finance Company bought for £24,000. The Finance Company might, of course, have bought cheaply, or the halls have gone up in value; but the mortgagees have realized the property and netted only £19,000, and it is not necessary to prove everything conclusively in proving damages; it is enough to prove a state of things from which an inference may fairly be drawn. A valuer of property usually makes a valuation some days before it is actually used, but this does not prevent his valuation being some evidence of the value of the property. Of course the Finance Company's expenditure in promotion, decoration, &c., must be deducted, but even so there is a cash difference of over £40,000. How, then, can it be said that Wright, J.'s, figure of £12,000 is not supported by evidence? So wide a margin of probable excess in price involves an excess of at least £12,000 in cash. I have hitherto based my judgment on the fiduciary relationship in which the Finance Company was placed as being the most convenient basis for it. But it is equally plain that the prospectus contained untrue statements and suggestions, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—It is enough for me to say that on my view of the facts the law is clear, and there is no need to discuss authorities. I think it is clear that the Finance Company promoted the Theatres Company, and that the prospectus was prepared, printed, and issued under such circumstances as to make the Finance Company responsible for its issue and contents. I am satisfied that this prospectus was fraudulent. Not only does it conceal the fact that the Finance Company were the real vendors, but it contains actual misrepresentations of a material character, and in particular the statement as to Rands. The evidence shows that he had no interest in the property, and was a mere dummy, paid for the use of his name. The prospectus is cunningly framed so as to convey the impression that the promoters had nothing to do with the vendor. Rands in fact had no confidence in the company; it did not matter to him what became of it, and he had made no such stipulation as alleged. The prospectus is evidently fraudulent, and under the circumstances it is a fraud of the Finance Company on the Theatres Company. Further, the duty of the Finance Company was to see that the Theatres Company had an independent board of directors. Two of the directors were provided with their qualification by the Finance Company, of which one of them was a director. There is no direct evidence as to the position of the others, but if they knew of the connection of the Finance Company with the Theatres Company they were parties to a fraud, and, if not, the Finance Company improperly kept them in ignorance of the facts. The Finance Company undoubtedly caused the Theatres Company to incur heavy liabilities, and to part with a large number of its shares; and if, therefore, the halls were worth less than the consideration paid by them, the difference is damage suffered by the Theatres Company in consequence of the fraud of the Finance Company, for which the Finance Company is liable. As to the valuation of the halls no attempt was made to establish the truth of Messrs. Carter & Le Grand's valuation. The damage established is certainly not less than the profit made by the Finance Company, or Wright, J.'s, sum of £12,000, and the appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and substantially for the same reasons. It is established that the Finance Company as promoter of the Theatres Company has been guilty of misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust, and that the Theatres Company has, in consequence, suffered damage to the extent of at least £12 000. The Finance Company promoted the Theatres Company, and was therefore bound, in Lord Cairns' words in Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co., 3 App. Cas., at p. 1236, to provide the company with a board of directors who should both be aware that the property which they were asked to buy was the property of the promoter, and who should be competent and impartial judges as to whether the purchase ought or ought not to be made. Here the facts were that one director was a director of the Finance Company. Another received his qualification from it. As to the prospectus, I agree with what Romer, L.J., has said. In Cavendish-Bentinck v. Fenn Lord Macnaghten, 12 App. Cas., at p. 671, says: "I think that if a person in the position of Mr. Fenn abstained from disclosing his interest, and thus led the board to purchase the property for more than it was really worth it would by very difficult to escape from a charge of fraud. I think that it would have been a fraud to have concealed his interest, and so to have represented in fact that he was not interested in the property, and that it belonged to other persons who were not connected with the scheme." This case is distinguishable from that in point of fact, in that the contract in that case was a real contract, whereas here there was no real contract between Rands and Carter, both being nominees of the Finance Company.

[It was agreed that judgment should be taken for £12,000 and costs, without interest.]

Farwell, J. }

In re DAVIS.
DAVIS v. DAVIS. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Rate of interest on trust moneys.

If a trustee employs trust money in trade, he must account for the profits, or, at the option of the cestui que trust, he must account for trade interest at 5 per cent.

This was an action by the beneficiaries under the will of J. Davis, deceased, against the trustees of the will.

The facts are set forth in the judgment of Farwell, J.

Bramwell Davis, K.C., and Dunham, for the plaintiff.

Upjohn, K.C., and Le Riche, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This action asks for relief on various grounds, which I have disposed of as the case went on, but there remains the matter in which the trustees no doubt have done wrong. I credit the defendant Rosenfelt with the desire to do the best he could for the plaintiffs—indeed he seems to have acted with great consideration and kindness. The action charges trustees with not having accounted and other matters. Those charges are without any foundation, and so far as they are concerned I dismiss the action with costs.

Then there is this one point, as to which, although the defendants were challenged about two days before the writ was issued, no opportunity of making amends was given to them. What they did was this: they received £6,400, and if they had placed the sum on deposit at their bankers and the bank rate had been paid on it, the sum would have earned 1½ per cent. The plaintiff Davis, the tenant for life, was in want of money, and the defendants thought it would be advantageous for him to have 3½ per cent. on deposit, and wait to see how trust securities would go in the market. No doubt the trustees were entitled to keep the money on deposit at the bank for a short time; but they in fact kept it for over a year. They paid it to the firm in which one of themselves, Mr. Rosenfelt, was a partner under these circumstances: Mr. Rosenfelt's business was in want of ready money from time to time, and he and his partners had deposited securities to a very large amount—namely, £60,000, with their bankers, in order to be allowed, whenever they pleased, to overdraw up to £20,000. At the time this took place they had an overdraft of about £18,000, on which they were paying 3½ per cent. to their bankers. The defendants could not get 3½ per cent. on the £6,400, and so they placed it with the firm by reducing their overdraft to this extent, and paid the plaintiff, Mr. Davis, the 3½ per cent. instead of paying it to their bankers. Now, I can only say that that is not justifiable, although not dishonest or morally wrong. Mr. Bramwell Davis has very properly elected, considering that the sum is small and that the expense of an account would be great, to ask me to make the alternative order which I am bound by the rule stated in Vyse v. Foster, 21 W. R. 207, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 309, to give him. James, L.J., there says: "If an executor or trustee makes profit by an improper dealing with the assets or the trust fund, that profit he must give up to the trust. If that improper dealing consists in embarking or investing the trust money in business, he must account for the profits made by him by such employment in such business; or at the option of the cestui que trust, or if it does not appear, or cannot be made to appear, what profits are attributable to such employment, he must account for trade interest—that is to say, interest at 5 per cent." Now it is quite true that it has been suggested in subsequent cases, and by the editor of Lewin on Trusts, that perhaps 5 per cent. is hardly the mercantile rate of interest now; but I do not feel at liberty so to decide, or to alter the 5 per cent. mentioned by James, L.J. The result is that, so far as this particular matter is concerned, the defendants must be charged with interest at the rate of 5 per cent.—that is to say, they must pay the difference between 3½ and 5 per cent. for the period during which the £6,400 was invested with the firm. Then this sum will be set off against the costs of the action. As to the costs of this particular matter, inasmuch as the trustees, in my opinion, were quite honest, and really did the best they could for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and were not given any opportunity of setting the matter right before action, I am not going to order them to pay the costs of it.

Petition.

This was a petition for confirmation of reduction of capital of the above company by the cancellation of founders' shares.

The company was incorporated as a limited company under the Companies Acts in 1889. Its objects were (amongst other things) to seek for and secure openings for capital in South Africa and elsewhere, and with a view thereto to prospect, explore, and employ and equip expeditions and experts, and acquire concessions, and work mines, and deal generally with ores and minerals.

Prior to the agreement referred to later on the capital of the company was £700,300, divided into 350,000 preference shares and 350,000 ordinary shares of £1 each, and 300 founders' shares of £1 each. All this capital had been issued and was fully paid up, and the paid-up capital of the company was thus £700,300.

By clause 5 of the memorandum of association it was provided that the profits of the company should be applied first in payment of a cumulative dividend of 8 per cent. on the paid-up capital of the ordinary shares, and at certain rates upon any increase of capital as mentioned, and of the surplus 75 per cent. was to be distributed as a further dividend on the shares other than founders' shares, and the remaining 25 per cent. amongst the holders of the founders' shares.

In the event of a winding up the founders' shares were to have 25 per cent. of the surplus assets after payment off of the capital paid up on the other shares.

Any rights attached to the shares issued as an increase of capital were in no way to prejudice the rights attached to the founders' shares.

By its articles of association the company might "reduce its capital by paying off capital or cancelling capital which had been lost or was unrepresented by available assets, or reducing the liability on the shares or otherwise. . . ."

The company had been carrying on its business with great success, and it was desired to increase its capital, but before doing so it was desired to extinguish the founders' shares, as otherwise a large proportion of the profits on the new capital would go to the founders' shares.

Accordingly an agreement dated the 17th of February, 1902, was entered into between two persons on behalf of themselves and all other holders of founders' shares of the first part, the company of the second part, and a person on behalf of the directors of the third part. This agreement recited that it was estimated that the relative values of the ordinary and founders' shares were such that each of the founders' shares was equivalent to 260 ordinary shares, with a liability to pay par—that is, £260, and that it was deemed expedient that the founders' shares should be cancelled, and that the holders thereof should subscribe for and be allotted ordinary shares in the company, and that for that purpose the capital of the company should be increased by the creation of 78,000 new ordinary shares of £1 each; and the agreement provided (1) that when it became absolute each of the holders of the founders' shares who should ratify the agreement, should (if he ratified it in Form A), for every founders' share held by him be deemed to apply for an allotment of 260 new ordinary shares upon the condition that he was to pay up the full nominal amount on allotment, and should (if he ratified in Form B) for every founders' share held by him be deemed to request an allotment to the directors of the company of 260 of the new ordinary shares upon the footing that he should pay up the full amount thereof on allotment; (2) the company were to be at liberty to cancel the founders' shares and to apply for an order confirming the cancellation. The agreement was made conditional, among other things, upon the sanction of the court being obtained to the cancellation, and it was to become void if all the conditions were not fulfilled within six months of its date.

On the 27th of March, 1902, at an extraordinary general meeting the capital of the company was increased to £1,000,300 by the creation of 150,000 new ordinary and 150,000 new preference shares of £1 each, and the conditional agreement was approved of; and subsequently a special resolution was passed (which was afterwards duly confirmed) as follows: "That having regard to the conditional agreement dated the 17th of February, 1902, and made," &c., "the capital of the company be reduced from £1,000,300 to £1,000,000 by the "cancellation of the whole 300 fully paid up founders' shares of £1 each." A petition was now presented praying that the reduction of capital to be effected by the special resolution above mentioned might be confirmed.

Stewart Smith, K.C., G. Lawrence, and W. E. Hollams, for the petitioners.—We are not proposing to write off any capital which has been lost, or to return any paid-up capital, but simply to cancel 300 shares. [BUCKLEY, J.—How can you do that?] See Bellerby v. Rowland & Marwood's Steamship Co. (Limited), 50 W. R. 566, [1902] 2 Ch. 14. We come within sections 9 and 11 of the Companies Act, 1867. The operation of these sections is not limited by the Act of 1877. We come within the principle of the British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399. The court may sanction a reduction of capital whenever such a reduction ought to be made: see observations of Lord Herschell in that case, 42 W. R., at p. 653, [1894] A. C., pp. 403, 405. [BUCKLEY, J.—If you were going to return the paid-up capital to the holders of the founders' shares, I could understand your position.] That might have been done, but it is too late now. It would require a special resolution to be passed and confirmed, and then the sanction of the court would not probably be obtained within six months from the date of the agreement. Cancellation of shares without return of capital was sanctioned in the cases of In re Westminster Electric Supply Corporation in August, 1897, and In re St. James's and Pall Mall Electric Light Co. in 1899, both before Stirling, J., and also in In re House-to-House Electric Supply Co., before Romer, J., in 1898. None of these cases are reported.

They also referred to In re Development Co. of Central and West Africa, 50 W. R. 456, [1902] 1 Ch. 647, and In re Nixon's Navigation Co., [1897] 1 Ch. 872, 45 W. R. Dig. 24.

July 19.—BUCKLEY, J.—The question to be determined on this petition is whether, under the Companies Acts, 1867 and 1877, a company limited by shares can reduce its nominal capital and its paid-up capital by cancelling (with the consent of their holders) paid-up shares to a certain amount where neither has that amount been lost nor is it unrepresented by available assets, nor is it to be paid off as in excess of the wants of the company. The petitioners, who contend for the affirmative of this proposition, say that inasmuch as such a reduction might be made if the amount paid up were returned to the shareholders, the question cannot be affected by the fact that they are content to surrender the shares without asking payment. The reply would seem to be that if the proposition be true the court has for the last quarter of a century or more been wasting its time in requiring evidence that capital has been lost, unless it can be maintained (which it cannot) that the evidence has been required, not for the protection of creditors, but to enable a majority of the corporators to bind a minority. For, if the proposition be true, it is immaterial whether the capital has been lost or not—it is sufficient to show that the shareholder is content to release all right in respect of the amount paid. In speaking of reduction of capital the word "capital" must be understood as meaning neither nominal capital to the exclusion of the paid-up capital nor the latter to the exclusion of the former. The nominal capital (A) of every company limited by shares (that is to say, the amount stated in the memorandum of association or as modified by subsequent increase) must always be represented by (B) capital called and paid up on shares issued, and (C) capital uncalled up on shares issued, and (D) the amount of unissued shares, or by some one or more of those. Every reduction of capital must reduce (A)—that is, the nominal capital—and must reduce some one or more or all of (B), (C), and (D). The key to the solution of all questions as to reduction of capital lies in remembering that the corporation owes a duty, not to its shareholders only, but to its creditors also. It is unnecessary to attempt to express accurately and exhaustively for the purposes of this judgment what the rights of the creditors are. I shall not be misunderstood if I state quite shortly that their rights are to insist that neither paid-up capital (B) nor uncalled capital (C) shall be diminished without provision being made for the debts due to them or the protection which the Acts provide being extended to them. Their rights are founded upon the fact that capital paid up can, except as permitted by the Acts, be applied only for capital purposes, and that uncalled capital can only be released by proceedings under the Acts. If the reduction be by reducing (A) and (D), or in other words by the cancellation of unissued shares, this may be effected without coming to the court at all: see section 5 of the Companies Act, 1877. To such a case the provisions of the Act of 1867 do not apply. The statute excludes this case, because unissued capital is a thing to which the creditor has no right to look. If the reduction be effected by reducing (A) and (C), the case is governed by the Act of 1867, and the creditors must be provided or their consent obtained. The question is, What are the rights in the remaining case—namely, where the reduction is made by reducing (A) and (B)—by reducing, that is, nominal capital and paid-up capital? The answer, in my judgment, is that the reduction must in this case be so made as not to affect the equilibrium of the balance-sheet to the prejudice of the creditor. On the liability side of the balance-sheet will be found, amongst other things, the amount of capital paid up by shareholders upon their shares. This is an amount in respect of which the creditor has certain rights. It must not be used except for capital purposes. On the other side will be found the assets of the company. Where capital is written off as lost or unrepresented by available assets, the equilibrium of the balance-sheet is maintained by striking out on the one side a certain amount from the paid-up capital, and on the other side a certain amount from the value of the assets. Where capital is returned as in excess of the wants of the company, an amount is in the same manner taken off from both sides of the balance-sheet. The balance item on the debit or credit side of the balance-sheet, as the case may be, is in either case unaffected. But if the proposition for which the petitioners contend were true, the result would be to strike out a sum on the liability side from the amount representing paid-up capital, leaving the asset side unaffected. The balance item in the balance-sheet would thus be altered by a further credit sum. I do not stay to analyze the question whether this additional sum would then become divisible in dividend. In some instances it would; in others it would not. A principal purpose of the Act in allowing reduction by cancelling lost capital is to enable a company to resume payment of dividend, when without reduction it could not legally do so before making up the loss. In my judgment the Act of 1877, by specifically giving power to cancel lost capital or to return paid-up capital, impliedly forbids the writing off of capital which is neither lost nor returned. If this is not its effect, then I fail to see why the court should ever require evidence of loss, for by the hypothesis the consent of the shareholder to release a part of his paid-up capital would be sufficient. The British and American Finance Corporation v. Couper was cited by the petitioners as an authority in favour of their contention. It does not help them. That case decided, not that every reduction is valid as between the corporation and its creditors, but that, assuming a reduction valid as between the corporation and its creditors, the incidence of the reduction may, as between the corporators, be thrown upon them in any manner, which having regard to their contractual relations inter se, the court finds to be just. In the present case the amount proposed to be written off without being returned is, in the circumstances of this company, a quite trivial sum—namely, £300. But the principle is the same as if it were £300,000. If £300,000 were written off on the liability side, the result would be that the obligation of the company to keep capital assets to an amount sufficient to balance the capital paid up would be diminished by £300,000, and the rights of creditors would be affected. The object here in view can in my opinion be attained, but not in the way that has been adopted in this case. Suppose there be a holder of a £5 founders' share with some extraordinary rights of dividend which it is desired to terminate. If that holder is minded to put that £5 paid-up share at the disposal of the company as a share, all rights in respect of which he releases, upon the terms that he shall simultaneously take an ordinary share and pay £5 upon it, the equilibrium of the balance-sheet is not disturbed in such a manner as to reduce the figure which measures the right of the creditor to say that capital assets shall be applied only for capital purposes. In such case the amount owing in respect of capital remains the same as before. It is true that the asset side is increased by the new £5 which the man pays, and that when the founders' share is cancelled the balance item will be increased by £5 to credit, but the creditor is not thereby affected to his prejudice. The amount of the debit in respect of paid-up capital is not less than before, and the obligation of the company not to part with capital assets so as to have less than that amount is not reduced. The point is that the amount of capital assets which as between itself and its creditors the company must not, except by loss—must not by payment to its corporators—reduce below the amount of its paid-up capital is the same as before, and the rights of creditors are unaffected. This is a course which has been adopted and upon which orders of the court have been successfully sought and obtained. I have been referred to two cases (both unreported) in which this was done—viz., In re Westminster Electric Supply Corporation, in August, 1897, and In re St. James's and Pall Mall Electric Light Co., in 1899, both before Mr. Justice Stirling. The course then taken was, shortly, that the holders of the founders' shares took up further capital to an amount in excess of the amount of the founders' shares and transferred their fully-paid founders' shares to trustees for the company. The effect of this in substance was that the item in the balance-sheet of paid-up capital was not reduced, but the founders' shares became again shares in the dominion of the company, and in respect of which no corporator had any rights. For the present purpose those shares stood in a like position to shares which had not been taken or agreed to be taken by any person: see section 5 of the Companies Act, 1877. They were not in fact shares within that section, but they were shares upon which no corporator had any rights. Their cancellation was made with the consent of the shareholders who formerly held but had voluntarily released them, and did not diminish the amount of the capital assets to which the creditor had a right to look for payment of his debt, because other shares to a like (or greater) amount had been taken in their stead. The scheme in the present case does not take that form. The agreement to take the new shares is conditional upon and does not take effect until after the reduction has been made. The resolution is to reduce, not after the new shares have been taken, but on the footing of an agreement which is, and in the resolution is described as, conditional. The minute to be approved is one in which the shares issued and paid up are less by £300 than they were before. If I were to make the order asked for, the debit in the balance-sheet in respect of paid-up capital would be reduced by £300, and the amount is only to be brought up to, or rather to an amount in excess of, the previously existing debit by something which is to be done thereafter. In my judgment this is not within the Act, and although the amount is here very small, still, if the parties are not willing to carry through the matter at their own risk, but come for an order of the court, they must, I think, put their proceedings in such form as that the court can make the order. I may add that I think they are amply justified in not carrying through the matter at their own risk, though the amount is small. I say so, not because I intend to express an opinion that, if the founders' shares were so transferred to trustees for the company and replaced by new shares taken, the company could not legally accept a surrender of them, but because, the principal purpose of the whole matter being, no doubt, to get rid finally and for ever of the founders' shares with their inconvenient rights, it is best to do so under an order of the court. As the matter stands, therefore, I think the petitioners have not brought themselves within the Act, and that under existing circumstances I should have to dismiss the petition. But I think the parties can so vary the circumstances as to put the court in a position to make an order. If the 78,000 shares were applied for, allotted, and paid for, and the holders of the founders' shares transferred the latter to trustees for the company, or declared themselves trustees for the company of those shares, the petition could be so amended as to lead to a minute by which the paid-up capital would be shown to be not less but greater than before. I should not, I think, be doing violence to the special resolution for reduction if in that state of facts I were to make an order. As regards the declaration by the founders that they claim no rights in respect of the founders' shares, but hold them at the disposal of the company, I think I could act upon a consent given by counsel appearing for all the founders upon the further hearing of the petition, and the order could be so worded as to give effect to that. Under these circumstances I will, if the petitioners so desire, allow the petition to stand over for a fortnight, with liberty to amend.

The petition was accordingly amended, the holders of founders' shares were made co-petitioners, and they declared that they did not claim any beneficial right in the founders' shares and held the same upon trust for the company, and desired that the same might be cancelled. The 78,000 shares were allotted to the holders of the founders' shares, and all but a small part thereof were paid for in cash, and the capital due on the rest was due and payable from the allottees to the company. On the 2nd of August, upon the petition coming on again for hearing, his lordship made the order asked for, and dispensed with the necessity of the company any longer adding the words "and reduced" to their name.

SMITH v. LEWIS. (a.)

Trustee—Trust for sale—Power to retain trust property in present form of investment—Shares in company—Reconstruction of company—Allotment of shares in new company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 161.

Where there is a trust for sale with a power to retain trust property (which includes shares in a company) in its present form of investment, on the reconstruction of the company under an arrangement whereby no option is given to shareholders to take cash in lieu of shares in the new company, the trustees may accept an allotment of and retain such shares.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by the surviving trustee of the will of Joseph Smith to determine, among other questions, whether he was justified in retaining unsold certain ordinary and preference shares in the Birmingham Small Arms Co. (Limited), forming part of the trust estate of the testator and allotted to him as such trustee in September, 1896.

By his will the testator devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to his trustees, upon trust to sell and convert the same into money, and to invest the residue of such money (after making thereout certain payments) in manner therein mentioned, and to stand possessed of the residuary trust moneys, and the investments for the time being representing the same, upon trusts for certain persons for their respective lives, and after their respective deaths for certain other persons in remainder.

The will contained a power to the trustees to postpone the sale and conversion of his real and personal estate, or any part thereof, for so long as they should think fit, and to "retain the same or any part thereof in its present form of investment," even though the property retained might not be an authorized investment. Among the authorized investments were "preference shares of any joint stock company at the time of investment paying a dividend on its ordinary shares."

The testator died in 1895, possessed of 750 ordinary shares in the Birmingham Small Arms and Metal Co. (Limited) of £5 each fully paid. The executors sold some of the shares and kept 520, and in September, 1896, they were the holders of these.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 3rd and 22nd of September the company passed a resolution for its voluntary winding up under section 161 of the Act of 1862 on the basis of a scheme whereby the assets of the old company should be sold to trustees for an intended new company, and whereby the new company, when formed, should allot to each member of the old company for each share in the old company one ordinary and one preference share of £5 each fully paid. There was no alternative given to the shareholders to take money, but they had power to dissent under section 161. The trustees did not dissent, and it was admitted that they did right. The new company was duly incorporated, and there were allotted to the trustees of the will 520 preference and 520 ordinary shares of £5 each fully paid in the new company. Shortly afterwards the company changed its name. The trustees subsequently sold fifty ordinary and twenty preference shares.

J. E. Harman, for the trustees.

Mark Romer, for the tenants for life.—The trustees were justified in retaining both classes of shares. The preference shares became an authorized investment in 1897. The ordinary shares in the new company were substantially the same as those in the old company. It is true that the reconstruction involved the dissolution of the old corporation, but that was a mere piece of machinery.

He referred to In re Morris, 33 W. R. 445, 52 L. T. Rep. 462.

R. J. Parker, for the persons entitled in remainder.—As to the preference shares I think there is now no question. But the trustees, although they were justified in taking the ordinary shares, ought to have sold them. The shares in the new company were not the same as those in the old company. The new corporation was totally distinct from the old one.

He referred to In re New, 50 W. R. 17, [1901] 2 Ch. 534, and Tucker v. Tucker, 42 W. R. 266, [1894] 1 Ch. 724.

BUCKLEY, J., stated the facts and continued: The first question is whether the plaintiff, as trustee, is justified in retaining unsold these 500 preference and 470 ordinary shares. As to the preference shares, there is another clause of the will which is important; that is the investment clause which includes "preference shares of any joint stock company at the time of investment paying a dividend on its ordinary shares." No dividend was paid on the ordinary shares in 1896. The company began to pay dividends on its ordinary shares in March, 1897; at that date preference shares became an authorized investment, and have continued to be so ever since. So that, even if the trustees ought to have sold them in 1896, they would have been entitled to buy them in 1897. That point, therefore, comes to nothing.

The further question is whether the ordinary shares are an authorized investment. They are not within any clause which authorizes the trustees to make investments. The whole question turns on whether the retention of these shares is a retainer of some part of the estate "in its present form of investment." In a sense it is not. Shares in the new company are not the same as shares in the old company; they are different shares. But that is not really an answer. I think I ought to look at the substance of the transaction. Is it substantially the same form of investment? Has the money ever been shifted from one investment to another? Now one might put many illustrations of transactions in which investments are not varied. Suppose that at the death of the testator the company had only issued ordinary shares, and that it subsequently created preference shares. Would the ordinary shares be the same shares? I should say that this would be the same investment. The company had power to create preference shares; the ordinary shares were always subject to that power, and are still the same shares. Therefore, in my opinion, nothing in this case turns on the fact that there were preference as well as ordinary shares. Secondly, suppose that after the testator's death the company availed itself of the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, and enlarged its objects, would the investment remain the same? I should say that it would. The investment was one which contained within itself the possibility of alteration—the power of becoming converted. It was the same investment with an alteration of the objects for which it might be employed. What has happened here is that since the testator's death, the company has availed itself of other statutory powers—that is to say, under section 161 it has sold its assets to another company, and has effected that operation in such a form that the trustees were bound to take the shares or to dissent and get their value under section 162 of the Act of 1862. The shares in the new company resulted from the shares in the old company without any act on their part. Have they, then, changed the form of the investment? I think not. The altered thing they have got is the same thing in another shape. They are shares in a new company, no doubt, but the only real difference is that the corporation is a different corporation. Does that fact take them out of the words "retain the same or any part thereof in its present form of investment"? I think that every case of this kind must be looked at on its merits in order to see if the investment is the same. In the present case I think it is. The new company is simply a reproduction, a transformation, of the old company. The shares in question are very valuable, and it is admitted that the trustees did right in taking them. There is no question here of a different form of business or of additional liability. All that has happened is that there is a new corporation which is the old company in a new form. The trustees obtained these shares because, by the use of the statute, the one company replaced the other. I think, therefore, that these shares are within the words of the will, and that the trustees are entitled to retain them.

Appeal against order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Collins, and Romer, L.JJ), setting aside an order for indemnity.

In 1899, Barker & Co., being desirous of having a building erected at Nottingham, entered into a contract with the appellants, Cooper & Crane, a firm of builders, by which the latter undertook to construct for Barker & Co. the whole of the building, including the roof and slating. Cooper & Co. made a sub-contract with the respondent Wright, a slater, whereby he agreed to supply the slates and do for them all the slating work of the roof.

Cooper & Crane began to carry out their contract with Barker & Co., and by means of scaffolding had constructed the building to a height exceeding thirty feet, including the framework of the roof, ready to receive the slating.

While a labourer named Brady employed by Wright to convey slates to the roof by means of a hoist or lift was so engaged an accident occurred to the lift causing him injury, from which he died. His widow applied for an arbitration between herself, Cooper & Crane, and Wright under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Cooper & Crane by their answer denied their liability to pay any compensation on the ground (amongst others) that the deceased man was not immediately employed by them, but was employed by Wright, their sub-contractor. Alternatively they claimed against Wright an indemnity in respect of any amount which might be awarded to be paid by them.

Wright by his answer denied that he was the undertaker of any work to which the Act of 1897 applies.

The county court judge at Nottingham made his award for payment of the sum of £217, with costs, by Cooper & Crane, as undertakers of the building, for compensation to the widow and dependants.

He made no award against Wright for payment of any compensation.

On further consideration the learned judge made the order now in question, that Wright should indemnify Cooper & Crane to the extent of the £217 and the applicant's costs.

Cooper & Crane did not appeal against the award for compensation. Against the order for indemnity Wright appealed, and the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Collins, and Romer, L.JJ.), following Cass v. Butler, 48 W. R. 309, [1900] 1 Q. B. 777, set it aside.

A. Llewelyn Davies and Tinsley Lindley, for the appellants.—The respondent was an "undertaker" within the meaning of section 7 of the Act, and the appellants are entitled to indemnity from the respondent under section 4, which gives an absolute claim to indemnity. The respondent is also within the definition of "undertakers" in section 7, "persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition" of a building. Construction of a part is sufficient: Lord Macnaghten in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., 49 W. R. 380, [1901] A. C. 49; Mason v. Dean, 48 W. R. 353, [1900] 1 Q. B. 770. Cass v. Butler cannot be right on the grounds stated: Cooper v. Davenport, 16 Times L. R. 266, is identical with this case.

Rugg, K.C., and Clavell Salter, for the respondent.—The respondent was not an "undertaker" within the meaning of the Act. The person referred to in section 4 must be himself an undertaker, and not a sub-contractor. The definition in section 7 speaks of "the undertaker." Cass v. Butler was rightly decided.

A. Llewelyn Davies replied.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Lord ROBERTSON.—Like all your lordships, I have found this a most unsatisfactory question to decide. It can hardly be called a question of legal construction, the problem being how to patch up certain statutory enactments which are incoherent and almost contradictory. The Court of Appeal have adopted a view of which I can only say that it had seemed to me as good and as little exposed to objection as the competing theory; and accordingly I should not have felt justified in disturbing their judgment. But my noble and learned friend Lord Brampton has examined the subject with great care and skill; I have read his opinion with the more attention because it was not in accordance with the opinions of my noble and learned friends opposite; and to the negative, although adequate, reason already given for my not voting for reversal, my noble and learned friend's arguments have enabled me to add an affirmative opinion that his conclusion is right.

Lord BRAMPTON, after stating the facts substantially as above given, continued: In my opinion that decision (of the Court of Appeal) was right, and I will proceed to state my reasons for so thinking. I desire, however, first, to remind your lordships very shortly of the difficulties that, before the Act of 1897, beset a workman who sustained injury in the course of his employment in seeking to obtain redress, for I think that, by bearing them in mind, they will assist in enabling your lordships to form a reasonable conjecture as to the objects which the Legislature had in view in passing that Act, and thus aid in interpreting the enactments contained in it, to which I shall have occasion to refer.

In the first place, there was no available process known to the law by which such redress could be recovered except by action at law or by proceeding under the Employers' Liability Acts; but no such action or proceeding could be successful unless the workman was in a condition to prove by legal evidence that his injury was due to actionable negligence or other misconduct or default of the person from whom he sought to recover, or some other person or persons for whose negligence the former was responsible. Compensation without proof of such negligence was unheard of, and such proof was often hard to discover. Moreover, it was often extremely difficult, even when the facts were ascertained, to determine who was the person liable to be sued in the action; and to avoid such difficulties many persons were often made defendants in actions who were under no legal liability.

Added to these obstacles, the law itself was for the most part too uncertain, too dilatory, and far too expensive for an ordinary workman to embark in. Good illustrations of these difficulties will be found in Wiggett v. Fox, 11 Exch. 832, and Johnson v. Lindsay, 40 W. R. 405, [1891] A. C. 371.

Having regard to this unsatisfactory state of things, it was, as I have gathered from a study of the Act, felt by the Legislature that it would be but just and right to confer upon a large class of workmen whose necessities compelled them to seek employment in certain specified dangerous occupations, in the course of which accidents not always possible to be guarded against are of frequent occurrence, some purely casual, others no doubt attributable to negligence or default of fellow workmen, whom it would be idle to sue, or of others whose identity could not be established, a right to claim compensation to a moderate and limited amount in respect of the loss of such wages as they were incapacitated from earning in consequence of accidental injury, upon mere proof of the accident and its resulting loss, irrespective of its cause.

Another object was to impose the obligation of providing such statutory compensation upon those to whom good sense would naturally point as the fittest persons to bear it, and to define, for the convenience of an injured workman seeking compensation, the persons from whom he was entitled to claim it; and, further, to provide a simple proceeding, entailing comparatively trifling expense, by which such compensation might, if necessary, be enforced.

To carry out these very laudable objects the Act of 1897 was passed. It is, however, so framed as to provoke rather than minimize litigation; and those who are responsible for the language of some of its enactments little know the amount of labour they were entailing upon those whose duty it might be to interpret them.

I turn now turn to the Act itself, section 1 of which enacts as follows:

"If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act."

The 7th section, sub-section 1, enacts: "This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined, on, in, or about a railway, factory, mine, quarry, or engineering work, and to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined, on, in, or about any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished."

Section 7, sub-section 2, defines the meaning of the term "undertakers" in the cases of a railway, factory, quarry, laundry, or mine to be those who represent the persons or bodies actually carrying on the businesses or works so described. "In the case of a building the word 'undertakers' is declared to mean 'the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition.'"

Section 1, imposing upon "his employer" the liability to pay compensation to a workman, must be read by the light of section 7, sub-section 1, which enacts, "this Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers" as defined. It follows that the general words "his employer" in section 1, must be read as "his employer, being also the undertaker."

In this case, the deceased man having been employed by Wright, the sub-contractor, and not by Cooper & Crane, the undertakers, his employment, although on the work undertaken by Cooper & Crane, was not, in my opinion, an employment to which alone the Act applies. It is obvious that the Legislature did not intend that such a workman, who had been exposed to equal risks and dangers with his fellow workmen, should be excluded from the benefit of the Act; this is apparent from section 4, which in substance provides that the undertakers of works of construction of or on buildings shall be responsible for compensation to injured workmen employed by their sub-contractors as if they had been employed by the undertakers themselves.

The language of this section is so important that, as I shall have to refer to it hereafter for other purposes, I have felt it will be convenient to set it out in full.

Section 4: "Where in an employment to which this Act applies the undertakers, as hereinafter defined, contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work, and the undertakers would, if such work were executed by workmen immediately employed by them, be liable to pay compensation under this Act to those workmen in respect of any accident arising out of and in the course of their employment, the undertakers shall be liable to pay to any workman employed in the execution of the work any compensation which is payable to the workman (whether under this Act or in respect of personal negligence or wilful act independently of this Act) by such contractor, or would be so payable if such contractor were an employer to whom this Act applies.

"Provided that the undertakers shall be entitled to be indemnified by any other person who would have been liable independently of this section.

"This section shall not apply to any contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work which is merely ancillary or incidental to and is no part of or process in the trade or business carried on by such undertakers respectively."

That the widow was entitled to compensation from Cooper & Crane as the undertakers seems to me to admit of no possible doubt. The judge was right, therefore, in his award of compensation against them. Even had this been open to question, no appeal against it having been made, that award was not during the argument and cannot now be questioned.

The real question before your lordships arises out of the claim of Cooper & Crane for indemnity from their sub-contractor, Wright.

The case in support of that claim is thus put: that by his sub-contract with Cooper & Crane, Wright became an "undertaker" equally with themselves within the meaning of section 7, and was in every respect under the same primary obligation to pay compensation to the widow; and that such liability was a liability imposed by sections 1 and 7, independently of section 4, so as to bring him within the proviso in that section, and to give them a right to claim indemnity from him.

I do not think these propositions can be maintained.

First, Wright was not an undertaker within the meaning of section 7 of the Act. It may be that in the ordinary common acceptation of the expression a man may be said to undertake anything he has taken upon himself to do, with or without a contract; but this is not the interpretation contemplated by the framers of the definition clause. The Legislature, in using the expression "the undertakers," has given it a limited statutory meaning, beyond which it cannot be extended. The whole Act is new to the law; it gives new rights to workmen and imposes new obligations upon employers, and, so far as it can be, it must be strictly construed. To bring any person within the definition clause he must have undertaken some definite specific work of construction which is to form the subject of his undertaking. In this case it was for the construction of an entire building. Secondly, the contract of the undertaker must be with a person who has authority to employ and to authorize the undertaker to accomplish the work undertaken.

For such a work as the construction of an entire building, as is the case before us, it seems to me that two persons or sets of persons only can fill the position of "the undertakers" defined by the Act; the building owner who takes upon himself the construction of the building he requires; or the persons who, through the medium of a contract with him, engage to take upon themselves the obligation to execute that work for him. I carefully abstain from expressing any opinion touching the responsibility of a building owner who subdivides the construction of a building among several contractors, because in this case, Cooper & Crane, by their contract with him, undertook the construction from the foundations to the top of the roof. By that contract they constituted themselves "the undertakers" of the whole building within the definition in section 7, sub-section 2.

From that contract they could not recede or be discharged, unless with the assent of the building owner, until the building was completely constructed; and to the execution of their undertaking they were bound to bring their personal skill and experience and to exercise personal control over all the necessary operations. There was beyond this an obligation attached by the statute to their undertaking, towards every workman employed by them on that work undertaken, to pay to him, in the event of injury to him by accident, compensation according to the Act.

Neither the contractual obligation to the building owner nor the statutory obligation to the workman could be terminated or altered at the mere will or by any act of the undertakers. They could not assign their contract or any part of it, nor could they delegate their authority or any part of it to another. It is obvious that such authority of the undertakers must emanate from the building owner himself, for no one else could confer it.

In most cases, I have no doubt, it is immaterial to the building owner whether his undertaker employs his own materials and workmen or engages another to do isolated portions of the work for him; but the building owner has no contractual relations with the sub-contractor, and can only look upon him as a mere employee of those with whom he has himself contracted. The very name sub-contractor imports that he occupies an inferior position to the persons who have undertaken responsibility for the whole building, and that while they are bound to exercise control over his work he cannot control any of theirs. Those who are pleased to do so may call him a sub-contractor or a sub-undertaker, for every day labourer undertakes to do his work; but he is not an undertaker as defined by the statute: see Percival v. Garner, [1900] 2 Q. B. 406, 48 W. R. Dig. 117. If undertakers could add to their numbers by sub-contracts for different parts of a building, there would be no limits to their number; this would greatly tend to defeat the object of the Legislature in its endeavour to assist the workmen by pointing out specifically the persons to whom he may look for compensation.

Moreover, I can conceive none on whom the obligation to pay compensation could more reasonably rest than those who as a matter of business have undertaken the whole control and every responsibility attaching to the erection of the building they have undertaken to construct.

One must be careful not to be led astray by cases where the building owner, as in the case of Mason v. Dean, has reserved out of his contract with the undertaker the execution of a portion or portions of the building he requires to be erected, and himself contracts with some other person or persons to do such portion or portions; for there is a wide and marked difference between undertakers as defined by contracts direct with the building owners, and sub-contractors with persons who are themselves already under a building contract to undertake the whole building. I cannot see how the two positions of undertaker and sub-contractor with the undertaker for the same work can exist at the same time in one person, any more than that one person could at the same time be both master and servant. Yet that would be the position of Wright if, being a mere sub-contractor, he were to be treated also as the undertaker of the same work.

The language of section 4 indicates a thorough appreciation by the Legislature of the difference between undertakers to whom the Act applies and a sub-contractor with them for the execution of part of the work. It nowhere speaks of or alludes to sub-contractors as undertakers; and if it had been intended they should be so considered with all their obligations it is impossible to suppose it would not have imposed those obligations and expressed such intention in clear intelligible language.

In Cass v. Butler the Court of Appeal expressly held that a sub-contractor with and under those who are already undertakers is not an undertaker within the meaning of the Act, and the same was held in Cooper v. Davenport. These cases are in point, and I think that they were correctly decided.

I must not leave this part of the case without dealing with that which was suggested as some authority for the appellants—Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. When the facts of that case are carefully considered it will be found that it really does not in the least assist the appellants. No question as to the liability of a sub-contractor arose or was discussed in it. The facts are shortly these: An entire building had been completely erected for the General Omnibus Co. by a firm of builders, who had undertaken its construction according to certain plans and specifications, and it had been handed over to the company and used for some months for the purposes for which it had been built. At the end of that time the company decided to have new work of construction done in it, to give it more strength, by iron supports. The whole of that new work was undertaken by contract direct from the company by Newton, Chambers, & Co., ironworkers, who were altogether unconnected with the original building. In the course of such new work a workman employed on it was killed by an accident, and his widow claimed compensation from Newton & Co. One main objection was that the new work was not work of construction. This House held that it was. Another question was whether the scaffolding used in the new work was a scaffolding under the Act. There was no sub-contract at all, for Newton & Co. contracted directly with the omnibus company. I see no similarity between that case and this.

All these considerations have satisfied me that the Act by no reasonable interpretation can be held to make a mere sub-contractor an undertaker within the meaning of the Act. If I am right in this view it is admitted that the appeal must fail, for Wright does not come within the proviso to section 4.

But even if Wright could, contrary to my opinion, be considered such an undertaker, with an obligation equal to that of Cooper & Crane to pay compensation, I fail to see upon what ground the claim of Cooper & Crane for indemnity as distinguished from contribution can be supported in this case. The common law certainly would not enable one of two persons, each equally liable to pay statutory compensation to an injured workman, who had paid such compensation in full, to obtain indemnity against the other for the whole amount so paid. To justify such a claim some enactment by statute, or some contract between the parties, would be necessary. No such enactment or contract has been shown to exist in this case.

I do not think that a doubt could be entertained that if the accident was caused by the actionable misconduct of a stranger, and the injured workman elected to proceed against the undertakers, being employers, they are, by section 6, entitled to indemnity from that stranger, and so indemnity might be claimed if the accident was caused by any person, whether the employer or not, under circumstances which would have entitled the injured man to maintain an action or proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act.

It is very reasonable that it should be so, and I think that this is what the Act intended by the language employed. But there is not to be found in the Act anything expressly, nor as, I think, impliedly creating in the possible event of there being two or more undertakers, all being equally liable for compensation, and neither guilty of actionable negligence, an obligation of indemnity in the event of some only of them being called upon to pay.

But I would point out another objection to the claim for indemnity. The proviso in section 4 is that "the undertakers shall be entitled to be indemnified by any other person who would have been liable independently of this section." Now if it could be truly said that Wright was one of the defined undertakers mentioned in that section, and that there was a common obligation as undertakers upon Cooper & Crane and Wright, how can it be said that Wright was some person other than the undertakers, treating him as a mere sub-contractor, this objection could not arise.

In my opinion Cooper & Crane were the only undertakers within the definition of section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act; they admit that the award was right, and the burden of it must rest where it has fallen. If undertakers desire to cast the responsibility of an indemnity upon their sub-contractors, they must provide for it in their sub-contracts.

It follows that in my opinion this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord DAVEY.—It is difficult to come to any conclusion on the subject of this appeal which is not open to criticism, and I can only say that I think that the conclusion to which I have come is less open to criticism than the opposite one. There are three words used in the Act—"employer," "undertaker," and "contractor"—and your lordships are called upon to define the relative meaning in which these words are used. By section 1 it is enacted as follows: "If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation." Three conditions, therefore, are necessary under this section to give the workman a right to compensation —(1) that the employment shall be one to which this Act applies; (2) that the injury has been caused by an accident arising in the course of the employment; (3) that the workman shall be in the employment of the person from whom he claims compensation. Passing by section 4 for a moment I come to section 7, sub-section 1, which provides that the Act shall apply only to employment by "the undertakers as hereinafter defined," on, in, or about a railway, factory, mine, quarry, or engineering work, and to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined (the words are repeated), on, in, or about any building of a certain character. We have therefore the employment to which the Act applies defined, and a fourth condition is added to those I have mentioned—namely, that the employer must be "the undertaker" as defined in section 7 (2). In that sub-section I find that in the case of a building "undertakers" means the "persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition." In other words, the undertakers are the persons who undertake. I take the liberty of saying that this is not a definition, but a mere verbal or grammatical synonym, and it affords but little assistance in construing the Act. It seems to come to nothing more than this—that the word "undertakers" in the case of a building is used in its ordinary sense, whatever that may be.

It has been decided by the Court of Appeal in Mason v. Dean that a person who has contracted with a building owner for part only of the work of construction is an "undertaker" within the meaning of the Act. I think this decision right, for otherwise it appears to me that a workman of such an employer would not get any compensation under this Act at all, and it is quite immaterial for that purpose what the extent or nature of his employer's contract may be, provided that the work on which the injured workman is employed is within the Act. Indeed I think that the point is covered by implication, though not expressly, by the decision in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. Persons who undertake a part only of the work of construction are therefore within the definition of undertakers.

Nor can I find anything in the definition which requires the undertaking or engagement to be directly with the building owner, or excludes a sub-contractor to whom the contractor for the whole building has let a certain portion of the work. Such a person undertakes the work which he has engaged to do as literally and truly as if his contract was directly with the building owner. Confining myself, therefore, to the definition, and independently of the fourth section, I am of opinion that in the case of a building a sub-contractor may be an undertaker within the meaning of the Act, and consequently a workman employed by him who has been injured by an accident in the course of his employment would be entitled to claim compensation from him. It may be that the so-called definition is so general as to include two persons, each of whom from a different aspect may be the undertaker.

Turning now to section 4, I regard that section as a proviso on section 1; it provides that in a certain case the workman may have a right to compensation from one who is not his employer. It is thereby enacted (in substance) that where "the undertakers as hereinafter defined"—i.e. (for the present purpose), persons who have undertaken in whole or in part the construction of any building—contract with another for the execution of any work, the "undertakers"—i.e., the said undertakers—shall be liable to pay compensation to a workman employed by the contractor. The words describing the compensation which the undertakers are to pay to the workmen are these: "Any compensation which is payable to the workman (whether under this Act or in respect of personal negligence or wilful act independently of this Act) by such contractor, or would be so payable if such contractor were an employer to whom this Act applies." Two cases are therefore contemplated—(1) where compensation is payable under the Act by the contractor —i.e., the sub-contractor; and (2) where it would be payable if he were an employer to whom the Act applies. I omit for clearness of argument compensation independently of the Act. In other words, the language of the section expressly provides for a case in which both the so-called undertakers and the sub-contractor are severally liable under the Act to pay compensation to the workman for the same injury. The section appears to give an additional remedy to the workman, and not to restrict his right under section 1. It may be difficult in the case of a building to suggest cases in which a sub-contractor may or may not be an employer to whom the Act applies. It would seem that a sub-contractor who has undertaken part of the work must be one or the other in all cases alike. It is, however, possible that the case undertaken by the sub-contractor might not be an employment within the meaning of the Act. But in the case of a railway, mine, or quarry (where there is a more restricted and special definition of undertakers), it is quite conceivable that a sub-contractor might not be an undertaker or employer to whom the Act applies, and probably in many cases would not be so. The language of the section is, of course, adapted to meet the case of every kind of employment within the Act. I now turn to the proviso on which the question before your lordships turns: "Provided that the undertakers shall be entitled to be indemnified by any other person who would have been liable independently of this section." The meaning of this proviso is plain. Omit section 4, and ask yourself, is any other person liable (either under the Act or independently of the Act, I think it must mean)? I have already expressed my opinion that, excluding section 4 from consideration, a person who has contracted by way of sub-contract to execute work on a building would be liable, and I have pointed out that the language of the section itself contemplates that very case. In the present appeal the liability of the appellants is not questioned. The only question is whether they are entitled to be indemnified by the respondent, and that question has been argued exclusively on the construction of the Act. For the reasons which I have given I think that the appellants are right. It was argued that the construction of the appellants would oblige the sub-contractor to indemnify the principal contractor, although the accident might have been caused by the default of the latter. I do not think that this consequence would follow, for the reason stated by the learned counsel for the appellants in his very able argument. I think that section 6 would place the ultimate liability on the person in default. I think that the appeal should be allowed, with the usual consequences.

Lord SHAND.—I agree with those of your lordships who think that in this case the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the county court judge restored, and I am content to rest my judgment on the reasons which the county court judge has himself given.

It is almost a hopeless task to attempt to reconcile or to make a consistent whole of the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act, 1897, which have a bearing on the question of relief which this action raises, and I do not therefore propose to go into a detailed examination of the clauses containing these provisions.

The deceased workman, Brady, was not in the employment of the appellants as a servant of theirs, yet they have been held responsible for compensation for the accident under section 4 of the statute, which makes them "undertakers," in the same way as if the work on the building which they had undertaken to put up in its entirety had been "executed by workmen immediately employed by them," a provision which gives a workman or his representatives greater security for the payment of compensation in case of accident than if they had to rely on the employer alone. Section 4 of the statute concludes with the words: "Provided that the undertakers shall be entitled to be indemnified by any other person who would have been liable independently of this section"; and the question is whether, under this proviso, the appellants are entitled to the relief claimed.

On this question I am of opinion, in the first place, that the respondents, the employers of the deceased, were themselves undertakers within the meaning of the Act, which provides by section 7 that, in the case of a building, that term means "the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition." It is true they were sub-contractors. They were, in my opinion, none the less undertaking the construction of part of the building, the slating, and I agree with the county court judge in thinking that this was a substantial part of the construction itself. It is clear the respondent would be an undertaker within the meaning of the Act if his contract had been direct with the proprietor having the building erected under different contracts, and I do not think that the respondent is the less an undertaker in that he was a sub-contractor for the same work, which he actually did, and in the course of which his servant, the workman, was accidentally killed. It follows that, if the action had been originally raised against the respondent alone, he would have been held liable under section 1 of the Act. This appears to me to show that the proviso to section 7, which gives the right of relief in this case, applies, for the respondent's liability arises independently of that section. It has been said that the use of the word "person" in that proviso must refer to others than persons who were themselves also undertakers under the Act, but I do not read the term as qualified in any way, if only the liability arises independently of section 4 itself.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case a building was being constructed for Messrs. Barker & Co. by Cooper & Crane, as builders. Cooper & Crane contracted with the respondent Wright to supply slates for the roof and perform the work of completing the roof. Wright in his turn employed a labourer named Brady to carry the slates, and in the course of that employment a lift broke and caused Brady fatal injuries. It is not denied that under the express language of the statute Brady's representatives were entitled to compensation from Cooper & Crane. They were the persons constructing the entire building, but they had obtained a sub-contrator to construct the roof. No question therefore can be raised but that this is an employment to which the Act relates. To get out for the moment of the technical language of the statute, the substance of the matter would appear to be that Barker was the person for whom the building was being erected. Cooper & Crane were the persons who contracted to build it. Wright was the sub-contractor for the roof, and Brady was employed by Wright, who was Brady's actual employer. Now it appears to me that the general design of the statute was to enable an injured workman, or in the event of his death his representative, to make a claim for damages against the employer in the sense of a person who was constructing the building. Even if he was not the immediate employer of the person injured, the theory of the Act is that, apart from any negligence or misconduct, a man employed in certain dangerous employments shall be in a certain sense insured against any accident that takes place. It was probably obvious to the Legislature that if the workman were driven to sue a sub-contractor and could not rely upon the responsibility of the person engaged to perform the whole work, a series of sub-contracts might render it practically impossible for him to ascertain the person whom he ought to sue, or if he did to obtain satisfaction. But then the Legislature seems to have provided that, though the contractor for the whole work might be sued even by a person not immediately under his control or in his employment, yet the theory of the statute being that the employer was to be made liable, the contractor for the whole work might pursue his indemnity for the liability against the actual employer of the injured workman. Now here, of course, it cannot be denied that Wright is the actual employer, and if the design of the statute is what I have suggested, it is clear that if Messrs. Cooper & Crane, who did not employ

Brady at all, are only made liable by the statute in the first instance, and the statute saves their right of indemnity against the real employer, the case is one actually contemplated by the statute, and so the county court judge decided. The objections appear to be that Wright was not an undertaker at all; that in a popular sense he undertook the construction of the roof is admitted, that he employed Brady is admitted, that the accident happened in the course of Brady's employment under Wright in the construction of the building is also admitted, and the question is whether there is anything in the statute to show that Wright cannot be described within the meaning of the statute itself as undertaker. The whole point seems to turn upon the question whether the persons who are described as undertakers must be undertakers of the whole construction, and I suppose that the argument turns upon the word "the," because the interpretation section enacts that in the case of a building the undertaker means the person undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition. If by that is meant that in order to be an undertaker the person must have undertaken the construction of the entire building, it would be an intelligible construction, though it is not the one that I should place upon the section. But if, as the Court of Appeal seems to have held, an undertaker does include a person who sub-contracts for a substantial part of a building, then I do not understand why in this case Wright was not an undertaker by any of the ordinary particulars by which an undertaker can be described. Wright was certainly an undertaker. He undertook a substantial part of the work—namely, the roof. He had the control and management of that part of the work. He employed Brady as a labourer in that form of employment, and I do not understand why it is suggested that he was not an undertaker, unless it is suggested that in order to be an undertaker he must take upon himself the entire contract that has been made by another person. It seems to me that this would be an unreasonable construction of the statute, which in its language is sufficiently clear. To apply, therefore, the language of the statute itself to the facts of this case the employment here of Cooper & Crane was an undertaking by them, and they are are in their turn undertakers. But they contracted with Wright for the execution of certain work—namely, the roof. But by the language of the statute they are made liable if such work were executed by workmen not immediately employed by them, but on the work for which they contracted. They must pay compensation under the Act to those workmen in respect of any accident arising out of and in the course of such employment. That is the liability imposed upon Cooper & Crane, nor have they denied their liability, nor appealed against the judgment. But while providing that the building contractors shall be liable, the section goes on to provide that they are entitled to be indemnified by any other person who would have been liable independently of that section. Observe that it is not independent of the statute, but of the section. Whether the enactment is felicitously worded or not, when one looks at the section and the proviso together, I think that it can hardly be doubted that the meaning of it was that where part of the work is let out, although the builder of the entire structure shall in the first instance be liable for injury to the workmen employed by the sub-contractor, nevertheless he is not the actual employer, and the builders who are thus made liable for injuries to a workman not employed by them shall have a right of indemnity against the actual employer, between whom and themselves there was no relation except that of contractors. I doubt whether the attempted definition of the word undertaker has added anything to the interpretation of the statute. Cooper & Crane undertook the whole building, Wright undertook the construction of the roof. It is in course of the construction of the roof that Wright's labourer is injured, and if it is contended that the latter words of section 4 do not apply, this consequence would follow, that Wright, apart from that section, would not be liable to Brady, although Brady was employed by him and was engaged in a building operation; and if the argument is right, inasmuch as apart from that section Cooper & Crane would not be liable at all, the workman would have no remedy whatever; so that, though Wright should be employing a man in a trade considered dangerous by the Act, and though in the course of that employment Wright's labourer was injured, the labourer would have no remedy. It seems to me that this would reduce the legislation to an absurdity, and I cannot think that the Legislature could have intended such a result. Put this case. Suppose there was no one who undertook the construction of the whole building. The owner is not in any sense the undertaker. The different contractors undertook to construct, each a different substantial part of one building; there would be no person who undertook the whole building. Then suppose this very accident occurs. Who is liable? No one, if the objection is a good one; and yet one of the contractors would be an employer of a man who by this hypothesis is engaged in a work which the statute has regarded as dangerous: yet he would have no remedy. I think this cannot have been intended. I am not quite certain what is meant by Lord Brampton when he uses the phrase "the building owner." I do not understand whether he means a person who means to have a building built for him, or a person who himself undertakes the actual construction. I agree that the Act does not apply to a man who takes no such part at all, but by four or five different contracts places out the building to four or five different builders. If he did this, there would be no undertaker and no compensation. This seems to me to show that, looking at the whole purview of the section in question, it cannot have been intended.

Therefore I think the judgment of the court below is wrong, and I move your lordships that it be reversed with costs.

Appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of Hong Kong.

The facts sufficiently appear in the judgment of their lordships.

Upjohn, K.C., and Clayton, for the appellants.

Morton Smith for the respondent.

Lord DAVEY delivered the judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY): In this case the respondent, as administrator of the estate and effects of Ho I Shek, deceased, on the 13th of January, 1899, commenced an action in the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, against the appellants, for an account of certain alleged partnership transactions between the deceased and the appellants. The appellants (defendants in the action) pleaded the Statute of Limitations. An order was made on the 1st of December, 1899, that the issue of law with regard to the Statute of Limitations be tried before any other issues in the suit. The terms of the issue were: "Assuming that all the facts stated in the petition are true, is or is not the plaintiff's claim herein barred by the Statute of Limitations?"

The material facts and dates thus admitted for the purpose of argument are the following:

1. Ho I Shek died intestate on the 19th of June, 1880.

2. No administration to his estate was taken out until the month of November, 1886, when probate of an alleged will was granted by the Supreme Court in its probate jurisdiction to Ho Chik Fuk, the person named as executor in such alleged will, but Ho Chik Fuk did not intermeddle with the shares claimed in the alleged partnership transactions.

3. On the 17th of November, 1896, the alleged will was declared to be a forgery, and the probate was revoked.

4. On the 21st of June, 1897, administration was granted to the respondent. The relevant Statute of Limitations is contained in section 8 of Ordinance No. 13, 1864, whereby it was enacted that all actions of account must be commenced within six years after the cause of such actions. These are the same words as those of 21 Jac. 1, c. 16.

It was not seriously and could not be successfully disputed that, according to the well-established rule in English law, the statute runs against an intestate's estate from the date of the grant of letters of administration only. But the appellants contended—first, that, according to the law of the colony, a right of action accrued on the intestate's date to the registrar of the court, and the statute therefore ran from that date; or, alternatively, secondly, that the statute commenced to run from November, 1886, when the grant of probate of the forged will was made to Ho Chik Fuk.

On the trial of the issue the Supreme Court (Original Jurisdiction) decided in favour of the respondent, and its decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court (Appellate Jurisdiction). The present appeal is from the order of the latter court dated the 14th of March, 1900.

The argument of the present appellants in the first court was based chiefly on the grant of the probate of the forged will. Now it is quite true that, so long as that probate was in existence, the title of the grantee could not be impeached in any common law court, and he could have sued for and given a good discharge for any debt due to deceased. It is, indeed, questionable whether in the present case the alleged executor could have maintained an action against the present appellants, because the title of an executor is derived not from the probate, but from the will, and the probate when granted relates back to the death. As more than six years had elapsed between the date of the death and the grant of the probate, any right of action by Ho Chik Fuk under his probate (would, it is said) have been barred. The acting chief justice decided in the respondent's favour on this ground. It is replied by counsel at their lordships' bar that the cause of action vested, though the right to sue was barred. Without giving any opinion on this somewhat subtle point, their lordships think that the general argument may be disposed of on a broader ground. By the revocation the grant of probate was made void ab initio, for there was not in fact any will to be proved. It is now known that the apparent title of the so-called executor, although it could not be impeached in any court except the Court of Probate, was founded on a fiction and a fraud, and for the purposes of the present argument the probate must be treated as a nullity, and as never having had any real existence. The court cannot be bound to take notice when the facts are known, of an apparent right of action obtained by fraud. In the Court of Appeal no reliance appears to have been placed on this point, though it has been resuscitated before their lordships. The point there argued was the first contention of the appellants that a right of action vested in the registrar on the death of the intestate. This depends on certain sections of the Ordinances. By section 39 of Ordinance No. 8 of 1860, which was the one then in force, it was enacted that from and after the decease of any person dying intestate, and until letters of administration should be granted in respect of his estate and effects, the personal estate and effects of such person should be vested in the registrar of the Supreme Court. By section 1 of Ordinance No. 9 of 1870 it was declared that the registrar of the Supreme Court was ex officio official administrator under Ordinance No. 8 of 1860. And by following sections large powers were given to the official administrator for the purpose of enabling him to get in and protect the estate of the deceased, pending the grant of letters of administration, but no power to sue was conferred on him. It was argued that by these Ordinances all the rights of action included in the estate of the deceased were vested in the registrar or official administrator, and he therefore had, by implication, a statutory right to enforce them by action. But their lordships think that there is nothing in the sections to which they have been referred to overrule the established rule of law that no action can be maintained in respect of the estate of a deceased person except by a duly constituted administrator or executor. The sections referred to seem to place the registrar, pending the grant of letters of administration, in the position of a receiver, and to give him powers incident to such an office, but nothing more. And the result of the inquiry made by the Chief Justice as to the practice under section 39 of the Ordinance of 1860 confirms this view.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty that this appeal be dismissed, and the appellants will pay the costs of it.

Administration—Inoperative will—Intestacy—Advances to children—Hotchpot—Statute of Distributions (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10), s. 5—1 Will. 4, c. 40.

Where a will has become inoperative by reason of the sole executor and universal devisee and legatee dying in the lifetime of the testator, there is an intestacy within section 5 of the Statute of Distributions, and the provisions of that statute as to children sharing in the residue bringing their advances into hotchpot apply.

Decision of Buckley, J. (50 W. R. 91), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley J. (reported 50 W. R. 91).

The testator devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his wife absolutely and appointed her sole executrix. This constituted the whole will.

The testator died in September, 1900, a widower, having survived his wife, who died in 1892. Letters of administration with the will annexed had been granted to the two defendants.

The testator left several children, to some of whom he had made advances in his lifetime. Two of the children took out a summons for the determination of the question whether on the distribution of the residuary estate the persons entitled to share therein ought to bring into hotchpot sums of money or benefits given to them by the testator in his lifetime, and for administration of the real and personal estate.

Buckley, J., held that the testator had died intestate, and that the provisions of the Statute of Distributions applied as to children sharing in the residue bringing their advances into hotchpot.

Terrell, K.C., and J. G. Wood, for the appellants, used similar arguments to those in the court below.

Astbury, K.C., and Gatey; and Ingpen, K.C., and Brodie Cooper, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We think that this appeal must fail. It is true that there is a will by which the testator appointed an executrix and gave all his property to her. The executrix died in the lifetime of the testator, and the result is that there is no person in whose favour the will can operate. There is no one who can take beneficially. In those circumstances the Statute of Distributions seems to apply. It is not in accordance with the truth to say that this man has not died intestate.

In re CREDIT AND ASSURANCE GUARANTEE CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Capital—Reduction of capital—Shares paid up in varying amounts—Loss to be borne by all shares equally.

Where a scheme for reduction of capital is neither unjust nor inequitable, the court has jurisdiction to sanction it, even though it has the effect of varying the original rights of the shareholders.

Decision of Farwell, J. (50 W. R. 629, [1902] 2 Ch. 178), reversed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Farwell, J. (reported 50 W. R. 629, [1902] 2 Ch. 178), dismissing a petition for confirmation by the court of the reduction of capital.

The Credit Assurance and Guarantee Corporation (Limited) had a capital of £1,000,000, divided into 2,000 deferred shares of £1 each, and 99,800 ordinary shares of £10 each.

The deferred shares were all issued and fully paid, and 37,712 ordinary shares had been issued. Of the latter 2,621 had been forfeited, 1,123 had been issued under a duly registered contract with £5 paid up, and the remainder had been paid up to the extent of £2.

The memorandum of association provided that the profits should be applied after allowing for a reserve fund in paying first a dividend of 10 per cent. on the amount paid up for the time being, one half of the surplus to the holders of deferred shares, and the remaining moiety, subject to the payment thereout of such extra remuneration to the directors as might be determined in general meeting, should belong to the holders of ordinary shares.

By article 152 of the articles of association: "If the corporation shall be wound up and the surplus assets shall be insufficent to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that, as nearly as may be, the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up, or which ought to have been paid up, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions."

The corporation had power to reduce its capital by paying off capital or cancelling capital which had been lost or was unrepresented by available assets.

On the 12th of December, 1901, a special resolution was passed reducing the capital to £850,300, divided into 99,800 shares of £10 each, and 2,000 deferred shares of £1 each, and such reduction was to be effected by cancelling capital to the extent of £1 10s. in respect of each of the ordinary shares, which had been issued and were then outstanding, and by reducing the nominal amount of all the ordinary shares in the company's capital from £10 to £8 10s.

Farwell, J., held that the losses must be borne by the shareholders in the same proportion as the capital paid up on the shares.

The company appealed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We are all of opinion that this scheme would not work inequitably or unjustly. That being so, it is admitted, on the authority of the British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, that we have a discretion to sanction this scheme, and we do sanction it. In a case like this there must be very often something which leaves the rights of the parties not quite the same as before, but I think this scheme alters them as little as possible.

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Disbursement—Money paid to "Security for Costs Account"—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict c. 73), s. 37.

Moneys paid by a solicitor on behalf of a client to the "Security for Costs Account" in respect of discovery and interrogatories are not payments which the solicitors are bound to make either by law or custom. Consequently they cannot be treated as "disbursements" within section 37 of the Solicitors Act. 1843, but must go into the cash account as money lent by the solicitor to his client.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (50 W. R. 629), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 50 W. R. 629).

In a taxation as between solicitor and client the taxing-master disallowed items of £5 and £8 respectively paid by the solicitors to the "Security for Costs Account" under ord. 31, rr. 25, 26, and 27, upon application for discovery and interrogatories. Objection having been taken to the disallowance, the taxing-master gave as his reason in each case: "This deposit cannot be allowed, as the solicitors can obtain the return of it; the costs of doing this are subsequently allowed."

The effect of the disallowance of these items was that more than one-sixth of the bill was taxed off.

The solicitors took out a summons to review the taxation.

Kekewich, J., held that the payments were made by the solicitor in his professional duty and were "disbursements" within section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, under the rule laid down by Lord Langdale in In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603. He accordingly referred the bill back to the taxing-master, but gave leave to appeal.

The client appealed.

E. W. Hansell, for the appellant.

Humphreys, for the solicitors.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. — We think that this payment, which was really payment into court by way of partial security for part of the costs, ought to be entered in the cash account and not treated as a disbursement. To my mind we are simply applying the rule laid down in In re Remnant, which, as everyone admits, must govern this question. If we look at the certificate given by the taxing-master which is set out in the report of that case we see that this payment does not come within the rule there laid down. We are of opinion that this payment is not one which the solicitors were bound either in law or by custom to make. The solicitors in fact provided the money to pay the £5 into court under ord. 31, r. 26, but that was simply money lent by them to their client. We think that the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In principle this payment cannot be distinguished from any sum which is ordered to be paid into court as security to enable a person to proceed with an action. If a client is out of the jurisdiction and money is ordered to be paid into court as security, the solicitor is not bound to find that money, but if he does, it will be on behalf of the client, while the money in court will be the client's money. Such a payment is merely money lent by the solicitor to the client and ought to go into the cash account. It is not a disbursement within the rule; it is not a sum which either by law or custom the solicitor would be bound to pay as between him and his client. The argument that if a solicitor did not provide this money he would be liable for negligence is unfounded. The solicitor is not bound to find this money: he could rightly apply to the client to find it, and if the client did not supply the money to enable the proper steps to be taken in the action, the solicitor would not be guilty of negligence if the proper steps were not taken.

Licensing justices, having had their attention called by the county licensing committee to the large number of licensed houses in their district, appointed a committee to make inquiries and to report upon the matter. The committee collected statistics and inspected the licensed houses in the district and made a report, which was adopted at a meeting of the justices. At the general annual licensing meeting the chairman of the justices, on behalf of the justices, objected to the renewal of all the licences in the district, stating that the reason why the justices thus raised objection to the renewals was that every one of the licensees might bring evidence before them, and that they would thus be enabled to decide the cases with fairness and justice. The objections were accordingly adjourned, and the clerk to the justices, by their direction, served notice of objection, stating the grounds, upon each licensee

Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus to the licensing justices of Farnham, Surrey, to hold a further adjournment of the general annual licensing meeting, and to hear and determine according to law an application for the renewal of an alehouse licence to Mrs. J. E. Smith.

The case is reported 50 W. R. 573.

There were appeals in eight other cases also which depended upon the result of the first appeal.

The grounds upon which the rule nisi was obtained were (1) that the justices were not entitled themselves to object to the renewal of a licence; (2) that, if they were so entitled, they were not entitled to adjudicate upon their own objections; (3) that they were precluded from sitting and adjudicating because they had previously collected evidence and viewed the house, and had prejudiced the case; (4) that one of the justices, Mr. Bentall, was a member of a body actively engaged in opposing the renewal of licences, and had been a party to a resolution passed at a public meeting of the Surrey Congregational Union in opposition to the renewal of these licences.

The affidavits stated that in May, 1901, a special meeting of the justices of the Farnham division was held to consider a letter from the clerk of the peace of the county of Surrey, addressed to the clerk to the justices of the Farnham division, stating that the attention of the county licensing committee had been called to the large number of licences in the parishes of Farnham and Farnham rural; that there appeared to be one licensed house for every 155 of the population, which was largely in excess of any other parish in the county; and that the committee were of opinion that some steps should be taken whereby the licences of a substantial number of such houses should be discontinued; and inviting the justices to consider this question at their next annual licensing meeting. At the meeting a committee was appointed to consider the statistics referred to in the letter and to report upon the subject. The committee collected statistics as to population, number of licences, and other information, comparing the Farnham division with other divisions in the county, and the county with neighbouring counties in the matter of the ratio of population to licences. At a meeting of the justices for the division on the 13th of July, 1901, the committee made a report. The report was unanimously adopted, and the committee were authorized to inquire into the condition, position, and circumstance of each licensed house in the Farnham urban district. The committee then directed the clerk to the justices to send to the owners of licensed houses and the licence-holders in the division the following letter: "The attention of the justices of the Farnham petty sessional division having been called by the county licensing committee to the excessive number of licences in the division, a fact which cannot, in the opinion of the justices, be disputed, and the justices having appointed a committee to make inquiries in connection with the matter with a view to a reduction in the first place of licences in the Farnham urban district, where such excess is most pronounced, I am directed by the justices to so inform you, and to suggest that anything you may desire to say upon the subject addressed to me will receive their best consideration." The committee inspected the fully-licensed houses in the Farnham urban district. Except in one instance, the inquiries were made and information was obtained only from the licensee or the person actually in charge of the licensed premises at the time of the inspection, which person was in every case the wife or daughter of the licensee. On the 6th of February, 1902, the committee made a report to the justices which was headed "Private and Confidential.—Proposed Reduction of Licences in the Division," and it contained tabulated particulars as to all the licensed houses, and recommendations as to the procedure at the forthcoming general annual licensing meeting. The justices held a meeting to consider this report and adopted it, and resolved that their clerk should obtain the presence of witnesses at the general annual licensing meeting in support of the report. On the 1st of March, 1902, the general annual licensing meeting was held, a copy of the report having been placed by the justices in the hands of counsel for the applicants. The justices present included certain members of the committee above-mentioned. When the first application for a renewal was reached a Mr. Hayes rose in court and stated that he objected to the renewal of all the licences in Farnham urban. The chairman of the justices thereupon directed Mr. Hayes to give the requisite seven days' notice of his objection for the adjourned meeting on the 14th of March. The chairman then, on behalf of the majority of the justices, made objection to the renewal of the forty-five alehouse licences in the Farnham urban district, and the applications for renewals of such licences were directed to stand adjourned to the adjourned meeting, the chairman stating publicly that the reason why the justices thus raised objection to the houses was in order that every one of the licensees might have equal opportunities of bringing evidence before them, and that the justices might be thus enabled to decide such cases with perfect justice and fairness. Two of the justices (Mr. George Goodall and Mr. Gould, K.C.) stated that they dissented from the course which was being pursued, and from the whole plan of procedure of the justices in reference to the alehouse licences, and Mr. Goodall retired and took no further part in the proceedings. Mr. Gould, however, continued to sit, and took part in the proceedings. The justices instructed their deputy clerk to serve formal notice in each case requiring the licensee to attend in person at the adjourned licensing meeting and stating the grounds of objection, which were based on the report of the committee; and such notices were served accordingly. In the case of ten of the licensed alehouses notices of objection were also given by Mr. Hayes. At the adjourned licensing meeting on the 14th of March counsel on behalf of the holders of licences who had been served with notice of objection took the objections that the justices themselves sitting at the general annual licensing meeting were not entitled under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, to object to the renewal of licences; and that the justices who had been parties to the service of the notices of objection were disqualified from sitting and adjudicating, upon the ground that such justices were in fact the prosecutors or complainants, and could not adjudicate in their own cause; and upon the ground of "bias" arising from their resolution as to the renewal of licences, and in consequence of having received and acted upon the report of the committee as to the proposed reduction of licences in the division, and having been thereby influenced by statements not upon oath. The justices overruled the objections and proceeded to hear the evidence on oath in the several cases, and in the result they refused to renew nine licences. It appeared that all the houses in question had been licensed for many years and they had all been properly conducted. In his affidavit in answer to the rule the chairman of the justices stated that the reasons which actuated him, and which he knew also influenced his colleagues, were that the justices had arrived at no decision prior to their decision at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting as to whether to renew or not to renew any of the licences in the district, and that in causing notices requiring the personal attendance of licensees to be served they were not in any way taking sides or committing themselves to any particular view as to the propriety or otherwise of renewing any licence, but had merely taken the steps which the statute imposed upon them of putting matters into proper train for fully considering, after due notice to the applicants, each case upon its merits, and upon sworn evidence which alone they intended to have regard to; and that, in arriving at his decision to refuse the renewal of the licences in question, he did not entertain or take into consideration, nor was his decision based upon or affected by any evidence, matter, or thing, save the evidence given upon oath and the admissions made in open court during the hearing of the applications.

The Divisional Court discharged the rules, holding that licensing justices might themselves give notice of objection, under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, to the renewal of a licence, and that in the circumstances the justices who took the objection to the renewals were not disqualified from adjudicating upon the objection.

The licence-holders appealed.

By section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872: "Where a licensed person applies for a renewal of his licence the following provisions shall have effect: (1) He need not attend in person at the general annual licensing meeting unless he is required by the licensing justices so to attend; (2) the justices shall not entertain any objection to the renewal of such licence, or take any evidence with respect to the renewal thereof, unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of such licence has been served on such holder not less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting; provided that the licensing justices may, notwithstanding that no notice has been given, on an objection being made, adjourn the granting of any licence to a future day, and require the attendance of the holder of the licence on such day, when the case will be heard and the objection considered, as if the notice hereinbefore prescribed had been given; (3) the justices shall not receive any evidence with respect to the renewal of such licence which is not given on oath. Subject as aforesaid, licences shall be renewed and the powers and discretion of justices relative to such renewal shall be exercised as heretofore." By section 26 of the Licensing Act, 1874, it is enacted (inter alia) that "a notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of a licence served under section 42 of the principal Act" (the Licensing Act, 1872) "shall not be valid unless it states in general terms the grounds on which the renewal of such licence is to be opposed."

June 23.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court discharging a rule for a mandamus addressed to the licensing justices of the Farnham Petty Sessional Division of the county of Surrey, calling upon them to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to hold a further adjournment of the annual licensing meeting and to hear and determine according to law certain applications for the renewal of licences. The case is one of importance, as the question raised goes to the root of the law and practice in the matter of the renewal of licences. The circumstances are shortly these. In February, 1891, a letter was addressed by the clerk of the peace of the county to the clerk of the Farnham justices informing him that the attention of the County Licensing Committee had been called to the large number of licences existing in the parishes of Farnham and Farnham rural, pointing out that the proportion was largely in excess of any other parish in the county, and stating that it was the opinion of the committee—that is, the confirming committee—that steps should be taken whereby the licences of a substantial number of such houses should be discontinued, and inviting the justices to consider this question at their next annual licensing meeting. The justices, as appears by the affidavit of their chairman, addressed themselves to the consideration of the question raised by this letter, and appointed a committee to consider the statistics referred to in the letter. Upon the report of this committee, which was unanimously adopted, the committee were authorized to inquire into the condition, position, and circumstances of each licensed house in the Farnham district, which they accordingly proceeded to do—first, by framing questions addressed to the owners of the houses, and afterwards by personal inspection, the results of which were duly reported to the licensing justices, with recommendations which were adopted by them with one dissentient. It is clear from their report that they were of opinion that the only fair and satisfactory way of dealing with the questions was to cause objections to be served on all the owners of licensed houses, so that the case of each of them might be formally inquired into, and for this purpose authority was given to the justices' clerk to object to such renewals on the general ground that the houses were not required, and also on special grounds set out in the notice. These objections were signed by the clerk, stating that he was acting under the instructions of the justices present at the annual licensing meeting At the general annual licensing meeting held on the 1st of March a certain Mr. Hayes objected to the renewal all the licences in urban Farnham, and the chairman of the justices made objection to the renewal of the forty-five licences in the Farnham urban district, stating that the reason why the justices thus raised objections was "in order that every one of the licensees might have equal opportunities of giving evidence before them, and the justices might thus be enabled to decide with justice and fairness," and the meeting was accordingly adjourned until the 14th of March following, and instructions were given to Mr. Mason, the deputy clerk, to serve formal notice in each case, requiring the licensees to attend in person and stating the grounds of objection. When the cases came on for hearing, evidence on oath was given in support of the objections, and questions were put by the chairman based on the facts collected by the committee. A copy of the report itself had been placed by the justices in the hands of counsel for the applicants.

The rule nisi was obtained on the ground that the justices were incapacitated from dealing with the question of the renewal of the licences, inasmuch as they were at once parties and judges, that they had acted upon evidence not taken upon oath as provided by sub-section 3 of section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and that they must be deemed in law to be biassed on the ground that they had predetermined to refuse the renewal of some of the licences and had already inquired into the cases. There was also a particular objection to one of the magistrates, which I will deal with, if necessary, later on.

In considering how far these points are material it is necessary to understand precisely what is the character in which the justices are required by law to deal with questions of renewal. Whatever views may have been held as to their position before Boulter v. Kent Justices, 46 W. R. 114, [1897] A. C. 556, was decided in the House of Lords, it is now clear that in the granting or refusing of renewals the justices do not sit as a court, and that the transaction itself is in no sense a lis to which there are parties. The objector is not a "party"; his function is merely to inform the mind of the tribunal to enable it rightly to exercise its discretion whether to grant the privilege of a licence or not. This point is so material to the true appreciation of the cardinal consideration in these cases that I propose to read one or two passages from the judgment of Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Lord Herschell in the case I have just referred to. Lord Halsbury, [1897] A. C., at p. 562, said: "The difference between the procedure of a court and of the licensing meeting is not only one of nomenclature. Where justices are acting as a court of any sort they must proceed according to the regular rules which are applicable to all courts of justice; but in respect of an application for a licence or its refusal, they may and constantly do receive representations not on oath." He then quotes Lord Kenyon, who in 1790, in the case of Rex v. Downs, 3 T. R. 560, when holding a licence bad because it was granted at a private meeting, did not rely upon the general principle that all courts of justice must be open, but upon the ground that the statute directed it, and added that the construction of the then statute law was advantageous to the public because it was "of importance to the public that licences of this sort should be granted openly and not by stealth, in order that they may have an opportunity of objecting to the granting of these licences to particular persons on the ground of unfitness." He adds: "The Acts referred to by the learned judges were repealed by the Act of 1828. But a careful distinction appears to me always to have been reserved between the same bodies acting as a court and deciding questions of licensing at a licensing meeting of the justices." Further on, [1897] A. C. at p. 564, he says: "If I am right in the distinction I have drawn between a magistrates' meeting for licensing purposes and courts, although consisting of the same persons, it would be the height of absurdity to suppose that the Legislature intended to include in the definition and to make applicable to that definition persons who were in fact justices of the peace, but who in the particular matter here referred to—namely, 'licensing'—were not occupying the position of judges at all, but were exercising the discretionary jurisdiction as to how many public-houses they would permit in a district, or what persons should carry them on." Lord Herschell, at p. 569, said as follows: "Persons objecting to the grant of a licence are not, I think, parties to the proceedings on the application in any proper sense of the term. The question is not one inter partes at all. The justices have an absolute discretion to determine, in the interest of the public, whether a licence ought to be granted, and every member of the public may object to the grant on public grounds, apart from any individual right or interest of his own. The applicant seeks a privilege. A member of the public who objects merely informs the mind of the court to enable it rightly to exercise its discretion whether to grant that privilege or not. A decision that a licence should not be granted is a decision that it would not be for the public benefit to grant it. It is not a decision that the objector has a right to have it refused. It is not, properly speaking, a determination in his favour. It is, I think, a fallacy to treat the refusal as necessarily induced by a particular objector. Every member of the local community might object. Would they all, then, become 'the other party'? There is, in truth, no lis, no controversy inter partes, and no decision in favour of one of them and against the other, unless, indeed, the entire public are regarded as the other party, for if a licence be refused on the ground that it was not needed to supply the legitimate wants of the neighbourhood, the decision is really in favour of the public at large. The provision contained in section 2 seems, then, to me an additional reason for holding that an appeal from the 'act' of the justices in refusing a licence is not an appeal from a 'conviction or order' of a court of summary jurisdiction."

The standard, therefore, to be applied in determining whether justices have incapacitated themselves from dealing with the renewal of licences is not in any sense that applicable to judges dealing with litigation. Moreover, their position in relation to the right of objecting is not res integra. Since Reg. v. Farquhar, L. R. 9 Q. B. 258, 22 W. R. Dig. 38, at all events, decided in 1874, the practice has been that they might, where circumstances required it, themselves make or cause to be made an objection, at all events provided they adjourned for the purpose of hearing it and caused the necessary notice to be served requiring attendance upon a future day. I think this practice was founded on a true view of the law for reasons which I will state hereafter, but, whether it is or not, I think it has been treated as law for nearly thirty years, and ought not to be now disturbed. In Reg. v. Eales, 42 L. T. Rep. 735, 28 W. R. Dig. 129, decided in 1880, it is thus referred to by Cockburn, L.C.J., at p. 737. He says: "And although by a practice founded upon a dictum in the case of Reg. v. Farquhar an objection may be made by the justices themselves, it must be upon one of those four grounds" (it was a case under the Act of 1869) "and the particular ground of such objection should be notified to the appellant in order that an opportunity may be given to meet it." He there treats the practice as established and in no way dissents from it. It has been treated as law in more than one case referred to in argument, and was formally decided to be so in 1898 in Baxter v. Leche, 79 L. T. Rep. 138, 47 W. R. Dig. 99. It is true that a different view was taken by Hawkins, J., in Reg. v. Justices of Anglesea, 65 L. J. M. C. 12, 44 W. R. Dig. 89. But in the same case that learned judge upheld a decision based upon a notice given by the chief constable apparently at the instance of the licensing justices themselves. And on the general question whether there is such incompatibility between the position of the justices who adjudicate and that of an objector that the two cannot be combined, it seems to me to be immaterial whether the objection is made personally by the justices or by somebody else at their instance, and from the reported cases it seems to be a very common practice and one that has never been questioned for the objection to be made at the instance of the justices, if not in their name. The observations of Hawkins, J., in the case referred to are very valuable as to the discretion of justices, and their right to discuss among themselves matters affecting the expediency of renewals, and their right to take steps to have a full investigation of them. On the same point Lord Halsbury, in Sharp v. Wakefield, 39 W.R. 561, [1891] A. C. 173, at p. 178, says: "By the express language of the statute, which is still the governing statute, the grant of a licence is expressly within the discretion of the magistrates. For the reasons to be stated presently, I am of opinion that no legislation has ever altered that provision; but, if one were to argue a priori, what possible reason could there be for limiting the discretion of the justices to the first grant of the licence? It is not denied that for the purpose of the original grant it is within the power and even the duty of the magistrates to consider the wants of the neighbourhood with reference both to its population, means of inspection by the proper authorities, and so forth." The key to the position appears to be that the justices in dealing with licences are not a judicial body; that they are deliberately appointed because from their circumstances they are likely to have local knowledge; and it cannot have been the intention of the Legislature that they should divest themselves of all such knowledge in dealing with questions of licences. It would be a great public misfortune if they were bound to determine the question merely on materials provided by the individual who happened to object, and were constrained to sit by in silence although they had reason to suppose that there were very good grounds which ought to be inquired into before the matter was decided; and yet, if they were debarred from making an objection or causing one to be made, these facts never could be inquired into, and the licence would have to be disposed of without the necessary investigation. I think, therefore, that the practice is not only inveterate but is founded on a true view of the function of justices in relation to the matter. If that be so, the standard to be applied in considering the question of bias must be one which admits the right of the justices to be at one and the same time objectors and judges in the sense in which they are judges in such matters, and therefore the standard laid down in such cases as Leeson v. General Medical Council, 38 W. R. 303, 43 Ch. D. 366, and Allinson v. General Medical Council, 42 W. R 289, [1894] 1 Q. B. 750, is not applicable to them. They fall outside their principle for two reasons—first, that they are empowered by law to fill the two capacities; and secondly, that, rightly understood, the two capacities are not incompatible in the sense in which in those cases they were assumed to be incompatible, because, as has already been pointed out, in making the objection they do not in any sense become parties to the litigation or anything analogous thereto. They are simply taking the only or the best available course to enable matters vital to the exercise of their discretion to be formally and fairly considered openly before them. Assuming, therefore, what I regard as clearly established by the evidence, that what was done by the justices in this case was honestly done to enable them to secure a full investigation of the facts for the purpose of avoiding the injustice which might arise if they had to deal with the question without such materials, and upon one or more isolated applications only, I think they were within their rights in doing what they did, and were not thereby debarred from sitting and deciding upon the question of renewals. Their original and fundamental discretion in the matter of granting or refusing applications for new licences remains when they are invited to deal with renewals, except so far, and only so far, as it is conditioned by section 42 of the Act of 1872, as amended by section 26 of the Act of 1874, which relates to procedure only: see Sharp v. Wakefield, [1891] A.C., at p. 182. In my opinion the course the justices took involved no predetermination of any point, but merely secured a full and informed discussion of the whole subject. It is not denied that on the hearing all the formalities of the 42nd section were complied with. The respondents, indeed, contend that the justices could have exercised their discretion without complying with these conditions, but I think the case of Evans v. Conway Justices, 48 W. R. 577, [1900] 2 Q. B. 224, debars them from advancing that contention in this court. I agree, therefore, with the decision of the Divisional Court, and it is not necessary to discuss in detail the numerous cases which were referred to in argument before us.

With regard to the special objection urged against Mr. Bentall on the ground that he was present at a meeting at which certain resolutions were passed upon which he did not vote, I think it cannot be sustained. It is not necessary to express an opinion upon the technical objections urged against the granting of a mandamus in the form prayed for. The appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: The grounds relied upon in support of the appeal were—(1) That the justices were prohibited from being themselves the objectors to the renewal of the licence; (2) that they were disabled from adjudicating upon the grounds of objection; and (3) that their decision was invalidated on the ground of personal interest in the result, or manifest bias against the applicant. As to the first point, if the jurisdiction of the justices depended upon the Act of 1828, there would seem to be no question that objections to a renewal might be made by the bench sitting in open court, and that upon giving the applicant the opportunity of being heard, the justices had an absolute discretion to grant or refuse the renewal But it was argued that the discretion of the justices could no longer be exercised freely, and that their jurisdiction was fettered by the provisions of the Act of 1872. Attention was called to the language of section 42, and it was contended that the jurisdiction of the magistrates depended upon the objection being made by someone who was not a member of the bench. No reason was given for this supposed change of the law. It would matter nothing to the applicant from what quarter the objection came. A third person would be entitled to object without giving a reason and might then withdraw and be no party to the subsequent proceedings. The grant of a renewal was for the magistrates only, and would seem to depend in every case upon the result of the subsequent inquiry upon sworn testimony. But it was said that the inference from the language of the section was clear, and that the object of the Act was to provide for a new method of procedure in all cases. Section 42, as modified by the later Act of 1874, is in the following terms: [His lordship read the section.] Sub-section 1 would seem to assume that an objection might be made from the bench, and that the applicant might be required to attend in person upon having proper notice given him in accordance with sub-section 2. He would thus learn the grounds upon which his attendance was considered by the justices to be necessary. The proviso in sub-section 2 leads to the same conclusion. It would appear, therefore, that the justices may entertain any objections to the renewal, whether made previously or not, and take evidence upon them. Further, even if, contrary to what would seem to be the true meaning of the statute, sub-sections 1 and 2 must be taken to apply only when the bench are not the objectors, the last clause in the section preserves their former powers and discretion. They continue to possess the authority conferred upon them by the Act of 1828. This is in accordance with the valuable judgment of Hawkins, J., in the case of Reg. v. Anglesea Justices. I see no reason to doubt the authority of the cases referred to by the Master of the Rolls, which sanction the conclusion that objections may be made from the bench in open court, and may afterwards be investigated upon proper notice to the applicant to attend and answer the objections. The argument for the appellant would involve this consequence, that the magistrates, if there were no objector, would be bound to renew the licence, though they knew or had been furnished with reliable information that the application ought to be refused.

But then it was said that, even though objections might be made from the bench, the justices, who were parties to the notice to the applicant to attend, could not afterwards sit and adjudicate upon the application. The proceedings would have been regular under the Act of 1828, and it seems to me that there is no ground for saying it was impliedly forbidden by the Act of 1872. But it was urged that the inquiry was in the nature of the trial of an action between the justices and the applicant, and that those who had instituted the proceedings could not adjudicate upon what was described as their own cause. But, as has been laid down in the cases referred to by the Master of the Rolls, in licensing cases there is no lis, and nothing in the nature of a suit or a prosecution. The duty of the justices is to arbitrate impartially, not between themselves and the holder of the licence, but between that person and the public. The fact that the magistrates had obtained the report which was so much complained of by the counsel for the appellant was the ground upon which we are asked to say that the justices had made themselves parties to the opposition in each case, and were attempting to adjudicate on their own behalf. The form of the report, it was said, showed that the justices must have arrived at the conclusion that the appellant's premises were not required, and that the subsequent inquiry was only designed to support a foregone decision. But I am wholly unable to adopt this reasoning. The report seems to me to contain no more than the information necessary to enable the magistrates to enter upon the consideration of the question whether there were too many licensed houses in the district. The document was neutral in its character, and contained no indication of an opinion as to the claim for renewal by the appellant or any other occupier of licensed premises. The justices seem to have acted with perfect fairness, and to have been guided to the conclusions at which they arrived, not by anything contained in the report, but by the sworn evidence laid before them. The objection that the justices had what was described as an interest in the result of each inquiry took another shape in the suggestion that they were shown to have been influenced by bias. There is no ground for any such conclusion. The magistrates proceeded from first to last with commendable care, and seem to me to have no other motive than the desire of honourable men to discharge their duties faithfully. With reference to Mr. Bentall, I agree that his temporary presence on the bench did not invalidate the proceedings. He was not shown to have committed himself to any opinion on the subject of inquiry, or to have taken sides, as was suggested, against the appellants. It is not necessary to deal with the technical objections to the application for a mandamus which were raised by the learned counsel for the respondents.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: In this case I should be content to say that, for the reasons assigned by the Master of the Rolls, I agree that the appeal must be dismissed. But having regard to the great importance of the questions which have been raised as to the precise powers and duties of justices with respect to renewals of licences, it is right that I should state shortly, in my own words, the conclusions at which I have arrived. I do not propose to restate the facts. It cannot be disputed that, under the Act of 1828, the justices had an absolute discretion to grant or refuse applications for new licences and applications for the renewal of old licences. Their functions in this matter were administrative rather than judicial, and they were entitled to rely upon their general knowledge of the needs of the locality as well as upon any evidence which might be adduced. The Act of 1828 is still the governing statute, except so far as it has been modified by the Acts of 1872 and 1874. With respect to new licences, there are very material modifications to which it is not necessary to refer in detail. With respect to renewals, the material section — viz., section 42 of the Act of 1872, as amended by section 26 of the Act of 1874—need alone be considered. Now, in two cases the effect of this section has been discussed in the House of Lords. In Sharp v. Wakefield it was held that the old discretion of the justices under the Act of 1828 was not affected, and that section 42 only dealt with procedure. The attempt to establish a vested right to the renewal of a licence, except on some ground personal to the applicant, failed. In Boulter v. Kent Justices it was held that justices in granting or refusing to grant an application for renewal are not a court, and that the objector contemplated by section 42 is not a litigant, and that in short there is no lis. Now in the face of those decisions it has been strenuously argued before us that the effect of this section is to prevent the justices from exercising their discretion and discharging the duties imposed upon them in the public interest unless some outsider appears and objects to a renewal, or, in other words, that they are powerless themselves to require the attendance of the licence-holder with a view of considering whether his licence should be renewed. I cannot adopt this view. It seems to me that there is no reason why the justices should not on their own initiative direct the licence-holder to attend on a subsequent day, inform him of the grounds of objection, and then deal with the matter in due course at the adjourned meeting. The view has been repeatedly expressed and acted upon since 1874 that the justices may themselves start an objection. This conclusion seems to me necessary to enable the magistrates to perform their duty. The House of Lords held in Boulter's case that there is no lis between an objector and a licence-holder, and no right to recover the costs occasioned by an unsuccessful objection. In short, I regard the objection as merely a mode of informing the licence-holder that his case will be considered and that he must be prepared to deal with certain specified points. It is not necessary to consider whether the justices can act solely upon their own local knowledge—for example, as to the number of public-houses compared with the population, or whether they must in all cases act upon sworn evidence. In the present case the evidence was all taken upon oath. If I am right in the view that magistrates may themselves take, or direct their officer or agent to take, objection, all difficulty seems to be removed. It cannot be wrong to obtain careful and accurate information before taking, and with a view to taking, such objection. No question of bias as against a particular licence-holder arises. In making the preliminary investigation and considering whether the number of licensed houses was in excess of the needs of the district the justices were simply preparing to discharge the important duties, mainly administrative, imposed upon them by the Act of 1828. In directing all the licence-holders to be served, and in taking sworn evidence upon each separate application, they seem to me to have acted with praiseworthy care. They were not adjudicating upon any rights. They were not prosecutors. In truth, there was no prosecution. They were only determining whether in the public interest a lucrative privilege should or should not be conferred. There is no ground for suggesting that they exercised their discretion capriciously or without regard to the circumstances of each individual case or without considering the requirements of the locality. The separate objection taken to Mr. Bentall may be disposed of very shortly. He was present at a meeting of the Surrey Congregational Union at which a mild and harmless resolution was passed expressing satisfaction at the efforts of the Farnham magistrates to reduce the number of licensed houses. He took no part in the proceedings, and I think it idle to suggest that this in any way precluded him from acting as a licensing justice. I may add that in fact he retired directly it was brought to his mind that any objection could be taken to his presence. For these reasons I agree with the Divisional Court that the rule for a mandamus must be discharged.

CONOLEY v. QUICK AND OTHERS. (a.)

Will — Charity — Gift to voluntary association for charitable object—Failure of gift.

A testator directed his trustees to sell leasehold and freehold property and to divide the proceeds in legacies to certain individuals named "or their successors" or "his successor."

Held, that the gifts were not given to the individuals for their own benefit, but for charitable objects, and therefore failed.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an originating summons to determine certain questions arising under the will of a testator who died on the 6th of July, 1888.

The facts are set forth in the judgment of Farwell, J.

P. B. Abraham, for the plaintiff.

F. A. Milne, A. L. Ingpen, C. E. Shebbeare, A. H. Withers, and Bischoff, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The testator made his will dated the 1st of January, 1884, and thereby, after certain legacies to his wife, gave the rents of his freehold and leasehold estates to her during her life, and after her death he directed his trustees to sell the property, "and the proceeds to be divided in legacies as follows: To Mary Owen, Honora McAuliffe, Annie Clarke, Nazareth-house, Hammersmith, or their successors, the sum of £400. To Eliza McHenry, Margaret Libaud, of the Convent of the Assumpton, Wellington-road, Bromley-by-Bow, or their successors, the sum of £300. To the Rev. Frederick Bampfield, superior of the Institute for Boys and Girls, Barnet, Herts, or his successor, the sum of £100. To the Rev. Lord Archibald Douglas, superior of the St. Vincent's Home for Boys, Harrow-road, London, W., or his successor, the sum of £100. To the Rev. Francis Verhagen, of the Franciscan Friary, Stratford, Essex, or his successor, the sum of £300. To Lizzie Mulhearn, Burleigh-road, Upton, in her own right, the sum of £100. To Kate Dore, of 2, Bexley-villas, Carnarvon-road, Stratford, Essex, in her own right, £100. To Robert Dore, 2, Bexley-villas, Carnarvon-road, Stratford, Essex, the sum of £100. To the Rev. Cornelius Keens, Corpus Christi Church, Midon-lane, or his successor, the sum of £19 19s." The testator made a codicil, dated the 7th of September, 1885, to his will, and thereby gave the plaintiff a legacy.

He died on the 6th of July, 1888, without issue, leaving his wife surviving him. She died in January, 1901, and the defendant Ada Boffee is her legal personal representative. The next of-kin and heir-at-law of the testator are not known, but the defendant Ada Boffee, whose interest is the same as theirs, sufficiently represents their interests for the purposes of this argument. The testator's property consisted of six leasehold and one freehold house. If, therefore, the objects of any of the gifts in his will are charitable, such gifts will fail.

The questions to be decided are (1) Are the gifts to the several individuals named, "or their successors," or "his successor," legacies given to the individuals for their own benefit, or are they given to the holders of offices for the benefit of the associations in which they hold office? and, if the latter, (2) Are the objects of such associations charitable? It is necessary to consider each gift separately. The first is "to Mary Owen, Honora McAuliffe, Annie Clarke, Nazareth-house, Hammersmith, or their successors." Mary Owen, Honora McAuliffe, and Annie Clarke were at the date of the will and of the death of the testator members and holders of official positions in a religious community known as "the Poor Sisters of Nazareth," but since 1891 Miss McAuliffe has held no office. This community is a society of Roman Catholic ladies voluntarily living together in a state of celibacy for the purpose of sanctifying their own souls by prayer and pious contemplation, and also with the object of affording permanent homes for aged and infirm poor persons of both sexes without distinction of creed or nationality and homes for incurable and orphan children. The community own several houses which are vested in trustees, but the three ladies named do not by themselves hold any of such houses as such trustees, but only in conjunction with others. Members of the community are bound in common to hand over any money coming to them for the use and benefit of the community. Money given to the community generally is applied partly in keeping up the houses of the community and partly for their charitable purposes The testator was acquainted with Mary Owen and Honora McAuliffe, but not with Annie Clarke. Her name was supplied to him by some member of the community when he expressed a desire to benefit the community and asked in what names the legacy should be given. In my opinion, the legacy is given to the three ladies as holders of offices and for the benefit of the association in which they held office. The primary meaning of "successors" is persons in succession. The persons named were known to the testator to be holders of offices in the association, and the only succession to which he can refer is the succession to those offices. The persons named are not intended to take any personal benefit, but are designated only as the then holders of office, and the gift to them depended on their continuance in such office. The decision of Kindersley, V.C., in Thornber v. Wilson, 3 W. R. 388, 3 Drew. 245, is an authority in favour of this view, and his subsequent decision on another gift in the same will in 7 W. R. 24, 4 Drew. 350, is even stronger. In the latter case there was a devise (subject to a term of seven years) of real estate on trust to sell and pay the net residue of the proceeds of sale "to the minister of the Roman Catholic chapel at Kendal." [His lordship read p. 351 from the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, and continued:] In the case before me the widow has a preceding life interest, and the Vice-Chancellor's concluding observations therefore apply to this case also. So, too, in Smart v. Prujean, 6 Ves. 560, at p. 567, Lord Eldon expressed his opinion that a legacy of £100 for such purposes as the superior of the convent or her successor should judge most expedient, being given in that character was sufficient to show it was for a superstitious use. The mere description of the legatee as the holder of an office is not, of course, sufficient to raise any real inference. Thus in Doe v. Aldridge, 4 T. R. 264, a devise to the Rev. A. A., "late of Amesbury, but now preacher at the meeting-house in Lyndhurst," for life was held a gift to him for his own benefit, and in Donnellan v. O'Neill, 18 W. R. 1188, Ir. Rep. 5 Eq. 523, where the devise was to Cardinal Cullen, and in case of his death to the Roman Catholic Archbishop for the time being of Dublin, and to his heirs, &c., "absolutely for his and their own use and benefit," the Vice-Chancellor treated the devise as a clear gift for the personal benefit of the devisees. I am further of opinion that the objects of the association are charitable, and that the gifts, therefore, fail. The case is indistinguishable from that of the Sisters of Charity of St. Paul at Selley Oak in Cocks v. Manners, 19 W. R. 1055, L. R. 12 Eq. 574. The case of the aged and infirm poor and of incurable and orphan children is the outward and visible object of the association of the Poor Sisters of Nazareth, and this admirable object is not rendered less charitable within the meaning of the Act of Elizabeth because the sisters also desire to sanctify their own souls by prayer and contemplation, whether such sanctification is regarded as concurrent with or assisted by their charitable work. The court can only look to the actual purpose aimed at by the association, and cannot inquire into the motives of the members of the association. The care of the aged poor and the like is a charity within the Act, whether the persons who devote their lives to it are actuated by the love of God, a desire for their own salvation, or by mere pique or disgust with the world. The legacy and share of residue, therefore, given for the Poor Sisters of Nazareth fail.

The next gift is to Eliza McHenry and Margaret Libaud, of the Convent of the Assumption, or their successors. These two ladies both held office in the community of the Little Sisters of the Assumption at the date of the will and of the death, but have held no office therein since 1891. This community is a society of Roman Catholic ladies voluntarily living together in a state of celibacy for the purpose of sanctifying their own souls by prayer and contemplation, and for the purpose of gratuitously nursing the sick of the poorest classes in their own homes. It is supported by voluntary contributions, which are expended in lodging, boarding, and maintaining the members thereof, I am unable to distinguish this gift also from that to the Sisters of St. Paul at Selley Oak in Cocks v. Manners. Indeed, I may read Vice-Chancellor Wickens's judgment with some immaterial omissions as applicable to the present case: "The community is in point of law a voluntary association for the purpose of nursing the sick, and I cannot distinguish it in this respect from any of the numerous voluntary associations established in London, such as the Scripture Readers, Home Missionaries, or Anglican Sisters of Mercy, in which zealous persons unite for the purpose of performing charitable functions, taking out of the funds of the association so much as is necessary for their own wants, and extending their operations as their means permit." And he distinguishes the gift in that case to the Selley Oak community from another gift in the same will to a Dominican convent, on the ground that the sole purpose of the latter was to sanctify their own souls by prayer and contemplation without engaging in any corporeal works of mercy. The Vice-Chancellor pointed out that religious services can only be charitable so far as they tend towards the edification or instruction of the public, and he held that the gift referred to above was not charitable. There is, in truth, no "charity" in attempting to improve one's own mind or save one's own soul. Charity is necessarily altruistic and involves the idea of aid or benefit to others; but, given the latter, the motion impelling it is immaterial.

The next gift is to the Rev. Mr. Frederick Bampfield, superior of the Institute for Boys and Girls, Barnet, and his successor He was such superior at the date of the will and of the death of the testator, but died in January, 1900. The defendant Francis Spink is the present superior. This gift also is, in my opinion, to the holder of the office, not to the individual. The institute is a congregation of Roman Catholic secular priests, students, and lay brothers living together under rule for their own spiritual benefit, and for carrying on various works for the benefit of their neighbours, one of which, and that obviously referred to by the testator, is an educational charity for poor boys and girls. This legacy and gift of residue, therefore, fail.

The next legatee, the Rev. Lord Archibald Douglas, is not a party, and the next is the Rev. Francis Verhagen, who was at the date of the will superior of the Franciscan Friary at Stratford, but ceased to be so in the testator's lifetime. He can, in my opinion, take nothing beneficially, and I have not the present superior before the court.

There must be the usual inquiry for the heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the testator, and the costs of all parties down to to-day will come out of the estate.

DOUGHTY v. LOMAGUNDA REEFS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Sale of assets to another company—Shares in purchasing company—Voluntary winding up—Dissentient member—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 161.

An agreement by a limited company which is subsequently voluntarily wound up, for the sale of its assets to another company in part consideration of shares in the purchasing company, is not necessarily a sale in the winding up so as to come within section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, because its provisions contemplate a winding up and because a small part of its consideration can only be exactly ascertained on a winding up.

A limited company, one of whose objects as stated in its memorandum of association, was to sell its undertaking, agreed to sell the same and all its property, except £200, to another company in consideration of shares in the purchasing company and of an indemnity to itself and its liquidators against certain obligations. The £200 was to be kept to defray the costs of the agreement and of the winding up of the company, and the balance was to be handed over to the purchasing company. This agreement was approved at an extraordinary general meeting of the company, and at the same meeting was passed a resolution (subsequently confirmed) to wind up the company voluntarily. The plaintiff, who was a shareholder in the company, objected to the sale, and claimed that it was ultrà vires unless his interest was purchased under section 161 of the Companies Act 1862.

Held, that the sale was a sale by the company under its memorandum of association and not a sale in disguise by the liquidator, and that although the agreement for sale contemplated a winding up, and the balance of the £200 could only be exactly ascertained in a winding up, yet as the objects of the agreement could have been substantially accomplished by a change in its form irrespective of a winding up, it was valid, and the provisions of section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, did not apply, the case falling within the principle of Cotton v. Imperial and Foreign Agency and Investment Corporation, [1892] 3 Ch. 454, 41 W. R. Dig. 36.

The defendant company were incorporated in July, 1895, under the Companies Acts, 1882 to 1890, with a capital of £150,000 in £1 shares, for the purpose (amongst other things) of purchasing or otherwise acquiring mines and mining rights in Africa, and particularly to enter into certain agreements mentioned in the memorandum of association.

Among other objects for which the company was established, as stated in the memorandum of association, was the following: "To sell or dispose of the undertaking of the company or any part thereof, for such consideration as the company may think fit, and in particular for shares, debentures, debenture stock, or securities of any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of this company."

Among the articles of association were the following:

"164. If the company shall be wound up, the liquidators (whether voluntary or official) may, with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution, distribute in specie among the contributories any parts of the assets of the company, and in particular any shares, stock, or debentures of any other company which this company may be entitled to, and may with the like sanction vest any part of the assets of the company in trustees upon such trusts for the benefit of contributories as the liquidators shall think fit.

"165. If at any time the liquidators of the company should make sale or enter into any arrangement pursuant to section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, a dissentient member within the meaning of that section shall not have the rights thereby given to him, but instead thereof he may by notice in writing addressed to the liquidators, and left at the office not later than fourteen days after the date of the meeting at which the special resolution authorizing such sale or arrangement was confirmed, require them to sell the shares, stock, or other property, option, or privilege, to which under the arrangement he would otherwise have become entitled, and to pay the net proceeds over to him.

"166. Any such sale or arrangement, or the special resolution confirming the same, may provide for the distribution or appropriation of the shares, cash, or other benefits to be received in compensation otherwise than in accordance with the legal rights of the contributories of the company, and in particular any class may be given preferential or special rights, or may be excluded altogether or in part, but in case any such provision shall be made the last preceding article shall not apply, and any dissentient member shall have the rights conferred upon him by section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862."

By an agreement dated the 12th of November, 1901, and made between the defendant company and the Lomagunda Development Co. (Limited) (therein called "the purchaser company"), it was agreed (1) that the defendant company should sell to the purchaser company the whole of the mining claims, lands, mines, goods, and chattels (excepting the £200 thereinafter mentioned), securities, credits, debts, bills, and things in action of the defendant company, and the whole of its undertaking and business, and all its real and personal property whatsoever; and (2) as part of the consideration that the purchaser company should pay, satisfy, and discharge the debts liabilities, and obligations mentioned in the schedule thereto, and should keep the company and its liquidators and contributories indemnified in respect thereof; (3) that the defendant company should retain out of the property and assets thereby agreed to be sold, the sum of £200 to defray the costs and expenses of and incident to the said agreement and the winding up of the company, and should hand over to the purchaser company, on the dissolution of the defendant company, any balance remaining of the said sum after payment of such costs and expenses; (4) that as the residue of the consideration, the purchaser company should allot to the defendant company or its nominees 17,092 fully-paid shares of £1 each of the purchaser company (which was stated by the plaintiff to be at the rate of one of such shares for every six of the issued shares of the company). By clause 7 the purchase was to be completed on or before the 31st of March, 1902; and by clause 9 the agreement was conditional upon the same being sanctioned on or before the 31st of January, 1902, by an extraordinary resolution of the company.

On the 30th of December, 1901, at an extraordinary general meeting duly convened for the purpose the agreement of the 12th of November, 1901, was approved and adopted, and the directors were authorized to carry it into effect, with such (if any) modifications as they should think fit to assent to. And on the same day a resolution was passed that the company should be wound up voluntarily, that a named person should be appointed liquidator, and that the liquidator should be authorized to distribute any of the assets of the company amongst its members in specie.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 15th of January, 1902, this latter resolution was confirmed at an extraordinary general meeting. The plaintiff was the registered holder of 400 shares in the defendant company, and he objected to the sale agreed upon, contending that he was not getting sufficient value for his shares, and he brought this action against the company claiming a declaration that the agreement of the 12th of November, 1901, was ultra vires and void, an injunction to restrain the defendant company and its liquidator from carrying it into effect, or alternatively, a declaration that the defendant company and its liquidator were not entitled to carry the agreement into effect without purchasing the interests of the plaintiff and of other dissentient shareholders, and a corresponding injunction.

The action came on for hearing as a non-witness action.

G. F. Hart, for the plaintiff.—The sale of the undertaking of the company agreed upon in November, 1901, was a sale in the winding up. The agreement itself contemplates a winding up, providing for its liquidator being indemnified, and the balance of the £200 was to be handed over upon the dissolution of the company, and could be only ascertained in the winding up. The resolution to wind up the company was passed at the same meeting as the resolution approving of the agreement for the sale. The case is thus different from Cotton v. Imperial and Foreign Agency and Investment Corporation, [1892] 3 Ch. 454, 41 W. R. Dig. 36, where the agreement for sale was approved before any resolution to wind up was passed. Here the agreement for sale is part of the scheme for winding up. Consequently the case falls within section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, and the liquidator can only carry out the sale after purchasing the interest of the plaintiff. The articles of association purporting to exclude the operation of that section are ultra vires and invalid: Payne v. The Cork Co. (Limited), 48 W. R. 325, [1900] 1 Ch. 308.

Astbury, K.C., and J. W. M. Holmes, for the defendant company.

BUCKLEY, J.—Those sections of the Companies Acts, 1862, which dictate the provisions of the memorandum of association provide, amongst other things that the memorandum shall state "the objects for which the proposed company is to be established." If the matter were untouched by authority, I think that there would be room for a great deal of argument to show that the objects referred to are those which the company is to carry out for the purpose of earning a profit—what I may call the "living" objects of the company, acts which it has to do as a living corporation, with a view to a profit—and do not include clauses addressed to the disposal of the assets of the company at a time when it was no longer going to carry on its undertaking. But if I rightly read the judgment of Chitty, J., in Cotton v. Imperial and Foreign Agency and Investment Corporation, that is not an accurate statement of what the objects are to be. I think that he meant to decide, and did decide, that under a clause which provides for the sale of the undertaking of the company you may, in pursuance of that object contained in the memorandum of association—with a view to having no subsequent undertaking at all—agree that a sale shall be made at a date when the corporation as a living thing is to come to an end. The learned judge was dealing with a case in which there was an agreement for the sale of the undertaking, and it was contemporaneously proposed that the company should go into liquidation, and he treats it as a case in which the liquidation was contemplated as part of the scheme for the sale. It is quite true that the special resolutions for winding up were negatived at the particular meeting when the agreement was approved, and were passed afterwards, but I do not think he drew any distinction from that fact. He dealt with the case on the footing that the power of sale contained in the memorandum of association was a good power, exercisable under circumstances in which it was intended that the sale should be the end of the corporate life so far as earning profit was concerned. Cotton v. Imperial and Foreign Agency and Investment Corporation, decided in 1892, has often since been commented on, and I consider it wholly binding upon me. On the other hand, in Payne v. The Cork Co. (Limited) it was decided by Stirling, J., that when you are proceeding, not under the memorandum of association, but upon the articles of association, any articles which go to provide that liquidators—as distinguished from the corporation acting under one of its objects as stated in the memorandum of association—shall sell on terms other than those provided by section 161 are not valid—that is to say, that you cannot take power by the articles to exclude section 161. What I have to decide here really amounts, it appears to me, to this—whether this is a sale properly made by the corporation under a clause contained in the memorandum of association, or whether it is in disguise a sale by a liquidator upon terms not justified having regard to section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862. [His lordship then referred to the provisions of the memorandum and articles of association, and of the agreement for sale, and to the resolutions of the 30th of December, 1901, and their confirmation on the 15th of January, 1902, and continued:] In that state of things the question is, Was this a sale under the memorandum of association or was it in disguise a sale by the liquidator? It seems to me that it must be the former. When the liquidator came into existence in January, 1902, it did not remain within his determination to say how the assets should be sold, or for what, or when. The company had become bound by that agreement to sell; he did not sell at all. It was therefore a sale by the company. Then was it a sale which the company could properly make? It is on the face of it, as appears by what I have been reading, a sale which demanded of the company to go into liquidation. In Cotton's case Chitty, J., decided that that was not enough; but that you must see whether there was a sale under a power in the memorandum of association, and he said that such a power was a good power. Now it is true that there are stipulations contained in that agreement which, as far as I can see, could not be thoroughly worked out except in a winding up. The balance of the £200 could not be ascertained until it had been ascertained what the costs of the winding up were. The deficiency to be supplied in case £200 was insufficient could not have been predetermined, and clause 2 contemplates that the liquidator and contributories should be relieved from all liability against contracts and debts, and so on. But does that make it any the less a sale by the company? I do not think that it does. I cannot disguise from myself that in point of fact the same transaction without any of the objections which are capable of being urged to this could have been carried out by putting it in a different form. If instead of saying that the purchaser should indemnify the contributories against them they had ascertained what the debts were, and had said that the purchaser should pay that sum, and if instead of the stipulation as to the £200 they had stipulated that the purchaser should pay in cash a sum sufficient to cover the costs of the liquidation, then the thing would not have been dependent on the liquidation in any way, and could have been carried out utterly irrespective of it. I do not think that there is any substantial difference between these two transactions. If on the decision in Cotton v. Imperial and Foreign Agency and Investment Corporation it would have been competent to make the latter bargain, it seems to me that it must be equally competent to make the former. After this company had executed this agreement, if it had not gone into liquidation, the agreement would still, I apprehend, have been capable of being enforced against them, because the vendors would not have been able to set up that the purchaser had not provided for anything which they were under an obligation to do. I have hesitated about this case principally because I have always felt a difficulty in grasping the exact principle of Cotton v. Imperial and Foreign Agency and Investment Corporation, but I cannot help feeling that that case governs the one before me, and I must dismiss the action with costs.

Adjourned summons.

Mary Maunder, by her will dated in 1889, gave her residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for her son R. for his life subject to the repayment out of income of certain mortgages on parts of her real estate, and after the death of R. the testatrix made specific devises of parts of her real estate among her eight grandchildren, the sons and daughters of R., naming them, and after a direction as to the rents and profits of the specifically devised properties during minorities, and a bequest of the ultimate residue if any of her trust estate to the wife of R. for her life, and afterwards among the said grandchildren, the will proceeded as follows: "And in the event of either of my grandchildren dying before becoming entitled to any share of my estate hereinbefore in any way disposed of, I direct that the child or children of such deceased grandchild shall take the parents' share, or if there shall be no such child or children then that such share or devise or bequest hereinbefore contained shall vest equally in all my surviving grandchildren."

The testatrix died in 1891, leaving her son R and seven of her said eight grandchildren her surviving; another grandchild who survived the testatrix and was also a son of R. had by a codicil made in 1890 been (in effect) substituted as a beneficiary in the place of the grandchild who had died, and there were thus eight surviving grandchildren claiming under the dispositions of the testatrix.

This was a summons taken out by R., the plaintiff and sole acting executor to determine the question (amongst others) whether the gift over in the event of a grandchild "dying before becoming entitled" referred to a death before becoming entitled in possession or before becoming entitled in interest.

Gatey, for the plaintiff.

P. Wheeler, W. H. Cozens-Hardy, G. Cave, and H. C. Manby, for the various defendants.

The following cases were relied upon—viz., for the contention that "entitled" meant "entitled in right": The Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests v. Cotter. 1 Dr. & War. 498, and In re Crosland, Craig v. Midgley, 54 L. T. Rep. 238; and in support of the adverse view Turner v. Gosset, 34 Beav. 593; Henderson v. Kennicott, 2 De G. & Sm. 492; and In re Noyce, Brown v. Rigg, 34 W. R. 147, 31 Ch. D. 75.

JOYCE, J. (after stating the facts): In my opinion upon the construction of this will "entitled" means "entitled in possession." There is no gift to the grandchildren by the will until after the death of R, and if the testatrix had intended the substitutional gifts to take effect only upon the death of a grandchild in her own life she would in all likelihood have said so, and the words would have been, instead of "die before becoming entitled," "die in my lifetime." The words of the gift over again are more appropriate to a substitution during the life of the tenant for life, and I am of opinion that the gift over may become operative at any time during R.'s life. In coming to that conclusion I am only following the decision of Romilly, M.R., in Turner v. Gosset, in which case The Commissioners, &c., v. Cotter was cited. The latter case was an Irish case, and though entitled to very great respect, is not a decision binding on this court; moreover, it was based upon the decision in Doe v. Prigg, 8 B. & C. 231, which could not now be considered good law; in fact it has been overruled in In re Gregson's Trusts, 13 W. R. 193, 2 De G. J. & S. 428, as was pointed out by Malins, V.C., in Marriott v. Abell, 17 W. R. 569, L. R. 7 Eq. 478.

Again, the case of In re Crosland turned on different circumstances; in that case there was an immediate gift, not a gift in remainder, although the time for payment was deferred. The view I adopt is further supported by the decision in In re Noyce and is in accordance with what would have been held in Henderson v. Kennicott, had not the judge in that case felt himself embarrassed by the case of The Commissioners, &c., v. Cotter, the reason for which decision does not, in my opinion, any longer exist.

pany and other individual shareholders, even after negotiations for the sale of the company's undertaking have arisen. A person buying or selling shares in a company, of which he is a director, is under no obligation to disclose matters which have come within his knowledge as a director, whether such matters have arisen in the ordinary course of the company's business or relate to a contemplated sale of the company's undertaking.

This was an action to set aside a sale of shares in a limited company to certain directors of that company, on the ground that the purchasing directors ought to have disclosed to the vendor shareholders certain facts affecting the price.

Prior to October, 1901, the plaintiffs held 253 £10 shares in a colliery company called Nixon's Navigation Co. (Limited).

The objects of the company included the disposal by sale of all or any part of the property of the company.

The shares of the company were transferable only with the approval of the board of directors. They were in a few hands, and were not quoted upon the Stock Exchange.

In the course of October, 1900, the plaintiffs, through their solicitor, inquired of the secretary of the company whether he knew of a purchaser for the shares, and in a further communication with him the plaintiffs' solicitor said that the plaintiffs would consider an offer of £12 5s. a share. This price was based upon a valuation obtained by the plaintiffs some months before from an independent firm of valuers.

The chairman of the company then wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitor offering to take the shares at the price named. But, a fresh valuation having been taken, the plaintiffs' solicitor replied that they would accept £12 10s. a share.

On the 22nd of October, 1901, the chairman wrote accepting this offer on behalf of himself and two other directors. The transfers were approved by the board, and the transaction was completed.

Some time afterwards the plaintiffs learnt that before and during these negotiations the board had been in communication with one Holden, who had in view the purchase of the entire undertaking of the company. Various prices were suggested by Holden, but the lowest of these represented a price per share considerably higher than £12 10s. No sale, however, resulted; no firm offer was ever made by Holden for the purchase of the undertaking; and the court was not satisfied that the board ever in fact intended to sell.

The plaintiffs brought this action against the chairman and the other purchasing directors, claiming to have the sale set aside, on the ground that the purchasers, being directors, ought to have disclosed the negotiations or communications with Holden which had taken place or were in progress. Beyond the communications made by Holden to the board or to the chairman, no evidence of undervalue was given, nor was there any suggestion of unfair dealing, other than such as might be involved in the non-disclosure of those communications.

Eve, K.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the plaintiffs.—The fiduciary relation in which directors undoubtedly stand (Great Eastern Railway v. Turner, 21 W. R. 163, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 149; In re Forest of Dean Coal Mining Co., 27 W. R. 594, 10 Ch. D. 450; In re Lands Allotment Co.. 42 W. R. 404, [1894] 1 Ch. 616; Ferguson v. Wilson, 15 W. R 80, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 77; Wilson v. Lord Bury, 29 W. R. 269, 5 Q. B. D. 518; Ex parte Chippendale, 4 De G, M. & G. 19, is a fiduciary relation towards all the shareholders and towards each individually. Directors selling the undertaking of a company, or taking steps in contemplation of such a sale, are trustees for sale. If, being in this position, they buy shares in the company, they are buying up the interest of their cestui qui trust in the trust property: Watson v. Sprattley 2 W. R. 627, 10 Ex. Ch. 221. This they cannot do, otherwise than through a broker on the Stock Exchange, without the fullest disclosure of facts with regard to the contemplated sale which affect the value of the property. They may not be under any similar obligation of disclosure in regard to facts arising in the ordinary course of their management, for the shareholders know what their powers of management are and know that things may happen any day in the ordinary course of the company's business which will not be disclosed, but which affect the value of their shares. But the situation is changed immediately when the directors go beyond ordinary management and take steps in contemplation of a sale of the entire undertaking. In a partnership a managing partner could not, after entering into negotiation for a sale of the business, go to his sleeping partner and, without a word as to their negotiations, say, "What will you take for your share?" If he did so it would be no defence to say that the sleeping partner was bound to know that the managing partner might be negotiating such a sale. The relation of partnership is one in which uberrima fides is required, Maddeford v. Austwick, 1 Sim. 89; Lindley on Partnerships, book 3, c. 2, and the fact of incorporation makes no difference to this.

Macnaghten, K.C., and Mark Romer, for the defendants.—There is no case in which a director has been held to be a trustee for an individual shareholder. It would be most inconvenient if a director buying or selling shares were bound to disclose everything within his knowledge which he knew might, when he was buying, appreciate, or, when he was selling, depreciate the shares; and no different principle applies when the question of a sale of the undertaking arises.

Vaughan Hawkins replied.

SWINFEN EADY, J., after dealing with the evidence, said: On the facts the position is this: The board had been approached by a person who contemplated that if favourable terms could be arranged with the Nixon Co. he might be able to form a company to purchase their undertaking. Preliminary negotiations took place, but in my opinion no firm offer was ever made to the board, and the board eventually declined to proceed with the matter for reasons apart from any question of the price.

The ground of action for setting aside the sale of the shares is not undervalue. It is not suggested that the plaintiffs' valuers were not fully competent to value the shares, or that any higher price could in fact have been obtained for them from other purchasers. The real ground of action is that the purchasers, being directors of a company, were in a fiduciary position, and that, from the first moment when negotiations were on foot with a view to a sale of the property of the company, they were precluded from purchasing the shareholders' shares without explaining the situation. It is said that, however wide may be the powers of management which directors possess, their position is changed when they pass beyond ordinary management and enter into negotiations for the sale of the entire concern, and that they cannot deal with individual shareholders without disclosing to them matters within their knowledge outside the scope of ordinary management—that is, proposals for sale. The position of directors has often been considered and has been explained, though in different language, by many eminent equity judges. Lord Selborne in Great Eastern Railway Co v. Turner says the directors are trustees or agents of the company, trustees of the company's money and property, agents in the transactions which they enter into on behalf of the company. Sir George Jessel in In re Forest of Dean Coal Mining Co. says they are no doubt trustees for the company of assets which have come into their hands. Lord Lindley in In re Lands Allotment Co. says, "although directors are not properly speaking trustees, yet they have always been considered and treated as trustees of money which comes to their hands or which is actually under their control." From this point of view cases like Parker v. McKenna, 23 W. R. 271, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 96, have been decided, and it has been decided that trustees are bound to dispose of and to allot shares on the best obtainable terms and not to favour themselves or their friends in the allotment.

But the contention for the plaintiffs in the present case carries the fiduciary obligations of directors a great deal further. It is said that directors stand in a fiduciary position towards each individual shareholder, and that, in dealing with the question of purchase of shares by a director from a shareholder, the analogy of a trustee for sale must be applied after but not before negotiations for a sale of the undertaking have arisen. I asked whether there was any case establishing the fiduciary position of the directors towards individual shareholders, and in reply to me counsel did not dispute that directors could deal with shares as private persons till after a question of sale had arisen, but said that their position was then altered and the relation between them and other individual shareholders became that of partners inter se. There is no authority for that proposition, and I feel unable to adopt the view that it would be safe or proper to draw a line at the date when negotiations for a sale began, or that there is any foundation for the notion that a line should be drawn there. It is said that so long as business is going on in the ordinary way directors are under no obligation to disclose information acquired; that however rich a vein of ore may have been struck they need not disclose it to a vendor of shares to them, and whatever losses may have occurred in the ordinary course of management they need not disclose them to a purchaser of shares from them, because shareholders are to be held to have impliedly released them from the obligation to disclose incidents in the ordinary course of management; but that negotiations for a sale of the undertaking are on a different footing. Why? The true rule is, in my opinion, that the shareholders are fixed with knowledge of all the directors' powers alike, including their power of negotiating a sale of the undertaking, and that they have no reason to assume that this, any more than any other power, is not being exercised.

In my opinion the defendants were under no obligation to disclose to the plaintiffs the negotiations which ultimately proved abortive. The contrary view would place directors in the position of being unable to purchase shares unless they make a premature disclosure of negotiations, which their duty to the company may well require them to keep undisclosed.

The plaintiffs' case wholly fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

New South Wales—Land and Income Tax Assessment Act, 1895, s. 11, sub-section (v.)—Charitable purpose—Exclusive use—Exemption.

Certain glebe lands were vested in trustees by Crown grant for the purposes of promoting religion and education in New South Wales. Under these powers the trustees granted building leases of part; the remainder were waste lands and not physically occupied or used for any purpose. The rents were applied, as authorized, for purposes of the trust connected with a church.

Held, that the lands were not "occupied or used exclusively for or in connection with public charitable purposes, churches, &c., within the meaning of section 11, sub-section (v.). of the Land and Income Tax Assessment Act, 1895, and were not therefore exempt from assessment.

Appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, upon a special case stated.

The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Section 11, sub-section (v.), of the Land and Income Tax Assessment Act of 1895: The lands and classes of lands hereinafter specified are exempted from assessment for taxation under this Act—viz., sub-section (v.) "Lands occupied or used exclusively for or in connection with public pounds, public hospitals, whether supported wholly or partly by grants from the Consolidated Revenue Fund or not, which are not a source of profit or gain to the users or owners thereof, benevolent institutions, public charitable purposes, churches, chapels for public worship, universities, affiliated colleges, the Sydney Grammar School, mechanics' institutes and schools of art, and lands on which are erected public markets, town halls or municipal council chambers, or any lands the property of or vested in any council or municipality, public hospital, university, or affiliated college."

The questions stated in the special case were: (1) Was the court right in holding that only such lands as were directly or physically occupied or used for or in connection with a public charitable purpose, were exempt from assessment under said sub-section? Or (2) Were the demise of such lands and the receipt and application of the rents thereof by the present respondents, an occupation or exclusive user of said lands for a charitable purpose within the meaning of said sub-section? (3) Was the possession of the said waste lands an occupation or exclusive user of said waste lands for or in connection with public charitable purposes within the meaning of said sub-section?

Their lordships' (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY, and Sir FORD NORTH) judgment was delivered by

Lord DAVEY.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, upon a special case stated by the Court of Review, under section 45 of the Land and Income Tax Assessment Act of 1895. The question in substance raised by the special case was whether certain glebe lands by Crown grant vested in the respondents for parochial church purposes in connection with the Church of England were in the circumstances stated in the special case exempted from assessment for land tax. The Supreme Court decided that the glebe lands were exempted, and the commissioners have appealed. The decision of the question depends on the construction of section 11, sub-section (v.), of the Land and Income Tax Assessment Act, 1895, which is as follows: [His lordship read the section set out above.] Are the lands in question "occupied or used exclusively for or in connection" with public charitable purposes or a church? The lands (in area about forty acres) were vested in trustees appointed under an Act of 8 Will. 4, No. 5, by Crown grant of the 3rd of June, 1857. The object of the grant was therein stated to be to promote religion and education in New South Wales, and the trusts were declared to be "for the appropriation thereof as the glebe annexed to the Church of England" at Greenoaks, Darling Point, and known as St. Mark's, in conformity with the provisions of the said Act and of another Act of 7 Will. 4, No. 3, so far as applicable. By section 21 of the Act 8 Will. 4, No. 5, trustees were empowered with certain consents to demise glebe lands for terms of years and apply the rents and profits (1) in paying an annual sum of £150 a year to the officiating minister of the church as an allowance for the glebe; (2) in building or enlarging the church to which the glebe is annexed, or a residence for the clergyman; (3) in or towards building or enlarging a church in another place in the same township or district, and paying a stipend to the officiating minister; (4) with the consent of the bishop in or towards the building of other churches and residences for clergymen and endowing the officiating minister thereof. Pursuant to this power the glebe lands of St. Mark's have been sub-divided into blocks for sale or to let on building leases. Some of the blocks have been demised by the respondents on building leases and the lessees have erected private dwellings thereon. Others of the blocks have been demised on building leases but have not yet been built on, and the balance of the lands are waste lands, and are not (to use the language of the special case) "physically occupied or used for any purpose." On these facts the Supreme Court has held that the lands are "used in connection with" the charitable purposes of the Crown grant. It cannot be denied that the words in themselves and without a context are capable of that construction. But on reading the whole of the section 11, sub-section (v.), of the taxing Act their lordships think that the words point rather to the use and occupation of the land itself, and do not primâ facie apply to the use or purpose to which the rents and profits derived from the land may be applied. A private dwelling-house is used and occupied by the owner or lessee of it as a residence for himself and his family, and it would in the opinion of their lordships be a forced construction to say that it was used by the lessors for their own purposes, because they apply the rent which they receive in a particular way. If it be said that the land is used by the trustees though not by the lessees for the charitable purpose the answer would seem to be that the land is, strictly speaking, not used by the trustees at all. They have parted with the use and occupation of it during the term of the lease. It is the money derived from the rents and profits which they use, and not the land. Looking at the context, it is to be observed that lands used "for or in connection with" public hospitals, universities, and affiliated colleges are in the first instance exempted, and later in the section as a separate exemption "lands the property of or vested in" any public hospital, university, or affiliated college are also exempted. According to any admissible use of language the latter exemption must be intended to cover something not included in and different from that comprised in the first exemption. But there is no similar exemption of land the property of or vested in churches or charitable trustees generally. The words "for or in connection with" (say) a hospital or a church are probably intended to include not only the actual site of the hospital or church, but also other buildings or land occupied in connection with the principal building, as, for example, land used for a residence for the head or minister, or a room for church meetings or other similar purposes. In short, their lordships, while admitting that the words are not free from ambiguity, think that they should be construed strictly. If it had been intended to include all lands which are vested in or held as an endowment only of churches, grammar schools, and the like, they cannot think that the Legislature would not have found apt words to express its meaning. As to the lands which are not let the special case finds that they are not occupied or used for any purpose. They are not therefore, on the construction which their lordships have given to the words of the section, within the exemption. Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty that the order of the Supreme Court should be reversed, and question 1 in the special case should be answered in the affirmative and questions 2 and 3 in the negative, and that the present respondents should pay the costs of this appeal, regard being had to the terms on which special leave to appeal was given.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Aug. 4, 5, 1902.

DYER AND OTHERS v. SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON. (a.)

School board—Establishment of pupil teachers' centres—Buildings separate from elementary schools—Higher education—Power to expend rates on such centres—Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75).

A school board, though it may give instruction to pupil teachers in non-elementary subjects so long as such instruction is given in public elementary schools, has no power to establish at the expense of the rates pupil teachers' centres in separate buildings. The establishment of such centres amounts to the establishment of non-elementary schools, and falls within the decision in Rex v. Cockerton, 49 W. R. 433, [1901] 1 K. B. 726.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J.

The facts were as follows: In 1900 the School Board obtained a provisional order, confirmed by the Act 63 & 64 Vict. c. cxcvii., empowering them to acquire certain premises in Islington, with a provision that the site, if purchased by the board, should not for a period of fifty years be used otherwise than for the purpose of a pupil teachers' centre.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The board having accordingly purchased the site and commenced the erection of a building for use as a pupil teachers' centre, the auditor, Mr. T. B. Cockerton, at his audit of the accounts for the half-year to Michaelmas, 1901, disallowed a sum expended for this purpose. The grounds of the disallowance, as stated in his certificate, were briefly that expenditure on a pupil teachers' centre was ultra vires of the board, inasmuch as such a centre was not a public elementary school, and the education proposed to be given in it would be given to persons not forming part of the educational staff of such a school, and included subjects not allowed, provided for, or recognized by the Education Code.

Certain ratepayers thereupon commenced this action, and moved for an injunction to restrain the school board, their officers, contractors, and servants, till judgment in the action or further order, from spending any moneys which were the produce of the rates in or towards the erection or building of the pupil teachers' centre in question.

The school board having meanwhile determined to appeal to the King's Bench Division against the auditor's decision, Farwell, J., granted the injunction on the ground that the board ought not to expend money on the erection of the building until the auditor's certificate had been set aside.

The school board appealed, and it was agreed that on this appeal the question as to the legality of the erection of pupil teachers' centres, which had not been determined by Farwell, J., should be decided by the court, counsel for the board waiving all questions as to whether the action was maintainable without the Attorney-General being a party.

It appeared that the ages of the pupil teachers taught ranged from seventeen to twenty-four, and that they were not confined to those connected with London board schools; while the education given in them included subjects not comprised within the limits of elementary education.

The Board of Education Day School Code includes (article 31) pupil teachers among the teachers recognized by the board, and other articles provide that they must be not less than fifteen years of age when engaged, and that central classes shall be established for their instruction, and also provide for their examination.

The form of memorandum of agreement for their engagement, contained in Schedule 6 to this code, includes the following clause: "The school board shall cause the pupil teacher to receive, without charge, from a certificated teacher or other qualified teacher approved by the Board of Education, special instruction, including practical instruction in teaching during at least five hours per week, of which hours not more than three shall be part of the same day. Such special instruction and any instruction in secular subjects given to the pupil teacher during school hours shall be in the subjects in which the pupil teacher is to be examined during this engagement, pursuant to the code."

Jenkins, K.C., and Llewellyn Davies, for the appellants.—A pupil teacher's centre may not be a public elementary school within the Education Act, 1870, and the education given in it may go beyond elementary education; but pupil teachers' centres are not within the decision in Rex v. Cockerton, 49 W. R. 433, [1901] 1 K. B. 726, which did not in any way relate to them. They were not before the court in that case. The school board have express powers under the Act to employ pupil teachers, and are bound by the form of agreement to give them special instruction which is not elementary in character; and must therefore have a right to establish these centres for the purpose of doing so efficiently. Moreover the board's special Act of 1900 expressly provides that this site shall not for fifty years be used for any purpose except for such a centre, and therefore legalizes its use for that purpose.

Upjohn, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and Courthope Munroe, for the respondent.—Rex v. Cockerton decides that a school board may not expend money raised by rates on any education which is not elementary. It has to be admitted that the education given in these pupil teachers' centres is not confined to elementary education; and that the centres are not public elementary schools; and they therefore come precisely within the decision in Rex v. Cockerton. [They were stopped by the court.]

Jenkins, K.C., in reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Put shortly, Mr. Jenkins' argument is as follows: He accepts the decision in Rex v. Cockerton, and does not deny that the rates may only be applied to establish and carry on public elementary schools, and that the education given in those schools must be the education of children in elementary subjects. But he says that the employment of pupil teachers is recognized by the code, and pupil teachers are an adjunct of the staff of teachers in elementary schools; and that if you look at the code and ascertain the instruction which is intended by it to be given to pupil teachers you will find it is of a character hardly to be described as elementary. He says that it is clear that the pupil teacher has to receive instruction in subjects which are not elementary, and that this instruction is not dealt with by the Cockerton case and was not in the contemplation of the court when it decided it. If all this is true, he says it follows that the school board is entitled to establish a school of the character of a pupil teachers' centre to give this education, and to erect the necessary buildings, though such a school is not a public elementary school, and the education given there is not elementary. Speaking for myself, I am not disposed to quarrel with the proposition that in elementary schools education may be given to pupil teachers, under the agreement with them, which could not properly be described as merely elementary, and so far I do not join issue with the argument on that agreement. But there is nothing in it to lead me to suppose that the education to be given to pupil teachers ought not to be given in the public elementary school itself. Mr. Jenkins admits this has been done and extra payment made to the certified teachers who gave it; yet he asks us to say that, as a necessary consequence of the agreement, the board may establish a separate school in which to give this instruction, and charge the cost of building and carrying on this school on the rates. I cannot agree to this at all. So to hold would, I think, be entirely inconsistent with Rex v. Cockerton, which in substance decides that the only schools to be paid for out of the rates, whether in respect of buildings, education, or anything else, are elementary schools devoted to the elementary education of children. It appears to me that whatever instruction may be given in such schools in addition to elementary education is a mere accessory of the schools, and that it is not right to draw the inference that the board may establish special schools, not properly to be described as elementary schools, in which to give education that is not elementary. And the force of this view is increased by the consideration that at these pupil teachers' schools the average age of the scholars ranges between seventeen and twenty-four, and that scholars may come from any part to them to get an education which is obviously higher, not elementary, education. It is impossible, consistently with Rex v. Cockerton, to hold that the Act of 1870 authorizes the charging on the rates of the expense of establishing and conducting such a non-elementary school. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the auditor's disallowances were right. It is established with regard to pupil teachers' centres that they are perfectly distinct from ordinary board schools, not only in regard to locality but in regard to their nature. They are not elementary schools at all, but in them higher education is given, though, of course, it covers elementary subjects; and it is given to persons who are not children. It is clear that it is not limited even to such education as will make the pupil teachers fit for their duties as such in board schools. It is clear on the admitted facts that the education given is of a higher kind, and that the centres are not limited even to pupils connected with London board schools.

The expenditure on these pupil teachers' centres of money raised by rates is therefore wholly unauthorized by the Elementary Education Acts. It is said that such expenditure is sanctioned by something in the code. If so, the code would have gone beyond its due authority, and it could not have extended the provisions of the Act.

But if the code is looked at it is clear that the code does no such thing as is alleged. It does not insist on the establishment of pupil teachers' centres or make any provision with regard to them. We must declare, therefore, that the board have no power to expend the rates on these centres. As to the special Act of 1900, this Act was not concerning itself with the expenditure of rates, the provision as to the use of the land for the purposes of a pupil teachers' centre was inserted for the benefit of the owner of the site. It cannot be supposed that such a provision was intended to extend the provisions of the Education Acts; for the Legislature was not dealing with any such question as we have before us. This contention also fails, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The school board cannot establish these pupil teachers' centres without further statutory powers, and these are not given by the code or by the Act of 1900. The object of the Act of 1870 was clearly to provide elementary education in board schools. There is provision in the Act for teaching pupil teachers in non-elementary subjects; but the school board have no power to create independent colleges for the instruction of their pupil teachers. As to the agreement between the board and pupil teachers, it is possible to construe every word of it in a sense intra vires of the board, and the language used does not go beyond the instructing of pupils in elementary schools.

The court made an order declaring that the disallowance by the auditor was rightly made, and restraining the school board from making any payment out of the school fund for the building of any school other than a public elementary school.

Appeal dismissed.

MOLINEAUX v. LONDON, BIRMINGHAM, AND MANCHESTER INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Director—Qualification shares—Acting as director—Implied agreement to take shares—Reasonable time to obtain qualification—"Ceases to hold his qualification"—Qualification of director raised by resolution of company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 23, 37—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 3.

By the articles of association of a company the qualification of a director was the holding in his own right of £50 in shares of the company. The plaintiff, who was a director, held this number of shares. Subsequently the directors resolved that a resolution should be put to the shareholders at the next general meeting that the qualification of a director should be the holding of 250 £1 shares in the company. At the general meeting resolutions were passed for increasing the capital of the company and altering the articles of association by raising the qualification of a director as above. This resolution was duly confirmed, and a prospectus was issued which the plaintiff signed and in which his name appeared as a director. The plaintiff was present at all the meetings. After the resolutions had been confirmed, and before the issue of the prospectus, the secretary and manager of the company, without the plaintiff's knowledge, entered the plaintiff's name on the register for 200 shares, making in all the requisite 250 shares. The plaintiff subsequently sent in his resignation as a director. Upon a counter-claim for calls in respect of the 200 shares,

Held, (1) that the plaintiff had not "ceased to hold his qualification" within the meaning of section 3, sub-section 2, of the Companies Act, 1900, when the qualification of a director was raised, and that therefore his office was not thus vacated; and (2) that, as the plaintiff had accepted the office of and had acted as a director after he knew of the increase in the qualification, he must be taken to have contracted with the company that he would obtain the requisite shares within a reasonable time, and that he ought to have obtained the shares before signing the prospectus; and that, therefore, his name had been properly placed on the register, and he was liable for the calls.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Phillimore, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

No question arose on the claim. The counter-claim was to recover £50, the amount of a call on 200 £1 shares in the defendant company standing in the plaintiff's name.

Phillimore, J., gave judgment for the defendants on the counter-claim.

The facts and arguments appear from the judgment.

July 21.—COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: The plaintiff was appointed a director of the defendant company in May, 1899. By article 70* of the articles of association of the company the qualification of a director was the holding in his own right of £50 in shares in the capital of the company. The plaintiff throughout held this number of shares. He had at one time 200 shares, but he sold 50 to a man named Brown, and he transferred 100 to his brother, apparently as trustee for himself. In February, 1901, at board meetings at which the plaintiff was present, it was resolved that a resolution be put to the shareholders at the next general meeting to alter the qualification of a director from 50 shares to 250 shares, and that the plaintiff should be elected a life member of the board, subject to confirmation at the annual meeting. In March the share prospectus was provisionally approved; this had reference to a contemplated increase of the capital of the company from £10,000 to £100,000. The increase of the capital and the enlargement of the directors' qualification were parts of one scheme. On the 4th of April, 1901, a general meeting was held at which resolutions were unanimously passed for increasing the capital by the creation of 90,000 new shares of £1 each, and for altering the articles so as to make the plaintiff a life director. Article 70 was cancelled, and a new article substituted making the qualification of a director 250 shares. On the 19th of April a board meeting was held, at which the date of issue of the share prospectus was fixed for the 23rd inst. On the same day a general meeting was held at which the resolutions passed on the 4th of April were duly confirmed, and they thereby became special resolutions. The plaintiff was present at all these meetings. On the 22nd of April the plaintiff signed the share prospectus, in which his name appeared as one of the directors. It was issued on the 23rd of April. On the 20th of April the secretary and manager of the company entered the plaintiff's name on the register in respect of 200 shares, making with his original 50 his qualification. This was entered as of the 4th of April, on which day the other directors had qualified, and on which day there was some conversation with the plaintiff on the subject of qualification. The plaintiff says he was not aware of this entry on the register until after his resignation.

* There was no other article dealing with the qualification of a director.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 26th of April the plaintiff wrote to the secretary as follows: "If you can obtain a purchaser of my 200 shares at ten shillings, I shall be pleased to hand you £5 and resign my seat." The plaintiff's view is that this relates, not to the 200 new shares required to make up his qualification, but to the 200 old shares of which he still considered himself the real owner. He wrote a similar letter on the 3rd of of May. A board meeting was held on the 8th of May, at which the plaintiff was present, but not, as he says, as a director. A discussion took place. The plaintiff was under the impression that he had originally applied for 250 shares, and that he could get them back and thus acquire his qualification. The board did not accept this view. No conclusion was arrived at. On the 16th of May the plaintiff sent in his resignation of the office of director, which by article 82 would become operative on the 16th of June. The call in question was made on the 22nd of May. The plaintiff was not present at any board meeting after the 8th of May. No application has been made by the plaintiff for rectification of the register. Under these circumstances Phillimore, J., has held the plaintiff liable in respect of the call on the 200 shares.

It has been contended with great ability on behalf of the plaintiff that he is not liable (1) by reason of the provisions of section 3 of the Companies Act, 1900, and (2) because he never agreed to take those two hundred shares from the company or to become a member in respect of them. It will be convenient to deal with these points separately. First, section 3 of the Act of 1900 is as follows: "(1) Without prejudice to the restrictions imposed by the last foregoing section, it shall be the duty of every director who is by the regulations of the company required to hold a specified share qualification, and who is not already qualified, to obtain his qualification within two months after his appointment or such shorter time as may be fixed by the regulations of the company. (2) The office of director of a company shall be vacated, if the director does not within two months from the date of his appointment, or within such shorter time as may be fixed by the regulations of the company, obtain his qualification, or if, after the expiration of such period or shorter time, he ceases at any time to hold his qualification; and a person vacating office under this section shall be incapable of being reappointed director of the company until he has obtained his qualification. (3) If after the expiration of the said period or shorter time any unqualified person acts as director of a company, he shall be liable to pay to the company the sum of £5 for every day during which he so acts."

It is argued that the plaintiff ceased to hold his qualification on the 19th of April, when the qualification was raised from £50 to £250, and that thereupon he necessarily vacated office, and that no subsequent acts on his part purporting to be done as director can afford ground for raising the implication of a contract to take qualifying shares. But on careful consideration of the language of the section it seems to us that this argument cannot prevail. Sub-section 1 deals with the original appointment of a director, and states that it is his duty to obtain the "specified share qualification" within two months after his appointment at the latest. This could not apply to the plaintiff, who was appointed in May, 1899, for the Act did not come into operation until the 1st of January, 1901. Sub-section 2 states the consequences of a breach of the duty referred to in sub-section 1. It provides that the office of a director shall be vacated if he does not within the prescribed period obtain his qualification—i.e., the specified share qualification—"or if after the expiration of such period or shorter time he ceases at any time to hold his qualification." Those last words plainly contemplate that the director once had, but no longer has, the specified share qualification. It is an abuse of language to say that the plaintiff "ceased" to hold 250 shares on the 19th of April. The section does not touch a case like the present, where after election the share qualification has been raised. The opposite view would lead to the strange result that a prosperous company increasing its capital and also the qualification of directors might find that the passing of the special resolution instantaneously vacated the office of every director and left the company without any executive. Neither the language nor the policy of the Act compels us to arrive at this conclusion. The case must therefore be decided apart from section 3 of the Act of 1900.

On principle and apart from authority it seems to us that a person who accepts an appointment as director, knowing that the holding of a certain number of shares is a necessary qualification, and acts as director, must be held to have contracted with the company that he will within a reasonable time obtain the requisite shares either by transfer from existing shareholders or directly from the company. If he has not obtained the shares within a reasonable time from the public the company are authorized to put him on the register in respect of the shares. What is a reasonable time must depend upon all the circumstances. As a general rule, and apart from any special provisions in the articles, the qualification ought in the case of an established company to be obtained before acting. Where a director takes an active part in the scheme for increasing the qualification, the "reasonable time" may well begin to run before the date of the second confirmatory resolution, and may be held to have ended at the latest on the first occasion when he does an important act as director after that date. The articles, though not themselves a contract between the company and the director, must be regarded as showing the terms upon which, on the one hand, he agrees to act as director, and on the other hand, the company agree to pay him remuneration for his services. By section 37 of the Companies Act, 1862, the register is primâ facie evidence that a person on the register is a member in respect of shares registered in his name. His position is not the same as it would be if his name were not on the register and the liquidator were seeking to make him a contributory. Moreover, he is absolutely bound as a member under section 23, if it can be shown that he has "agreed," expressly or by implication, "to become a member in respect of the shares which are registered in his names." The conditions of section 23 are satisfied if the reasonable time has elapsed without his having obtained the shares aliunde. The authorities in the Court of Appeal are consistent with the above propositions; we refer especially to Brown's case, 22 W. R. 171, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 102; Lord Inchiquin's case, 39 W. R. 610, [1891] 3 Ch. 28; Isaac's case, 40 W. R. 518, [1892] 2 Ch. 158; Cammell's case, [1894] 1 Ch. 528, [1894] 2 Ch. 392.

Applying these principles, we think the plaintiff was bound to have acquired his qualification before signing the prospectus of the 22nd of April. This was a statutory duty imposed upon him as director by section 9, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1900. It was a solemn assertion that he was a duly qualified director. He was so if, but only if, the insertion of his name on the register on the 20th can be deemed authorized. True it was the Act of the manager and secretary. But it was ratified and adopted by the board on the 22nd of May by making a call on the plaintiff in respect of these particular shares: In re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mine (Limited), 45 Ch. D. 16, 39 W. R. Dig. 47. It is of no moment that the plaintiff was not aware at the time that his name had been placed on the register.

We ought perhaps to allude to an argument which was strongly pressed upon us as to the effect of the resignation on the 16th of May. If, as we hold, there was a binding contract prior to that date, the plaintiff could not, by his own sole act, release himself from its obligation. Nor is there any ground for holding that there was an implied condition in the contract that he might thus release himself.

It follows that we consider Phillimore, J.'s, judgment on the counterclaim was correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Lawrance, J.) upon a case stated by the quarter sessions for the county of Lancaster: reported in 49 W. R. 559, [1901] 2 K. B. 740.

On the 21st of September, 1900, the respondents, who were the licensing justices for the city and county of Manchester, refused to renew to the appellant a licence to sell beer by retail to be consumed on or off the premises in a house known as the Council Inn, Manchester. On the 23rd of October, 1900, the appellant appealed to the court of quarter sessions, who dismissed the appeal subject to this case for the opinion of the High Court.

The appellant was the tenant and occupier of the Council Inn, and was licensed in respect thereof for the sale of beer by retail to be consumed on or off the premises. On the 9th of August, 1900, notice of objection to the renewal of the appellant's licence was served upon him, the grounds of the objection being (inter alia) that the premises were not of the necessary annual value. The justices refused the renewal upon the ground raised by the objection.

The Council Inn was originally licensed for the sale of beer by retail to be consumed on or off the premises in the year 1868, and the licence was continuously renewed down to the year 1886.

At the general annual licensing meeting for the city held in August, 1886, the renewal of the licence to Edwin Wade, the then licensee, was objected to, and the consideration of the objection was adjourned until the following September, when the renewal of the licence was refused. He continued to carry on business and sell beer by retail in the house until the 8th of October, 1886, when he yielded up possession thereof to Jane Jackson, who became the new tenant and occupier thereof, but did not then obtain any licence or transfer of a licence to continue the business. The licence for that current year expired in course of law on the 10th of October, 1886. Jane Jackson commenced to carry on business and to sell beer by retail thereon on the 8th of October, 1886, but not under a justices' licence, and she continued to do so. On the 12th of October, 1886, Jane Jackson applied to the justices in special session for the grant of a licence to her, which was granted, and the licence was thenceforward continuously renewed until the 21st of September, 1900.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The annual value of the premises on the 21st of September, 1900, exceeded £15, but was less than £30. The premises were situate within the city of Manchester, the population of which, according to the last census, exceeded 100,000.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that, inasmuch as the house was, on the 10th of August, 1872, licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors for consumption thereupon, the qualification in respect of annual value prescribed by section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872—namely, £30—did not apply thereto, but that the qualification in respect of the annual value which did apply thereto was that prescribed by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, s. 1—namely, £15.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent justices that the licence held in respect of the house at the time of the passing of the Licensing Act, 1872, having lapsed in 1886, the house thereupon ceased to be qualified to receive any other or new licence except upon the conditions as to annual value required by the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 45, and that upon the true construction of that section the conditions therein prescribed as to the annual value applied to all licensed premises of which the licence had not been in existence continuously from the 10th of August, 1872, down to the application for the renewal thereof, or to which a licence other than that existing on the 10th of August, 1872, had been granted since that date.

The quarter sessions decided that the value qualification prescribed by section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872 applied to the house, and dismissed the appeal upon the ground that the house was not of the necessary value as required by that Act. The Divisional Court held that, though there had been a break in the continuity of the licence, the justices could not refuse to renew on the ground only that the house was not of the annual value required by section 45.

The respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872: "Premises to which at the time of the passing of this Act no licence under the Acts recited in the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, authorizing the sale of beer or wine for consumption thereupon is attached, shall not be subject to any of the provisions now in force prescribing a certain rent or value or rating as a qualification for receiving any such licence. Premises not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption thereupon shall not be qualified to receive a licence authorizing such sale unless the following conditions are satisfied: (a) The premises . . . shall be of not less than the following value: If situate . . . within the limits of a town containing a population of not less than 100,000 inhabitants, £50 per annum; or if the licence do not authorize the sale of spirits, £30 per annum. . . ."

July 8.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court, consisting of the Lord Chief Justice and Lawrance, J., reversing the decision of the licensing justices and of the quarter sessions in refusing a licence to the applicant. The facts are very shortly stated in the report of the case in the Law Reports, [1901] 2 K. B. 740, and are as follows: [His lordship read the facts, which are substantially the same as those set out above, and continued:] The quarter sessions, affirming the licensing justices, had held that the continuity of the applicant's licence had been broken, and that therefore he was not entitled to claim a renewal of his licence unless the house in respect of which he claimed had complied with the conditions as to value laid down in section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872—in this case £30. The case for the applicant was that under the second clause of that section he was exempted from the conditions of value therein imposed, and was bound only by those of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61—viz., in this case, £15—and that the premises exceeded that value. The case depends on the meaning of the second clause of section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872. It is not, I think, necessary to refer to the first clause, which has perplexed the courts and the text writers: see Mr. Paterson's note to the section in his book on the Licensing Acts, and Reg. v. Mann, 21 W. R. 329, L. R. 8 Q. B. 235. It is admitted that this case depends on the second clause only. That clause is as follows: "Premises not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption thereupon shall not be qualified to receive a licence authorizing such sale unless the following conditions are satisfied." The section therefore is framed to exclude from qualification for a licence after the passing of the Act any house not of the prescribed value unless at the time of the passing of the Act it is licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises. Its object, therefore, obviously was, while raising the standard of the value qualification for the future, to safeguard, to some extent at all events, the rights, such as they were, in respect to houses already licensed at the time of the passing of the Act; and the question is how far the Legislature must be taken to have enacted that such houses and their owners should be relieved from the burden of the new qualification. It is contended by the applicant, the respondent here, and he was bound to contend no less, that this immunity is conferred once for all upon the house, provided it was in fact licensed at the time of the passing of the Act, quite irrespective of whether or not that licence has been continued by renewals, and no matter to what purpose it may have been applied in the interval between the passing of the Act and the subsequent application. It is contended, on the other hand, that the Legislature must have intended to continue the immunity only so long as the licence in existence at the time of the passing of the Act had been kept alive by renewals, and that the principle laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench and confirmed by the House of Lords in the parallel case arising under or created by section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, must be applied to this legislation also. This makes it necessary to consider that section and the cases decided under it; for it seems to me that, when closely scrutinized, the two sections, though contained in different Acts of Parliament, are equally enacted with reference to the well-known practice of magistrates in dealing with the renewal of licences, and equally had for their object the safeguarding of existing licence-holders in respect of their licensed houses. Section 19 of the Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), when first passed, was, so far as is material, in these words: "Where on the first of May, 1869, a licence under any of the said recited Acts is in force in respect to any house or shop for the sale by retail therein of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premises, it shall not be lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premises in respect of such house or shop, except upon one or more of the grounds upon which an application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence for the sale of beer, cider, or wine not to be consumed on the premises may be refused, in accordance with this Act." It was amended by an Act of the following year, but before that Act came into operation it was interpreted by the Court of Queen's Bench in Hargreaves v. Dawson, 24 L. T. Rep. 428, 19 W. R. C. L. Dig. 11. It was there held that, though on the bare language of the Act the condition of immunity from objection on grounds other than the four named was simply that on the 1st of May, 1869, a licence under any of the recited Acts was in force with respect to the house, to construe the conditions so narrowly would be to ignore the practice prevailing under the licensing laws and to defeat the obvious intention of the Legislature, and the court therefore construed those words as not extending to the case where a licence existing at the date of the Act had not been continued by annual renewals. The key to the decision is contained in the observation of Cockburn, L.C.J., in the course of the argument: "Does not the 19th section imply that there is an existing licence?" That is, at the time of the application. The Legislature by the amending Act of 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 88) expressly enacted (in section 3) what the court had so decided. The matter came up for discussion again in Reg. v. Curzon, 21 W. R. 887, L. R. 8 Q. B. 400, after the amending Act of 1871 had been repealed, and the court held that "on the true construction of section 19 of the Act of 1869, confirmed by section 7 of the Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29), the justices were not prohibited from exercising their discretion in the case of a house licensed on the 1st of May, 1869, the licence or certificate of which had lapsed before the application for renewal"; and they expressly approved the decision in Hargreaves v. Dawson, decided without reference to either of the amending Acts. The matter ultimately came before the House of Lords in the case of Freer v. Murray, [1894] A. C. 576, where the decisions I have referred to were approved, and the House held, under circumstances practically indistinguishable from those in this case as to the history of the licence, that the fact of the chain of continuity having been broken put the applicant outside the protection of section 19, and left the justices an absolute discretion, as in the case of a new licence. On the argument in the Court of Appeal, Lord Esher, M.R., expressly agreed with the view taken by the Court of Queen's Bench in Hargreaves v. Dawson, and approved in Reg. v. Curzon, on the construction of section 19 standing alone and unamended: see 41 W. R. 450, [1893] 1 Q. B. 635. If, therefore, it is necessary for the applicant in this case to show that his licence has been renewed up to the date of his last application, Freer v. Murray is a clear authority in the House of Lords that he has failed to do so. Is there then any substantial distinction between the legislation of section 45 of the Act of 1872 and that of section 19 of the Act of 1869 which would justify us in refusing to apply to the present case the principle of the decisions upon the Act of 1869 to which I have referred? I cannot think that there is. In the one case, that under the Act of 1869, the Legislature were continuing to persons licensed at the time of the passing of the Act a certain immunity which they then enjoyed, while as to persons not licensed they left unfettered discretion to the magistrates. So here they preserve for persons having licences at the time of the passing of the Act, immunity from disqualification on the ground that their houses fall below a certain value, while to others who did not hold licences at the time of the passing of the Act they negative qualification unless their houses are of a much larger value. It seems to me that all the reasons which induced the court to interpret the first-named Act as they did, apply equally to the second. It is difficult to assign any reason in the one case more than in the other why the Legislature should have intended to enact arbitrarily that the condition of the house at the time of the passing of the Act should determine for ever the rights of the occupiers thereafter, quite irrespective of whether it continued to be used as a public-house or for any other purpose. The same reasons that led the courts to insist in the one case that the section must be taken to refer to a licence kept continually in existence up to the date of the application apply equally to the other, and no reason was given in argument why any other intention should be supposed. Nor does it seem to me that there is any such difference in the language as to justify any valid distinction. That the language of the section in the one case is affirmative and in the other negative can surely make no solid difference. If the provision of section 45 of the Act of 1872 be thrown into the affirmative it seems to me that it cannot be distinguished from section 19 of the Act of 1869. At my invitation Mr. Avory transposed the sentence thus: "Premises licensed at the time of the passing of this Act . . . shall be qualified"—that is, on application—"to receive the licence, although the following provisions are not satisfied." If the premises are licensed a licence is "in force" with respect to them in the same sense as in the Act of 1869, and I think no effectual distinction can be made because the words in the later Act in terms refer to the premises and not to the occupier. What the Legislature is considering in both cases is a right of the owner or occupier in respect of the premises. The interests they are safeguarding cannot be considered as dissevered from the owner or occupier. It is equally the right or expectation of the owner or occupier, in respect of the premises, which is to be safeguarded in both cases. Reliance was also placed by Mr. Avory on the words "an application" in section 19 of the Act of 1869; but, as no question as to qualification can arise either for a new licence or a renewal except upon "an application," I can see no force in this argument. In fact the provision of the Act of 1872 might be thrown into the exact words of section 19 of the earlier Act, substituting "except on the ground of value," &c., for "except upon one or more of the (four) grounds," &c., without in any way altering the sense. For these reasons I think that the decisions in the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords upon the Act of 1869 have laid down a principle applicable to the interpretation of the section now in question, and that we are bound to adopt it. This view seems to me also to be in accordance with that taken by Cockburn, L.C.J., in Reg. v. Mann, L. R. 8 Q. B., at p. 239, where he says, referring to section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872: "The first part of section 45 must be taken to refer to houses already licensed, but to which, at the time of the passing of the Act, no licence under the Acts referred to in the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, is attached, and it proceeds to enact that they 'shall not be subject to any of the provisions prescribing a certain rent, or value, or rating as a qualification for receiving any licence.' Such houses are excluded from the operation of the subsequent part of the section, which applies to premises not, at the time of the passing of this Act, licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors. Then with regard to future applications for new licences, the section provides that the premises shall be of a certain value, depending upon specified circumstances. I think, therefore, that this section is intended to extend only to licences first applied for after the passing of the Act, as distinguished from the renewal of licences previously granted. The Legislature probably did not wish to interfere with vested interests, because it would be in some cases a hardship upon a man who has had a licence for many years, without any complaint of his conduct, to be compelled to find other premises, or to increase the value of those he occupies, either of which courses may be beyond his means or beyond physical possibility." For these reasons, with great respect to the Lord Chief Justice and my brother Lawrance, I am unable to agree with their decision, which, in my opinion, must be reversed and that of the quarter sessions restored.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that I should have been better satisfied if it were possible to adopt the construction arrived at by the Divisional Court, and to say that a substantial compliance with the provisions of the statute is all that is necessary, because the objection which has been taken to the renewal of the licence seems to me to be technical in the highest degree. This, however, is a test case, stated for the purpose of having the question determined whether the continuity of the licence must be maintained. It seems to me that the matter is reasonably clear. It is said that, as the premises were licensed at the time of the passing of the Licensing Act, 1872, they are indelibly impressed with the exemption as to value conferred by section 45 of that Act. That contention must be considered with reference to this scheme of legislation and the practice of justices with respect to the renewal of licences. It is important to bear in mind that there may be a fresh grant of a licence, or there may be the renewal of a licence where the licence is in effect continued as a fresh grant. I first approach the consideration of section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, under which justices cannot refuse a renewal certificate in the case of a licence for the sale of beer to be consumed on the premises, which was in force on the 1st of May, 1869, except on one or more of four specified grounds. That section is prospective in its character, and contemplates a future time when the question will arise whether a particular licence was "in force" on the 1st of May, 1869. It seems to me to be clear that the section contemplated the continuance of the licence from some date prior to the 1st of May, 1869, down to the date when the question arises, in the only way in which a licence can be continued—namely, by renewal from time to time. A licence cannot be said to have been "in force" on the 1st of May, 1869, unless it has been continuously renewed. If any doubt existed upon that matter, it has been removed by section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1870, which provides that section 19 of the Act of 1869 shall extend to licences granted by way of renewal from time to time of licences in force on the 1st of May, 1869, whether such licences continue to be held by the same person or have been or may be transferred to any other person. That was passed to remove a doubt, which seems to have existed, whether the transfer of a licence would not destroy its continuity. It makes it plain that section 19 is dealing with the case of a licence continued from time to time by way of renewal. That is the construction which I should place upon that section if I were unaided by the light of authority; but there is the very highest authority upon the point, in the decision of the House of Lords in Freer v. Murray, that this is the true construction of the section.

I now come to section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which in its first clause provides that premises to which at the time of the passing of the Act no licence under the Acts recited in the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, authorizing the sale of beer or wine for consumption thereupon is attached, shall not be subject to any of the provisions now in force prescribing a certain rent, or value, or rating as a qualification for receiving any such licence. That clause is somewhat obscure, and has puzzled and embarrassed commentators and counsel. The second clause is more intelligible. It runs thus: "Premises not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption thereupon shall not be qualified to receive a licence authorizing such sale" unless they are of a certain value, which, if applicable to this case, would be the yearly value of £30. On what footing does the present case stand? We must see whether the premises were "not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption thereupon." To my mind we must construe that clause in a manner similar to the construction which has been placed upon section 19 of the Act of 1869. Reading it thus, it refers to those premises which were licensed at the time of the passing of this Act, and which continued licensed in the only way in which they could be continued licensed—namely, by the licence being renewed from time to time. The effect is to except those premises from the requirements of the section as to value. Continuity is of the very essence of the privilege intended to be preserved by the section. I do not think it is necessary to go through the cases, as they have already been referred to by the Master of the Rolls. They received the stamp of final approval in the House of Lords in Freer v. Murray. It is said that, in placing this construction on section 45, we are adding words to the Act. To my mind we are doing nothing of the kind. We are construing the section by saying that, to bring a case within the exception, there must be continuity in the licence by way of renewal. As I have said, I should feel disposed, if it were possible, to support the decision of the Divisional Court. But I can see no distinction in principle between the short break in the continuity of the licence in the present case, and a break of much longer duration. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: The question raised by this appeal is whether it is lawful for justices, if in their discretion they think fit so to do, to grant a licence by way of renewal for the Council Inn at Manchester, a beerhouse which has been continuously licensed since 1868 with an exception of two days in 1886, the house being of an annual value less than £30, but exceeding £15. Although the interval during which the house was not licensed was extremely short, there has been a breach of continuity. The general discretionary power of the justices under the Act of 1828 was limited by section 1 of the Act of 1840, which prohibited the grant of a licence in a city like Manchester unless the value of the house was £15 per annum. This was the Act in force when the licence was first granted to the Council Inn. In 1872 an Act was passed altering the law in some respects, and the extent of the alteration now arises for our consideration. By section 46 the section of the Act of 1840 to which I have referred was amended in an unimportant point, but as so amended it remained in full force. Section 45, so far as material, is in the following words: "Premises to which at the time of the passing of this Act no licence under the Acts recited in the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, authorizing the sale of beer or wine for consumption thereupon is attached, shall not be subject to any of the provisions now in force prescribing a certain rent or value or rating as a qualification for receiving any such licence. Premises not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption thereupon shall not be qualified to receive a licence authorizing such sale unless the following conditions are satisfied." One of these conditions is that in a place such as Manchester the value must be £30 per annum. Now as a matter of construction it seems to me that this Council Inn, which was licensed in 1872 under the Act of 1840, is not within the enacting part of the section which imposes new conditions. It is expressly excluded from the operation of section 45, and is left subject to the Act of 1840. There is nothing to suggest that it can ever be brought within the operation of section 45. There are two classes of houses subject to distinct statutory provisions. If, therefore, I am at liberty to construe the Act of 1872 apart from authority, I think the view taken by the Lord Chief Justice and Lawrance, J., is correct, though I prefer to arrive at the same conclusion by relying not so much upon the opening words of section 45 as upon the unrepealed section of the Act of 1840. It is, however, argued that we are bound by principles laid down by the House of Lords in Freer v. Murray, to hold that the enacting part of section 45 applies to every case where there has not been an absolutely continuous enjoyment of a licence from 1872 downwards. I have not, however, been able to satisfy myself that there is any such analogy between section 19 of the Act of 1869, which was under discussion in Freer v. Murray, and section 45 of the Act of 1872 as would compel me to construe the latter as the appellant justices desire. Section 19 was a restriction upon the discretionary power of the justices under the Act of 1828. It disabled them from refusing a certificate in respect of a certain class of houses except for specified reasons. It applied only to licences "in force" on the 1st of May, 1869, where "an application for a certificate" was made. It was held by the Court of Queen's Bench that the application there referred to was an application for a renewal only, and that when once a licence had been dropped a subsequent applicant could not claim the benefit of the section. This was the interpretation put upon it by Parliament in subsequent declaratory statutes, and was adopted by the House of Lords. But there are no similar words in the Act of 1872. There is no reference to an application. The only reference is to the house itself. I do not feel the force of the objection that Parliament in 1872 must be considered to have had in view only the protection of vested interests. In truth, there is no vested interest under section 19 or otherwise to be protected in the case of the Council Inn. The renewal of the licence may be refused by the justices if they think fit, but I am not prepared to say that they are precluded from granting an application for renewal merely on the ground that the annual value of the house is not £30. It is needless to say that I have felt great hesitation in differing from the Master of the Rolls and Mathew, L.J. But after mature reflection I am unable to dissent from the view adopted by the Divisional Court.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. } Aug. 8, 12, 1902.

DAVIS v. TOWN PROPERTIES INVESTMENT CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Assignment of reversion—Acts done by assignees upon land acquired by them subsequently to the lease, and not from or under the lessor—Breach of covenant—Interference with access of air to chimneys.

In a covenant in a lease that the lessee shall peaceably enjoy the lands demised without any disturbance by the lessor or his assigns, or any person lawfully claiming from or under him, the latter words mean lawfully claiming under him the right to do the acts which cause the disturbance A covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease must be construed with reference to the state of things at the date of the covenant, and cannot be enlarged so as to include acts done upon land subsequently acquired by an assignee of the reversion.

L. demised offices to the plaintiff with a covenant that the plaintiff should peaceably enjoy the offices without any disturbance by the lessor or his assigns, or any person lawfully claiming from or under him. L. afterwards assigned the reversion after the term to the defendant company. The defendants subsequently acquired the house next door to the demised offices, and having pulled it down rebuilt it much higher, and thus prevented the access of air to the chimneys of the offices and caused them to smoke.

Held, that, as the defendants had acted, not under colour of any title as assignees of the reversion, but in exercise of an independent right of property, acquired aliunde, and after the original lease, they had not committed any breach of the covenant.

In June, 1897, a lease was granted by one Lee to the plaintiff David Davis of offices on the ground floor of No. 119, Colmore-row, Birmingham, for a term of fourteen years from September, 1897, at a yearly rent of £100. The lease contained a covenant for quiet enjoyment in the form hereafter mentioned. In September, 1898, the reversion in the offices No. 119, Colmore-row expectant upon the determination of the lease was assigned by Lee, the lessor, to the defendant company, the Town Properties Investment Corporation (Limited). In the year 1900 the defendant company purchased from one Barber, who had no connection with Lee, a house next door to No. 119, Colmore-row, and proceeded to pull it down and to erect upon the site new buildings of much greater height than the old buildings. This caused the chimneys of the offices, No. 119, Colmore-row, of the plaintiff to smoke, so as materially to interfere with the quiet enjoyment of one of his rooms.

The covenant for quiet enjoyment in the lease was as follows: "And the lessor doth hereby covenant with the lessee that the lessee paying the rent hereby reserved and observing the covenants and conditions herein contained and on the part of the lessee to be observed and performed shall and may peacably and quietly possess and enjoy the said offices during the said term without any eviction or disturbance by the lessor or any person lawfully or equitably claiming from or under him." And it was provided that the expression "the lessor" should include the executors administrators and assigns of the lessor where the context allowed.

The plaintiff brought this action for a declaration that the acts of the defendant company constituted a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and for an injunction restraining the defendant company from allowing the buildings complained of to remain.

Norton, K.C., and E. Clayton, for plaintiff.—A covenant for quiet enjoyment is not confined to acts which affect the title to the lands granted. Any act which interferes with the enjoyment of the land by the lessee is a breach of such a covenant (Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-upon-Tweed, 33 W. R. 67, 13 Q. B. D. 547), and causing chimneys to smoke by interfering with access of air is such an act: Tebb v. Cave, 48 W. R. 318, [1900] 1 Ch. 642. It is in effect a personal covenant. It is here expressed to bind the assigns of the lessor and consequently they are personally bound also: David v. Sabin, 41 W. R. 398, [1893] 1 Ch. 523, 37 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL. 248.

Levett, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the defendant company.—The covenant must be construed with reference to the property of the lessor at the time it was made, and it cannot affect property subsequently acquired by him or his assigns: Booth v. Alcock, 21 W. R. 743, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 663. A covenant for quiet enjoyment does not enlarge the rights granted by the conveyance or lease (Leech v. Schweder, 22 W. R 633, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 463), and there could have been no grant or lease by the lessor or his assigns the defendant company, over the land adjoining the land leased at the date of the covenant. The act of the defendant company complained of was one which they had a right to do as owners of the adjoining land, and was not a direct interference with the property leased to the plaintiff, and consequently not within the covenant for quiet enjoyment even if done by the lessor: Harrison, Ainslie, & Co. v. Muncaster, 40 W. R. 102, [1891] 2 Q. B. 680, at pp. 684, 685. A covenant cannot be a personal covenant and at the same time run with the land. By section 11 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the lessor can bind his reversionary interest, but at the date of the covenant neither Lee nor the defendant company had any interest in the land upon which the buildings complained of are built. Upon the plaintiff's contention the operation would be fluctuating and enlarging as the owner of the reversion acquired fresh property. David v. Sabin is a different case. There the defendant had himself created the term out of which the incumbrances complained of were created. This action could not have been brought against Lee, as he has not, and never had, anything to do with this adjoining land. How, then, can it be brought against his assigns? The judgment of Fry, L.J., in Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-upon-Tweed must be taken with reference to the facts then before the court (per Lindley, L.J., in Bryant v. Lefever, 27 W. R. 612, L. R. 4 C. P. D. 172).

Aug. 12.—BYRNE, J.—The rebuilding with the ensuing result would not afford a right of action against a stranger: Bryant v. Lefever. On the other hand, it is such a substantial interference with the enjoyment of the property demised as to constitute a breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment if caused by the lessor or any person lawfully or equitably claiming from or under him within the meaning of the covenant in the lease: [His lordship then read the covenant and section 11 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.] The question here is whether or not the defendants are liable as for a breach of the covenant, they being assignees of the reversion of the demised premises; but not having done the act complained of under colour of any title as such assignees, but in exercise of an independent right of property acquired aliunde, and after the date of original lease, no question as to derogation from grant, or estoppel, arises. The true meaning and effect of covenants for quiet enjoyment as between lessor and lessee was fully considered in Harrison, Ainslie, & Co. v. Muncaster. Lord Esher, M.R., says in his judgment, 40 W. R., at p. 103, [1891] 2 Q. B., at p. 684: "In this case the first question is, Was the enjoyment of the plaintiffs' mine interrupted in the sense in which that word is interpreted in the covenant? I have no doubt that it was. Formerly it was thought that a covenant for quiet enjoyment only applied to an interference with the title of the covenantee, but upon more careful consideration it was held that it applied to an interference with the enjoyment of the thing demised; and it seems clear that there may be an interference with the enjoyment of property without any interruption to or interference with the title to it. The case of Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-upon-Tweed is a clear authority that the interruption contemplated by the covenant need not necessarily be an interference with the title, but may extend to an interference with the enjoyment; and that decision interpreted in that way was, in my opinion, authorized by the case of Shaw v. Stenton, 6 W. R. 327, 2 H. & N. 858, but it goes no further. In the first-named case Fry, L.J., who gave the judgment of the court, has stated an abstract proposition, and has used words which, if regarded merely as the statement of an abstract proposition, would carry the liability of the person giving such a covenant to a great length; but, looking at the words used, and bearing in mind what was the subject-matter of that particular case, it will be seen that our decision in the present case is entirely consistent with, and within the meaning of the language used in that judgment. 'It appears to us to be in every case a question of fact whether the quiet enjoyment of the land has or has not been interrupted.' That is the first proposition, and in this case I shall determine that question of fact in favour of the plaintiffs; for to swamp a man's mines so that he cannot work them is certainly to interrupt the enjoyment of them. The judgment goes on, 'And where the ordinary and lawful enjoyment of the demised land is substantially interfered with by the acts of the lessor,' that is, by the acts of the person who has entered into the covenant, 'or those lawfully claiming under him.' I pause there for a minute. Not only must the enjoyment be interrupted, but it must be interrupted by the acts of the lessor or those claiming under him.' The last words require some definition and limitation. Considering what was being discussed I have no doubt that the proper meaning of these words is 'by the acts of the lessor or of those claiming under him the right to do the acts which caused the interruption.'"

It appears to me that the acts done by the defendants were not done by them claiming the right to do such acts as authorized by or claiming under the plaintiff's lessor, but in exercise of their rights under an independent title acquired subsequently to the date of the covenant. I think that the covenant must be construed having regard to the circumstances which existed at the date of the lease, and that the assignees of the reversion cannot be held liable for acts lawfully done under an independent title created subsequently to the lease. David v. Sabin, relied on by the plaintiff, is not an authority for the proposition that assignees of a reversion in one property are by reason of the existence of a covenant for quiet enjoyment thereby precluded from making lawful use of another property acquired by them in good faith. There is much force in Mr. Levett's observation that to hold the plaintiff entitled to relief would be to hold that the rights and liabilities under the covenant are not defined as at the date of the covenant, but that they are liable to grow as the covenantor acquires new properties. I think that the case of Booth v. Alcock supports the view that the obligations of the lessor are to be considered as at the date of the lease. On consideration of the whole case I am of opinion that the plaintiff fails.

WATTS v. BUCKNALL. (a.)

Company—Prospectus—Non-disclosure of contracts—"Knowingly issue"—Waiver clause—Contracts to be waived not fairly disclosed—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.

The defendant, who was a director of a company, took part in issuing a prospectus inviting persons to subscribe for shares in the company. The prospectus did not disclose certain material contracts which had been entered into, as required by section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. It, however, contained a clause stating that contracts relating to the formation and promotion of the company had been entered into, and that these "are, or may be," within the 38th section of the Act, and that applicants for shares were to be deemed to have waived all claims against directors and others for the section not being more fully complied with. The defendant did not know of the undisclosed contracts, and was content to leave the statements of the prospectus to others without further inquiry. The plaintiff took shares upon the faith of the prospectus and without notice of the previous contracts, and upon learning of them brought an action against the defendant for compensation.

Held, that the defendant had "knowingly issued" the prospectus, and that under the circumstances his ignorance of the undisclosed contracts was no answer to the action.

Held, also, that the waiver clause did not fairly disclose what it was that the intending investor should waive, and therefore did not protect the defendant from liability for non-disclosure of the contract.

Action.

This was an action by a shareholder of a company against a director for having omitted from the prospectus any mention of material contracts entered into prior to its issue.

The company in question was the Worcestershire Brewery and Malting Co. (Limited), which was incorporated in December, 1896, for the purpose of acquiring two breweries known as "Bucknall's Brewery" and the "Delph Brewery," and certain licensed houses, plant, and effects of these breweries. In the same month a prospectus was issued inviting persons to subscribe for shares in the company.

The defendant, T. S. Bucknall, was one of the directors of the company, and his name so appeared upon the prospectus, and he took part in its preparation.

The prospectus gave (among other things) particulars of the property to be purchased and the purchase price, and stated that the vendors (who promoted the company and had acquired the properties to resell at a profit) were to pay the whole of the expenses of formation and registration of the company, except certain stamp duties and legal charges, and that a contract for purchase had been entered into, being an agreement dated the 1st day of December, 1896, between E. S. Claremont (who represented the vendors) of the one part and H. Broadbridge as a trustee on behalf of the company of the other part, and that copies of the contract could be inspected at the office of the company by applicants for shares until allotment. It also contained the following clause:

"During the negotiations for the purchase of the properties and the formation of the company contracts have been entered into between various parties with reference to the formation and promotion of the company, and the subscription of its capital, but to none of which the company is a party. The businesses agreed to be purchased, or some of them, will be taken over subject to all existing contracts, which are of the ordinary trade character. The contracts referred to in this paragraph are, or may be, contracts within the meaning of the 38th section of the Companies Act, 1867, and accordingly applicants for shares are to be deemed to have notice of the said contracts, and to have agreed with the company (as trustee for the directors and other persons liable) to waive all claims, if any, against them for not more fully complying with the requirements of the said section, and allotments will only be made upon this express condition."

The contract of the 1st of December, 1896, mentioned in the prospectus was one for the purchase of the properties of the company for £440,000. It provided, by clause 3, that the vendor should show a good title to the hereditaments purchased "in accordance with the contracts under which he purchased the same."

The plaintiff upon the faith of the prospectus applied for and had allotted to him upon the terms of the prospectus twenty 5½ per cent. preference shares of £10 each in the company, for which he paid £200. He subsequently discovered that prior to the issue of the prospectus there had been other contracts connected with the formation of the company which were admitted to be material to be disclosed; from some of these contracts it appeared that the vendors had agreed to purchase the properties sold to the company at a less amount than the sale price to the company. He therefore brought this action alleging that the shares he had taken were of no value, and he claimed a declaration that the defendant was liable to pay him compensation for his loss.

The defendant alleged that he did not know of the existence of the undisclosed contracts at the time of the issue of the prospectus. Further particulars of his knowledge and conduct at that time will be found in the judgment of the learned judge.

Norton, K.C., and J. Ricardo, for the plaintiff.—The prospectus is fraudulent on the part of the defendant under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, because it omits to disclose material contracts. The defendant cannot be heard to say that he did not know of those contracts, as the contract of the 1st of December, 1896, mentioned in the prospectus mentions these previous contracts. Nor will the waiver clause in the prospectus save the defendant from liability. It does not sufficiently disclose the rights to be waived. It is tricky and misleading. There were admittedly contracts already entered into which were material to be disclosed, and yet it says that these contracts "are, or may be," within the 38th section: Greenwood v. Leathershod Wheel Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 421, 48 W. R. Dig. 35, and Cackett v. Keswick, 50 W. R. 10 (now under appeal).

They also referred to: Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R. 701, 2 C. P. D. 469; Sullivan v. Mitcalfe, 29 W. R. 181, L. R. 5 C. P. D. 455; and Arnison v. Smith, 37 W. R. 739, 41 Ch. D. 348.

Levett, K.C., Rowden, K.C., and A. M. Bremmer, for the defendant.—The defendant did not know of the existence of the contracts in question, and did not knowingly issue the prospectus. To "knowingly issue" you must intentionally omit the contracts: see observations of Cockburn, C.J., in Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R., at p. 717, 2 C. P. D., at p. 542; of Farwell, J., in Baty v. Keswick, 50 W. R. 14; and of Lindley, L.J., in Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82, at p. 103. Next, a waiver clause is valid: see Buckley on Companies (8th ed.), p. 656. The waiver clause here is not misleading, it sufficiently refers to all the contracts the omission of which is complained of. They all had reference "to the formation and promotion of the company." If they had not done so they would not have been material to be disclosed: Greenwood v. Leathershod Wheel Co. is distinguishable, for there the promoter was stipulating for his own contract to be waived. Again, the plaintiff must show that, if he had known of the undisclosed contracts he would not have taken his shares, and he has not done so.

Norton, in reply.—"Knowingly issue" means issue knowing of the prospectus. It does not refer to the contracts to be disclosed.

At the conclusion of the arguments his lordship said that he would reserve his judgment until after the Court of Appeal had given judgment in Cackett v. Keswick.

Aug. 5.—BUCKLEY, J.—Most of the legal considerations involved in the present case have so recently been stated by Farwell, J., in the case of Cackett v. Keswick, affirmed on appeal since the present case was heard, 71 L. J. Ch. 641, 50 W. R. Dig. 32, that it is unnecessary now to repeat them. It has been clearly proved before me that the plaintiff applied for his shares upon the faith of the prospectus without notice of the contracts, and also that the defendant was a director "knowingly issuing" the same within the meaning of the section. It is not disputed that one or more of the contracts in respect of which the statutory requirements have not been complied with, were material to be known by an intending applicant for shares, and the substantial defences are, first, that the defendant did not in fact know of the existence of these particular contracts; and, secondly, that the plaintiff has waived any right he might otherwise have possessed by the terms of his application for shares and of the prospectus, the application being for an allotment upon the terms of the prospectus. The defendant took part in the preparation of the prospectus. Prior to 1889 he had been proprietor of Bucknall's Brewery. But in April of that year he had disposed of it. He read the whole of the prospectus. He did not ask to see the contract for purchase therein mentioned, Claremont to Broadbridge, of the 1st of December, 1896; he says he may have seen it, but did not read its contents. He never asked what the contracts were which were referred to in the waiver clause. Upon his own evidence he left all the matters referred to on the last page of the prospectus to the legal men, and he was willing to leave those statements to others, and again he says: "Any statements as to legal matters I was content to take from my co-directors. As to such matters as I did not understand and did not ask about, I was content to rely on my co-directors and the solicitors." I have not to deal with a case where a director has made inquiry about the contracts, or where he never had notice of the existence of contracts, or where, having attempted to discover the truth, he has himself been deceived, nor is it a case where he has been advised by his legal advisers that particular contracts are not such as need be referred to in the prospectus. He has been content simply to take the statements in the prospectus as they stand without further inquiry, and he has wilfully—that is, with knowledge that he is doing so—abstained from inquiry. It appears to me that this state of circumstances does not afford an answer to the fraud to be imputed in consequence of statutory enactment by reason of the omission to mention material contracts. The 38th section imposes an obligation the breach of which renders the director of a company as liable as he would have been independently of the section in an action of deceit, had it been proved that he had acted fraudulently—that is, if he had wilfully made a misrepresentation, or had made a representation recklessly and without caring whether the statement was true or false. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the 38th section has no application in cases where a director could prove that he was too careless to verify what he was putting forward in the prospectus, or even where he joined in putting forward a prospectus simply because his co-directors asked him to do so. He is responsible for what is stated in the prospectus, and in cases under the 38th section he is responsible as for a fraudulent document. I am disposed to think that, having regard to the terms of the section, the plea of ignorance on the part of a director can only be maintained where the facts would enable him to establish a right to say that the prospectus was not a document for which he was responsible, or, in other words, that he had in fact been defrauded or deceived into giving his sanction to a document which was not his.

The other point is as to the effect of the waiver clause in the prospectus; and it is now clearly established that a man may waive or release his statutory right to have the date and names of parties to material contracts set out in a prospectus. Every device to avoid giving to intending shareholders that information which the law says they should have is from time to time resorted to. My view is that it is a true statement of the law to say that no protection can be afforded to those responsible for the issue of a prospectus under a waiver clause which they invited subscribers to submit themselves to, unless they fairly disclose what is the nature of the rights which they ask should be released or waived. Large print, little print, italics, red ink, and other attractive devices in other parts of the prospectus to lead the unwary away from the true path of inquiry are only specimens of the art of deceiving, and an apparent candour may be a most potent engine of deception. In the present case there are at least six documents proved besides that mentioned in the prospectus (I leave out those not satisfactorily proved) to disclose which would have had a most material bearing upon a decision whether or not to apply for shares, and I do not think that the present prospectus sufficiently discloses the fact, which appears from the documents not specifically mentioned in the prospectus, of the enormous loading in the way of promotion profits which was in existence at the date of its issue. I say that the prospectus does not fairly disclose what it is that the intending investor is asked to waive; and I notice particularly the words "are or may be" in respect of contracts about which there is not a shadow of doubt. I find also the collocation of ordinary trade contracts with promoting contracts. These are elements in arriving at the conclusion I have come to, which is that there is not an honest and fair statement of the nature of the contracts which persons applying are invited to waive. There must be judgment for the plaintiff for £200 and interest at 4 per cent. from the date at which the last dividend was paid, and costs.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Berkshire County Court, sitting at Reading, holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession of about half an acre of land situate in the manor of Barkham.

In 1837 the then lord of the manor granted a lease of the land to one Pothecary for ninety-nine years or three lives, whichever period expired first.

The plaintiff, in 1882, purchased certain hereditaments, including the defendant's land, and a conveyance was executed, but by some error the land in question was not conveyed to him.

In 1884 a conveyance was executed by Mr. Leveson Gower, the then lord of the manor, conveying to the plaintiff the manor of Barkham and certain other hereditaments.

In 1885 Pothecary surrendered his lease to the plaintiff.

The last of the three lives died on the 4th of February, 1895.

In 1900 a conveyance was executed at the vendor's expense, reciting that by a clerical error a certain hereditament had been omitted from the conveyance of 1882 conveying to the plaintiff the land in question, and in August, 1901, the plaintiff commenced this action for ejectment.

The defendant claimed the benefit of the Statute of Limitations.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

St. Gerrans, for the defendant.—By reason of the surrender in 1885 the lease became merged in the freehold, and the statute runs as against the plaintiff from that date. The property in question did pass by the deeds of 1882 and 1884. The plaintiff had then acquired a good title, and could have turned the defendant out: Rankin v. M'Murtry, 24 L. R. Ir. C. L. 290. Then the period fixed by section 2 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, is six years. It is clear law that a lease for years can be a particular estate (White v. Earl of Devon, 45 W. R. 27, [1896] 2 Ch. 562) and this is a particular estate on which a future estate is expectant within the meaning of the section.

Buckmaster, K.C. (Walsh with him), for the plaintiff.—The deeds of 1882 and 1884 did not pass the property to the plaintiff. But even if they did, the surrender by Pothecary would not accelerate plaintiff's right as against the defendant, who had acquired an absolute right as against Pothecary. Pothecary's title was gone and he had nothing he could assign to anyone else: Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Rowe, 29 W. R. 159, 5 App. Cas. 736. As regards the second point, the words of the second section of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, do not apply to this case. It is admitted that a lease may be a particular estate, but the language of the section is directed to lands in settlement and not to leases created by the owner.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case the county court judge has decided that Mr. Walter, the plaintiff, made out a good title to justify a judgment in his favour to recover possession of the messuage. The material facts appear to be that in 1837 the then lord of the manor leased the property to a gentleman named Pothecary for ninety-nine years or three lives; and it is agreed that the last of these lives dropped on the 4th of February, 1895. It is said, and the conveyance appears to have been put in, that in 1867 Mr. Yalden, the defendant, purchased the property as a freehold from somebody of the name of Watts, and there is nothing before us to show that Yalden at any time held under Pothecary or purported to be his assignee or sub-lessee. In 1882 there was a conveyance to Mr. John Walter of certain named lands, and it is said that this particular property was intended to have been conveyed by that deed. The conveyance of the property was by plan and schedule of the property, and one can see that the coloured plan does not include this particular site. In 1901 there was a conveyance of this specific piece of property, and the conveyance recites that it was omitted by accident from the conveyance of 1882. In 1884 there was a conveyance of the manor of Barkham by Mr. Leveson Gower to Mr. John Walter, and of certain other properties which were not shown to be lands of the manor, and which, upon the face of the conveyance, as I read it, if I am right, are not stated to be lands of the manor. In 1885 Mr. John Walter, stating that he had got, and no doubt believing that he had got, the freeholds of the manor, and that he had also got the freehold of the property which had been the subject of this lease, accepts a surrender from Pothecary. Now, it has been argued by Mr. Buckmaster that we ought to assume that Mr. John Walter, or, rather, the present plaintiff, did not get the property except under these deeds of 1882 and 1901. We are not prepared to decide that question. We are not prepared to say that we can base our judgment upon the view that the property may not have passed under the conveyance of 1884; and if it had been necessary to deal with that particular matter for the purpose of deciding the rights of the parties it is possible there might have to be some further inquiry. I do not know that we have sufficiently considered what is the actual effect of the lease of 1837 and the conveyance of 1884, but there certainly may have been some ground for the argument which Mr. St. Gerrans has addressed to us, that Mr. John Walter was entitled to the freehold in 1884, and that, therefore, there was a surrender. There are two other points, both of which must, in our opinion, be decided in favour of the plaintiff. It is first contended that by virtue of the provisions of the second section of the Real Property Limitation Act of 1874 the important period in this case was six years from the death of the last life in the leases —namely, 1895. It was contended that the term of years was a particular estate under that section, and that the estate taken by the reversioner was a future estate or interest under that section. I think it is clear, on the consideration of the arguments which have been addressed to us, that that cannot be maintained. If that were so, a person who granted a lease is entitled to the reversion as a future estate within the meaning of that section. I do not think it is possible to maintain that argument, and I think that that section was intended to apply to future estates created by the reversioner, and certainly not to the mere reversion itself after the term of years, and therefore the argument that the term must be limited to six years from the expiration of the leasehold term seems to me to fail.

The other point is certainly one which is of some difficulty, and has merited the very able argument which has been addressed to us. It was suggested, on behalf of the appellant, that inasmuch as there was, or assuming there was, a surrender to a person entitled to the freehold in 1885, therefore for the purpose we are now considering the time must be taken to have commenced to run in 1885. Mr. Buckmaster's argument is that that is not so, and that the effect of the possession by Mr. Yalden is that he had acquired a right which could not be defeated by the lessee, or by the reversioner during the term of the lease. It is contended by the appellant that as the trespasser acquires that which would be a fee simple, that as soon as the term is merged in the freehold the time runs, and that you cannot look to the unexpired term of the lease in order to fix the time when the Statute of Limitations begins to run. One or two considerations show that argument cannot be right. It is quite plain that if Mr. Yalden has by so many years' possession acquired the right to the possession of the property as against Pothecary, the latter could not deprive him, so to speak, of any right he has gained by assignment or by underlease, and it seems to me to follow, not that the person who is in possession becomes liable on the covenants of the lease, or is to be treated as being in the position of the lessee, but that the surrender cannot operate so as to deprive him of the title he has got as against the persons against whom he is entitled to claim possession. It seems to me that that is really what is intended to be expressed in the passage which has been read from Darby and Bosanquet's book, at p. 294. In other words, if you apply it to the ordinary case of a lease, the ordinary right of a landlord to resume possession does not arise until the lease has expired. The trespasser is in possession. The landlord may not know or does not know under what terms he has originally entered, or how he has got into his possession; but it seems to me that the right of entry of the landlord does not arise for the purpose of ascertaining the commencement of the period of limitation, until the expiration of the term, otherwise you would enable the person against whom the possession was rightfully claimed by virtue of the length of holding to defeat the operation of that possession in his own favour by some transaction which the person who has been in possession for twenty years was not a party to. The result is this, that even assuming for the purpose of the argument—though I express no opinion upon it—that the freehold was Mr. John Walter's in the year 1885, the time under the Statute of Limitations did not commence to run until the expiration of the lease granted in the year 1837, and therefore that Mr. Walter's claim is not barred. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the county court judge was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

DARLING, J.—I agree.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the important and difficult question we have to consider is whether or not anyone got a right of entry in 1885 upon the execution of this deed which purports to be a surrender of the lease. I think the law is that a lessee can only give title to his lessor by a surrender to the same extent that he could give title to another person by his assignment. If he has created underleases, these leases remain, notwithstanding his surrender; and if he has created underleases he cannot assign his term to anyone else so as to put an end to those underleases. But that, I think, is only an illustration of what he can and cannot do. The point is, that he has no power to effect by a surrender what he could not do by an assignment to a third person, the reason being that he cannot convey to his landlord any more than to anyone else, anything that he has not got himself. Then if that is so, inasmuch as in 1885 Pothecary had lost all title as against the persons in possession of this particular land, he could not have assigned a right of entry to anybody else, and no more could he assign it to his lessor. The result is that no right of entry arose in the lessor, whoever he was, Mr. Leveson Gower or Mr. Walter, and no right of entry arose until the last life dropped on the 4th of February, 1895. In that view it is unnecessary to consider whether or not in 1885 Mr. Walter had got the legal estate in this land or a mere equity. Personally I am inclined to think that, so far as we do know the facts, the deed of 1884 had conveyed to him not only the manor, but all rights whatever they were that Mr. Leveson Gower had got in reference to this piece of land that had been leased in 1837. I think it did myself, but I agree that we ought to know something further about the facts before we can definitely decide this matter. But in the view we are taking it is quite unnecessary to decide that question one way or the other. The only remaining question is, assuming that the right of entry arose on the 4th of February, 1895—which, I understand was more than six years before the commencement of these proceedings—whether the period within which the action was to be brought was six years or twelve. That depends on the statute of 1874, and as to that, although it is admitted by Mr. Buckmaster that the term of years may be a particular estate, yet he says, and I think rightly says, that the reversion expectant on a term of years cannot be a future estate within the meaning of the words "if the person last entitled to any particular estate on which any future estate or interest was expectant"; if it is not a future estate within the meaning of that, the estate or interest of the lessor is an existing estate all during the term of the lease, and it cannot be considered to be a future estate. It is observable that the words "future estate" come in in the latter part of the section, not in the earlier part. The earlier part clearly does relate to a landlord coming into possession on the expiration of a term of years. This part does not refer to that, but to something else, and the reason of it, in all probability, is that, in other cases, the person coming into possession does claim through his predecessor. He claims through a similar title, whereas the lessor claims in a totally different way at the expiration of the title which he himself has created.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Bankruptcy—Extradition—Property found on bankrupt at date of arrest—Retention by police—Claim by trustee in bankruptcy—Evidence of crime—Order for delivery up of property—"Competent authority" to make order—Belgian Extradition Treaty, 1876. art. 12—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 10.

The police magistrate who orders the extradition of a prisoner to Belgium is "the competent authority" to order the delivery of the property found upon the prisoner to the Belgian authorities under article 12 of the Belgian Extradition Treaty, 1876 (Hertslet's Treaties, vol. 14, p. 172).

Application by the trustee in bankruptcy for the delivery up of property found on and in possession of the bankrupts at the date of their arrest and retained by the police.

The bankrupt Borovsky was a Russian subject domiciled in London, and the bankrupt Weinbaum was a naturalized British subject.

They carried on in partnership the business of dealers in precious stones in London and Antwerp under the style of "Borovsky & Weinbaum."

On the 10th of March, 1902, they were arrested in London on an extradition warrant granted at the instance of the Belgian Government for offences committed in Belgium.

The police found upon them or in their offices certain bills of exchange, jewels, and cash, some of which were alleged to be material evidence for the prosecution instituted in Belgium.

On the 14th of March a receiving order was made against the bankrupts. They were adjudicated bankrupt, and Mr. Salaman was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy.

On the 19th of March they were made bankrupt in Belgium, where a M. Yseux was appointed curator of their estate.

On the 19th of April the police magistrate at Bow-street made an order for the extradition of the bankrupts, but declined to make any order as to the property found upon them, on the ground that he was not "the competent authority" to do so within article 12 of the Belgian Extradition Treaty, 1876 (see Hertslet's Treaties, vol. 14, p. 172), which is as follows:

"12. Every article found in the possession of the individual claimed at the time of his arrest shall, if the competent authority so decide, be seized, in order to be delivered up with his person at the time when the surrender shall be made. Such delivery shall not be limited to the property or articles obtained by stealing or by fraudulent bankruptcy, but shall extend to everything that may serve as proof of the crime. . . . The rights of third parties with regard to the said property or articles are nevertheless reserved."

The magistrate having declined to make any order, the property remained in the custody of the Commissioner of Police, against whom the trustee in the English bankruptcy made the present application. The curator in the Belgian bankruptcy also appeared and made a claim to the property.

Muir Mackenzie, for the English trustee, applied that the property should be handed to the trustee as forming part of the property of the bankrupts divisible among their creditors.

Sutton, for the Commissioner of Police, opposed the application on the ground that the usual practice was for the police to hand over such property found on a prisoner as was evidence of the crime with which he was charged.

He cited Dillon v. O'Brien, 16 Cox Cr. Cas. 245, 35 W. R. Dig. 64.

Edwardes Jones appeared for the Belgian curator.

WRIGHT, J., held that the magistrate was "the competent authority" to order the delivery of the property to the Belgian authorities, and directed the commissioner of police to apply to him for such an order. His lordship also intimated that application might be made to the Home Secretary for the inclusion of a stipulation in the order of extradition that the property should be returned to the authorities in England after the conclusion of the trial in Belgium in order that it might be handed over to the trustee in the English bankruptcy without prejudice to the rights of the Belgian creditors to prove in the English bankruptcy.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } July 29, 1902.

NEW RIVER CO. v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE HERTFORD UNION. (a.)

Poor law — Rating — Rateable value — Waterworks — Intake from river — Sum paid for right to take water — Assessment.

A waterworks company had the right by statute to take a certain amount of water from a river by means of an intake where there was a building containing appliances for measuring the water passing through the intake into a channel communicating therewith. The company were required by statute to pay to the conservators of the river certain sums for the right to take the water.

Held, that, in rating the intake, beyond the ordinary value of the land with the building on it its enhanced value in respect of its special fitness for taking water from the river and the user made of it for that purpose must be taken into account, but that the sums paid for the water were not elements in its rateable value.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (49 W. R. 619, [1901] 2 K. B. 620) reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Ridley and Bigham, JJ.) on a case stated by the court of quarter sessions for the Hertford Division of the county of Hertford upon an appeal against a rate whereby the New River Co. were rated in the sums of £787 plus £3,280 gross and £650 plus £3,180 rateable value. The case is reported in 49 W. R 619, [1901] 2 K. B. 620.

1. The history of the New River Co. and of their right to take water from the River Lea is contained in their charter and in the following statutes: 3 James 1, c. xviii.; 12 Geo. 2, c. xxxii.; the Lea Navigation Improvement Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. cix.); the River Lea Water Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. cxcvi.); the Lea Conservancy Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. cliv.); the Lea Conservancy Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxvii.)

2. Shortly stated, the facts appearing from the said charter and statutes are as follows:

3. The New River Co. were formed under a charter granted in 1618 by King James I. for the purpose of bringing water from certain springs at Chadwell and Amwell, in the county of Hertford, to London.

4. For many years prior to the year 1738 the company had taken considerable quantities of water out of the River Lea, the point of intake being at a place called Chalk Island, in a channel of the River Lea called the Manifold Ditch, from which the water so taken flowed by means of an artificial cutting into the New River.

5. In the year 1738, by the statute 12 Geo. 2, c. xxxii., the company were permitted under section 5 of the said Act to take a specified quantity of water from the River Lea through the Manifold Ditch, and the Manifold Ditch and the water running through it were (by section 11) vested in the company, who were directed (by section 17) to pay to the trustees appointed to carry out the Act two capital sums amounting to £3 250 and two annual sums amounting to £350. All those sums were (by section 18) to be applied to purposes relating to the navigation and purity of the water of the River Lea and the costs of passing the Act. The company were also required by section 3 of the said Act to keep in repair the lock near the Ware Mills.

6. In 1850 the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. cix. gave the trustees of the River Lea the right to sell surplus water from the River Lea to certain water companies, and the New River Co. for three years made an annual payment of £1,500 for water so purchased by them and supplied at an intake near Tottenham, in the county of Middlesex. The said intake has not been used since the year 1855, but it might still be used.

7. In 1855, by the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. cxcvi., ss. 4 and 5, the annual payments under the abovementioned statutes ceased, and in lieu of such payments an annual sum of £1,500 and a capital sum of £42,000 were directed to be paid by the New River Co. In return for the said payments and other payments to be made by the East London Waterworks Co. this statute (by section 9) vested in the New River Co. and the East London Waterworks Co. all the water flowing in the River Lea except so much as was required for navigation. The trustees of the River Lea were (by section 43) directed to expend £30,000 of the said capital sum of £42,000 in specified improvements relating to the navigation of that river. The Act also contained provisions for the regulation of the quantity of the water to be taken by the New River Co. from the River Lea through the Manifold Ditch, and required the company to construct a new gauge, which new gauge, with a house or building to contain the same with the requisite machinery, was erected by the company in or about the year 1859 near the point of intake.

8 In 1868, by the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. cliv., the New River Co. were directed (by section 103) to pay the annual sum of £600 to the Corporation of Hertford, and (by section 131) the New River Co. and the East London Waterworks Co. were directed to pay an additional aggregate yearly sum not exceeding £1,000 (of which the New River Co. were to pay one-third to the Conservators of the River Lea, who, by that Act, became the successors of the said trustees) for purposes therein specified relating to the purity of the water of the River Lea.

9. Since the year 1868 the New River Co. have paid to the conservators of the River Lea, under the said statutes, an annual sum of £1,833 6s. 8d., and have paid to the Corporation of Hertford an annual sum of £600.

10. By the Lea Conservancy Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxvii.), s. 25, which received the Royal assent on the 30th of July, 1900, from and after the 1st of January, 1901, the aggregate yearly sum payable by the New River Co. and the East London Waterworks Co. under section 5 of the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. cxcvi. (referred to in paragraph 7 hereof), is to be increased to £8,000, of which £3,750 is to be paid by the New River Co., and from and after the same date the additional aggregate yearly sum payable by the said two companies under section 131 of the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. cliv. (referred to in paragraph 8 hereof), is to be increased to £2 000, and that section is to be read and construed accordingly.

11. The parish of St. John Urban, in respect of which the rate in question was made, was formed under the Local Government Act, 1894, and comprised a portion of the previously existing parish of St. John, Hertford (the part within the borough of Hertford), and in addition thereto a part of the liberty of Little Amwell (such part as was within the borough aforesaid).

12. From 1876 to 1894 the New River Co.'s property in the said parish of St. John was rated at £350, and in the said liberty of Little Amwell at £500, and those figures had not been materially altered since 1859.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

13. Upon the new parish of St. John Urban being formed the property of the company therein was rated at £350 in respect of that portion which was in the parish of St. John, and at £300 in respect of that portion which was taken from the old liberty of Little Amwell. The portion left in the old liberty of Little Amwell, which had then been constituted the new parish of Little Amwell, was rated at £200. The rating of the property of the company in the new parish of St. John Urban therefore stood at the same valuation as in 1876.

14. Until January, 1900, the said property of the company in the parish of St. John Urban had never been assessed at more than £650 rateable value.

15. In January, 1900, by a supplemental valuation list, subsequently confirmed by the assessment committee, a further sum of £3,180 was added to the rateable value in the assessment of the said property in the occupation of the company under an entry in which the company were rated for property described as "Intake from the River Lee." On the 24th of May, 1900, the rate in question was made in accordance with the said supplemental valuation list. The following is a copy of the said rate:—

| No. | Name of Occupier. | Name of Owner. | Description of Property rated. | Name or Situation of Property. | Estimated Extent. | Gross Estimated Rental. | Rateable value of Buildings, &c. | Amount of Rate at 1s. 2¼d. in the £ on Agricultural Land and 2s. 6d. in the £ on other hereditaments. |
| | | | | | a. r. p. | £ | £ | £ s. d. |
| 132 | New River Company | New River Company | Chadwell Spring — portion of New River, gauge-house, sluice, and appurtenances | Kings Meads | 5 2 38 | 787 | 650 | 78 10 10 |
| 653 | New River Company | New River Company | Intake from River Lea | Kings Meads | — | 3,260 | 3,180 | 384 5 0 |

16. The company duly appealed against the said rate, the grounds of their said appeal, so far as they are material to this case, being—(1) that the company were overrated; (2) that the company did not occupy any rateable hereditament in the said parish coming within the description of intake from the River Lea; and (3) that no rateable hereditament coming within that description had any existence in the said parish.

17. The said appeal came on for hearing on the 15th of October, 1900, when the above-stated facts were proved or admitted.

18. It was further proved and admitted that the said sum of £3,180 was arrived at by the professional valuer who made the said supplemental valuation list by taking 4 per cent. upon the capital sum of £42,000 (namely, £1,680) and the annual sum of £1,500 directed to be paid under the above-mentioned statute of 1855, but the assessment committee admitted that, although these sums might be primâ facie evidence, they were not necessarily the measure of rateable value.

19. It was also proved that the actual intake from the River Lea consisted of a certain structure with the land upon which it stands, that the company had put a grating across the mouth or opening of the Manifold Ditch, where water issues from the said river, to prevent timber and other things from floating into the intake, and that they had erected posts in the bed of the river to protect the intake, and that they were in occupation of the said posts, and that in and by the item of £650 the said intake, grating, and posts were rated at their full structural value, that the area of the said land was about three poles, and that its annual value as land (apart from its user as an intake) did not exceed £5, which was also included in the said sum of £650. It is at this point that the specified quantity of water which the company are authorized to take from the River Lea enters the Manifold Ditch and flows thence into the New River.

20. For the assessment committee it was contended—(1) That beyond the rating of the intake at its structural value and value as land it ought to be rated in an additional sum as having an enhanced value in respect of the user made of it by taking water from the River Lea into the channel of the company; (2) that the sums of money which the company had paid under the said statutes were evidence that the land and the structure erected thereon had some additional value beyond the structural value thereof in respect of the user made of them as aforesaid, and that such additional value was sufficiently great to support the rate appealed against; (3) that the additional payments directed by section 25 of the Lea Conservancy Act, 1900, were evidence to show what (in the opinion of Parliament at the date of the passing of that Act) the user of the intake was worth to the company.

21. The company contended—(1) That all the rateable property of the company in the parish was already rated in the item £650; (2) that no addition ought to be made to the said assessment of £650 in respect of the water flowing over the said intake or of the user of the intake by such water flowing over it; (3) that the said intake ought not to be assessed upon or with reference to the moneys represented by the item £3,180, which were paid by the company for the purchase of water and the right to divert water from and control the water in the River Lea, or with reference to the sums payable under the said Act of 1900.

The court of quarter sessions dismissed the said appeal.

The question for the court was whether the said hereditament was rateable upon the principle contended for by the assessment committee. If it was so rateable the judgment was to stand; if not, then either the gross and rateable values were to be reduced respectively to the sums of £787 and £650, or the court was to make such other order herein as it should think just.

The Divisional Court allowed the appeal, and ordered that the rateable value should be reduced as contended for by the company.

The assessment committee appealed.

July 29.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment. This is an appeal from the Divisional Court reversing the decision of quarter sessions on a case stated by them. The question raised is on what principle ought the intake by means of which water passes from the River Lea on to the New River system to be rated. That the intake is a rateable hereditament in the occupation of the New River Co., though disputed before the assessment committee, is not now in controversy, nor can it be questioned that water passes through it in quantities measured by proper appliances on to the New River system. The real question, it seems to me, between the parties is that formulated by the New River Co. in paragraph 21 (2) of the case and answered by the assessment committee in paragraph 20 (1). Those paragraphs are respectively as follows: [His lordship read the paragraphs, and continued:] The case is, however, complicated by additional contentions formulated by each side respectively, while the quarter sessions have stated the question to be whether the said hereditament is rateable on "the principle" contended for by the assessment committee. If the quarter sessions mean by "the principle" that which I have set out above as formulated in the first paragraph of the assessment committee's contentions I should feel no hesitation in adopting it. I think it is right and the counter-contention of the New River Co. wrong. The authorities appear to me to be quite clear on this point. The New River Co. has by statute a very valuable right of appropriating water drawn from the River Lea. It is absolutely necessary for them to get access to the River Lea in order to appropriate that water in the given quantities, and the point at which they take it is fixed by statute, and is presumably the point best adapted to their needs. The land which they occupy for the purpose of securing and passing the water into their system must have an added value by reason of its special fitness for this purpose. If it were the only spot over which they could carry out the diversion and thus achieve the enjoyment of the valuable right conferred upon them, they would obviously be prepared to pay a high rent for its use, and a rate which ignored this element of value would be obviously wrong. This is one of the commonplaces of rating law, and it is not necessary to refer to authorities upon it It is repeated in many cases and is laid down in express terms in the case so much relied upon by the now respondents, Talargoch Mining Co v. St. Asaph Union, 16 W. R. 860, L. R. 3 Q. B. 478. So much for what seems to be the main point in the case before us.

There remains, however, the complication which I have referred to, and it is introduced by other findings. As appears by the case, large sums have been exacted by successive Acts of Parliament from the New River Co., presumably in return for the privileges conferred upon them. Now it is quite clear that no sum paid for a privilege not annexed to the land proposed to be rated ought to come into the discussion. The case just cited is a clear authority that a sum of money paid for the privilege of diverting a stream is not an element in arriving at the rateable value of the channel into which it was diverted. It is easy to give illustrations showing that this must be right in principle. Suppose a person buys the right to take and carry away all the gold in a given area, and suppose he is obliged to occupy other land in order to reach and carry away the gold. Could the price paid for the right to get the gold away be any element in measuring the rateable value of the land used and occupied as a means of access? Suppose the gradients were such that the ore could be rolled down by its own weight on a tramway across the land so occupied. The price paid for the right to get the gold could not enter into the rating of the tramway, though the value of the privilege would affect the price which the owner would give for the means of access. It was contended for the appellants that the principle of the Amwell spring case—Rex v. New River Co., 1 M. & Sel. 503—applied to this, and that water let in laterally by gravitation under the provisions of a statute was just as much an element in the rateable value of the hereditament as water welling up to the surface by the operation of natural laws. But suppose the occupier of adjoining land had bought from the occupier of the land on which the Amwell spring comes to the surface the right to convey it across the land of the purchaser and sell it, would the rateable value of this latter land be measured by reference to the price paid by its occupier for the water? Clearly not, though the land would get an additional value so far as it furnished a convenient channel for carrying the water to its market. The right of the New River Co. here is merely to occupy land suitable for the convenient appropriation of something which is in no sense a part of or annexed to the land occupied, and the sum paid as the price of the water can have no direct bearing on the rateable value of the land occupied for the purpose of most conveniently appropriating it. The quarter sessions, as I have said, have formulated the question as being whether the hereditament is rateable on "the principle" stated by the assessment committee, and if that principle is to be found in the passage I have cited I think it is sound. But the contention of the assessment committee is stated in three paragraphs, of which it is the first, and if all three are meant as expressing "the principle," then I think that, though the payments made were intended to cover elements of rateable value, there is ground for supposing that the sessions have approved the view that the price paid for the water itself is a factor in assessing the rateable value of the hereditament. The assessment committee's second and third contentions are as follows: [His lordship read the contentions, and continued:] The second, perhaps, does not travel outside the true principle, but I think the third undoubtedly does; and having regard to the statement in paragraph 18 of how the figures in the rateable value were arrived at, it seems probable that an inadmissible element was introduced into the calculation. As far as I can follow the reasoning of the Divisional Court, they seem to have proceeded on the basis of structural value only, adopting absolutely the second contention of the New River Co., "that no addition ought to be made to the said assessment of £650 in respect of the water flowing over the said intake or of the user of the intake by such water flowing over it," on the ground apparently that this element formed no part of the structural value. For the reasons I have already given I cannot agree with this view. I think the standard of structural value is not the true one to apply to such a case. There is an added element of value in this case by reason of the special fitness of the land and structure for a particular profitable purpose. I think the case must go back to the sessions for rehearing and determination in view of our opinion. There will be no costs either here or in the Divisional Court or at quarter sessions.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree that the case must go back to the court of quarter sessions for rehearing. The assessment committee and the court of quarter sessions appear to have lost sight of the fact that the water diverted from the River Lea was vested in the New River Co. This was provided for by the statute of 12 Geo. 2, c. xxxii., s. 11, and the Act of 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. cxcvi.) s. 9. Under the former Act the quantity to be taken was restricted, and provision was made for securing a sufficiency of water for the navigation of the River Lea. For that and other purposes mentioned in the Act the New River Co. was directed to pay two capital sums amounting to £3,250, and two annual sums amounting to £350. These sums were not paid for the use of the intake or entrance into the channel between the River Lea and the New River. The channel and the intake had existed and were used long before the Act passed. The ground for taxing the New River Co. in this way would seem to be the provision which vested in the New River Co. for the purpose of their undertaking the water which they were permitted to take from the River Lea. By the later Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. cxcvi) the sums which the New River Co. were required to pay under the former statute were increased to a capital amount of £42,000, and an annual sum of £1,500. The quantity of water to be taken was restricted and the company were required to construct a new gauge with a house or building to contain it, and proper appliances for measuring the water at the intake. Of the £42,000, £30,000 were to be expended for specified improvements in relation to the River Lea and its navigation. For some years prior to 1900 the New River gauge-house, sluice, and appurtenances were assessed at a sum of £650, which was divided between the parishes in which these different properties of the company were situate. In 1890 the intake from the River Lea was for the first time separately assessed at the sum of £3,180. The way in which this assessment was arrived at is stated in paragraph 18 of the case—four per cent. on the capital sum of £42,000—viz., £1,680, was added to the annual sum of £1,500 directed to be paid under the statute of 1855, and this sum, £3,180, was treated —it is not easy to say why—as the amount which the hypothetical tenant would pay for the intake. It was contended in the argument before us that this assessment ought not to be interfered with. It was urged that the value to the New River Co. of the water passing into the channel should be taken into account. The intake, it was said, was analogous to the spring in the case of Rex v. New River Co., and therefore the sum of £3,180 might properly be treated as the annual value of the water passing over the intake from the River Lea. But the hypothetical tenant would have no right to interfere with the flow of water for any other purpose than that of measurement. The analogy of the spring wholly fails, for the owners of the spring would have no independent right to the water, and the value of the water to them would therefore be properly taken into account. Then it was said that the question was one for the justices, and that where the only objection to the assessment was an excessive valuation the court could not interfere. But this argument would justify an arbitrary valuation on an estimate of what an owner might exact if he were free to bar the intake and stop the supply of water to the New River Co. But any such mode of assessment is clearly inadmissible. The intake, it seems to me, is like the junction between the lines of two railway companies. The contention of the assessment committee would lead to this result, that in assessing the point of contract of the two lines, the value of the traffic passing to and from either line should be taken into account and form an element in arriving at the assessable value of the junction. This calculation would have the effect of appropriating to a particular parish a large part of the assessable value of the whole undertaking.

The justices are bound by well-established rules in making their valuations, and are forbidden to admit, as elements of value, matters which are not properly assessable. It is the more important in this case that the justices should be reminded of the conditions upon which assessments can be properly made, because it would seem that, if this valuation be upheld, the amount may be increased to the sums which the New River Co. are bound to pay under the Act of 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxvii.), s. 25, although those sums are appropriated for the purposes specified in the Act of 1855, and have no relation whatever to that intake. The true mode of assessing the property in question is to ascertain whether the land over which the water of the New River Co. passes from the River Lea has an enhanced value in respect of the user made by the New River Co. In other words, whether its fitness for the purpose for which it was used would justify any and what increase of the rent which a tenant might reasonably be required to pay for the access from the River Lea to the New River. It should be borne in mind that the subject-matter of assessment is like an entrance to a property through a gateway. The land occupied by the gate may be held to be made more valuable by the purpose to which it is put. The court of quarter sessions will be guided by any evidence laid before them, but it would seem that any estimate of entrance value might be moderate in amount.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and I entirely agree with it. I do not think it is necessary to add anything to it.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J., in an action relating to the admission of a partner into the business of a hay salesman, under a partnership deed of the 19th of September, 1892.

Henry Byrne, who had been a partner under an older partnership agreement, was under the deed of 1892 to be entitled to a nine-twelfths share in the business, and James Reid, Samuel Chalkley, and Ralph Walton Moore, who were then taken into partnership, were each to have a one-twelfth share, with power to acquire each an additional one-twelfth, which in course of time they did.

By clause 29 of the deed, Mr. Byrne was to have the power at any time during the continuance of the partnership term (which was fourteen years) to nominate by will or otherwise and introduce into the firm for the whole or any part of his share in the business and profits, any son or sons on their attaining twenty-one, or any other male person or persons over twenty-one, and the person introduced was thenceforth during the residue of the term to carry on business in partnership with the other partners and to execute a proper deed binding himself to observe the terms and conditions of the partnership. Any person introduced who was in the employ of the firm was to continue to receive his salary.

By clause 31 differences between the partners were to be referred to two arbitrators. The deed also contained provisions to take effect on the death or retirement of Mr. Byrne, by which his share was to be taken over by the remaining partners.

On the 10th of February, 1898, Mr. Byrne communicated in writing to Messrs. Reid, Chalkley, and Moore his nomination as a partner, entitled to one-twelfth, of his son Stanley Byrne, who had been for some years a clerk in the business. The nomination was dated from the address of the firm and ran as follows: "Dear Sir,—In accordance with the articles of partnership I hereby nominate my son Stanley C. Byrne to one-twelfth share of profits of the business carried on as above, and to receive in addition to the salary he is now receiving a further sum which shall amount to £400 per annum.'

On the 15th of February, 1898, Mr. Byrne gave the other three partners written notice of his intention to retire from the partnership. Disputes arose between the partners, and Messrs. Reid, Chalkley, and Moore refused to accept Stanley Byrne as a partner. Mr. Byrne accordingly commenced this action against them and Stanley Byrne as defendants, claiming (amongst other things) a declaration that Stanley was duly nominated and introduced into the firm.

By a consent order dated the 29th of March, 1901, certain questions of fact were directed to be decided by Joyce, J., and other questions were referred to an arbitrator, Messrs. Reid, Chalkley, and Moore by their counsel undertaking to execute all deeds and instruments relating to the admission of Stanley to the business on which parties should agree or which the arbitrator might decide to be necessary to give effect to the decision of the judge. On the hearing of the questions referred to Joyce, J., his lordship held that the nomination of Stanley by Mr. Byrne was a valid one, and that he introduced and was entitled to introduce Stanley into the firm accordingly, and that Stanley did not abandon his right to become a partner, although in view of the refusal of the other partners to accept him he did not actually become a partner. His lordship further held that Mr. Byrne and Stanley were not entitled to have his right to become a partner enforced by an order for specific performance, and that the remedy lay in damages only.

Mr. Byrne and Stanley appealed from this judgment so far as it declared that Stanley never actually became a partner and that the nomination could not be enforced by specific performance, and asked for a declaration that the other defendants were bound to admit Stanley as a partner.

Younger, K.C., and MacSwinney, for Mr. Byrne.—The court will enforce this agreement to take Mr. Byrne's nominee into partnership.

They cited Wainwright v. Waterman, 1 Ves. jun. 311; Piggott v. Bagley, M'Cle. & Y. 569; and Stocker v. Wedderburn, 5 W. R. 671, 3 K. & J. 393.

Hughes, K.C., and Tannar, for the defendants Reid, Chalkley, and Moore.—Such an agreement as this cannot be enforced specifically. If the other partners object to admit the nominee it is not really to anyone's advantage to enforce it.

They cited Ehrmann v. Ehrmann, 43 W. R. 125, 72 L. T. Rep. 17.

A. J. Chitty, for Stanley Byrne.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have found considerable difficulty in this case, and some of the arguments used could not, I think, be supported. But I have persuaded myself I need not deal with these points, on account of the undertaking at the end of the consent order of the 29th of March, 1901. [His lordship then reviewed the facts of the case, and held on them that Mr. Byrne had duly nominated and introduced Stanley, and that the defendants other than Stanley were bound to comply with the undertaking in the consent order.]

ROMER, L.J., delivered judgment to the same effect.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree with my learned brethren as to the facts of this case, but I wish to say something as to the questions of law which have been raised during the argument. The first is as to the construction of the 29th article of partnership. [His lordship read this and said that in his opinion it gave Mr. Byrne the right to nominate Stanley, who on accepting the nomination was entitled to carry on the business in partnership with the other partners, and further, that the nomination of the 10th of February, 1898, was a valid nomination.] On the question of the effect of this nomination the only real authority seems to be the passage in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in Lovegrove v. Nelson, 3 Myl. & K. 1, dealt with by Lord Lindley at p. 368 of his book on partnership (6th ed.). This passage is as follows: "To make a person a partner with two others their consent must clearly be had, but there is no particular mode or time required for giving that consent, and if three enter into partnership by a contract which provides that on one retiring one of the remaining two, or even a fourth person who is not a partner at all, shall name the successor to take the share of the one retiring, it is clear that this is a valid contract which the court must perform, and that the new partner would come in as entirely by the consent of the others as if they had adopted him by name." And Lord Lindley says: "If partners choose to agree that any of them shall be at liberty to introduce any other person into the partnership, there is no reason why they should not; nor why, having so agreed, they should not be bound by the agreement. Persons who enter into such an agreement consent prospectively and once for all to admit into partnership any person who is willing to take advantage of their agreement, and to observe those stipulations, if any, which may be made conditions of his admission. Such an agreement as this is the basis of every partnership the shares in which are transferable from one person to the other. Those who form such partnerships, and those who join them after they are formed, assent to become partners with anyone who is willing to comply with certain conditions." I think, in this case, Stanley Byrne became, in the eye of a Court of Equity, a partner, and entitled to equitable relief as such. This relief does not as a general rule include specific performance of an agreement to become a partner; but there are other forms of equitable relief which are applicable, such as an injunction to prevent one partner from excluding another; or an account, or the execution of any necessary and proper deeds for defining the interests of the partners, or for giving effect to them; and lastly, there is the relief of dissolution in a proper case. Having regard to the consent order, we have here only to consider the facts and the question whether there are any deeds or instruments which may have to be executed with reference to the introduction of Stanley into the business. I think it is clear that Stanley, in accordance with the 29th article, must execute a deed binding himself to observe the terms and conditions of the partnership; and further, that there are other deeds to the execution of which by the other partners he will be entitled. The arbitrator may say that they ought to execute a deed more clearly defining the relationship between the partners as in England v. Curling, 8 Beav. 129; and in Page v. Cox, 10 Hare 163, Turner, V.C., held that under articles empowering the widow of a partner to carry on the business with the survivor a trust was created attaching to the partnership property. So here, I think, such a trust is created, to which Stanley is entitled to have effect given by a document vesting the legal title to the property in him to the extent of his share. In my opinion, therefore, Stanley is entitled to some other relief of this kind, and not to damages only, and the appeal must be allowed.

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Review of weekly payment—Termination of incapacity—Jurisdiction of arbitrator—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I. (12).

Where, in proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, an arbitration is instituted by the employers, under paragraph 12 of the First Schedule to the Act, for the purpose of ending a weekly payment, on the ground that the incapacity of the workman has ceased, it is the duty of the arbitrator to consider the question when the incapacity ceased. The jurisdiction of the arbitrator is not limited to the making of an award to take effect from the date of the award.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Liverpool County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The arbitration in this case was instituted by the employers under paragraph 12 of the first schedule to the Act.

The workman, John William Woodward, who was was employed as a riveter, met with an accident in the course of his employment on the 14th of May, 1901, which resulted in serious injury to his left eye. No question was raised by the employers as to the workman's being entitled to compensation under the Act, and on the 28th of August an agreement was entered into between the employers and the workman for a weekly payment by them to him of 18s. 3d., being half the amount of his weekly wages before the accident, during his incapacity or until the said weekly payment should be ended, diminished, or redeemed. A memorandum of this agreement was filed in the county court on the 13th of September. In the meantime the employers, having come to the conclusion that the workman's incapacity was ended, and that he could return to his work and earn wages, had called upon him to be examined by a medical man on their behalf.

He was so examined on the 2nd of September, and the medical certificate was to the effect that he had completely recovered from the effects of the accident and was able to resume his former duties.

He did not go back to his work, and on the 12th of November the employers, who had up to that date continued to pay him the agreed weekly sum, filed a request for arbitration under paragraph 12 of the first schedule to the Act, asking that the weekly payment might be reviewed and ended.

The hearing of the arbitration commenced before the county court judge on the 13th of December, when the employers put in the certificate of their own medical man. The workman declared himself to be dissatisfied with this certificate, and the county court judge, after expressing an opinion that the medical evidence was insufficient, proceeded to act under paragraph 11 of the first schedule and paragraph 13 of the second schedule to the Act, and ordered that the workman, who was prepared with medical evidence on his own behalf, should be examined by one of the medical referees appointed by the Secretary of State. The question on which the county court judge asked for a report was whether John William Woodward had now fully recovered from the accident, and was quite fit for work and able to follow his employment.

The workman was examined by Mr. Shears, one of the medical referees, who made a report on the 2nd of January, 1902, as follows: "John William Woodward's remaining right eye has good sight and is free from disease. In my opinion a one-eyed man runs a slight additional risk to this eye in a dangerous occupation, such as that of a boiler-maker. If, however, the parties concerned have decided to incur this slight risk, I see no reason why J. W. Woodward should not at once return to his former occupation. I am of opinion that for some weeks J. W. Woodward will not be restored to his full earning capacity, and for the following reason: Owing to the loss of one eye he will have difficulty in correctly judging of the distance of objects. This would particularly apply to the striking of a rivet with a hammer, but with practice this awkwardness would disappear, and he will learn to correctly judge of distances with his one eye. As a one-eyed man he would probably experience more difficulty in obtaining work from new employers."

On the 11th of April, 1902, the case came again before the county court judge, when the workman said that his condition was the same as it had been when he was examined by the medical referee and when he was first examined on the 2nd of September, and the employers expressed their willingness to take him back at full wages.

The county court judge declined to hear medical evidence on behalf of the workman, and made the following award: "I find that the respondent, John William Woodward, has been since the 2nd of September last and now is able to earn the same amount of wages as he had earned previously to the accident mentioned in the application for arbitration herein, and I order that the weekly payment of 18s. 3d. payable to the respondent under the above-mentioned Act under or by virtue of an agreement come to between the applicants and the respondent on the 28th of August, 1901, and a memorandum of which agreement dated the 3rd of September, 1901, was duly recorded at this court on the 13th of September, 1901, in respect of personal injury caused to the respondent by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, be diminished to the weekly sum of one penny as and from the 16th of April instant, but this award is made without prejudice to the rights and remedies of the respondent under the said agreement for the arrears of the said weekly payments up to the said 16th of April instant inclusive."

Paragraph 11 of the first schedule to the Act is as follows: "Any workman receiving weekly payments under this Act shall, if so required by the employer, or by any person by whom the employer is entitled under this act to be indemnified, from time to time submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer or such other person; but if the workman objects to an examination by that medical practitioner, or is dissatisfied by the certificate of such practitioner upon his condition when communicated to him, he may submit himself for examination to one of the medical practitioners appointed for the purposes of this Act, as mentioned in the second schedule to this Act, and the certificate of that medical practitioner as to the condition of the workman at the time of the examination shall be given to the employer and workman, and shall be conclusive evidence of that condition. If the workman refuses to submt himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his rights to such weekly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place." Paragraph 12 is as follows: "Any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased, subject to the maximum above provided, and the amount of payment shall, in default of agreement, be settled by arbitration under this Act."

The employers appealed from the award of the county court judge, and there was also a cross-appeal on the part of the workman.

Ruegg, K.C., and Leslie Scott (Denis O'Conor with them), for the employers.—Compensation is only payable during incapacity, and the evidence is clear that the workman's incapacity had come to an end on the 2nd of September, 1901. Even if the certificate of the employers' medical man is not conclusive on that point, the certificate of the medical referee is conclusive to show that incapacity had ceased on the 2nd of January, 1902; and at the second hearing before the county court judge, on the 11th of April, 1902, the workman himself admitted that he was then and had been all along in the same condition as on the 2nd of September. The award, therefore, ought to have been that the weekly payment should be diminished as from the 2nd of September. Secondly, at any rate the payment should have been diminished as from the 12th of November, 1901, the date when the proceedings to review the payment commenced. The question which has arisen between the parties is whether the incapacity has ceased. By section 1, sub-section 3, of the Act that question, having arisen in proceedings under the Act, had to be settled by arbitration. The question, therefore, for the arbitrator to determine was whether the incapacity had ceased at the time when the arbitration commenced. It was not competent to the county court judge to award the workman compensation for several months after his incapacity ceased. The learned judge made the mistake of thinking himself bound by paragraph 12 to order the payment to be diminished as from a date not earlier than his award. But the words "during the incapacity" in paragraph 1 (b) governs the whole of the schedule.

J. E. Bankes, K.C., and Lord, for the workman.—The award of the county court judge is right. The workman, however, has given notice of cross-appeal in case the court should accede to the argument put forward on the part of the employers. The certificate of the medical referee, when carefully read, shows that the workman's wage-earning capacity had not been fully restored at the time when that certificate was given. The county court judge had no right to reject the certificate of the medical referee and accept the former certificate of the employers' medical man. The learned judge was informed that doctors were ready to be called on each side, and that they did not agree as to the man's condition, but he did not hear the evidence of those doctors. Admitting that the certificate of the medical referee amounted to a certificate that incapacity had ceased, paragraph 11 only makes that certificate conclusive evidence of the man's condition at the date of the examination; it is not conclusive as to his condition at any other date, either before or after the examination. There was no evidence before the county court judge on which he could properly find that the workman was able on the 2nd of September to earn the same amount of wages as he had earned before the accident.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case the workman, who was a riveter in the employment of the applicants, met with an accident on the 14th of May, which resulted in the loss of one eye. The employers at once began to pay him compensation, and the parties came to an agreement for the payment or a weekly sum during incapacity, and that agreement was duly registered. But a time came when the employers considered that the workman was fully restored to capacity for earning wages, and on the 12th of November, 1901, they made an application, under paragraph 12 of the first schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, for an order that the weekly payment might be stopped. At the hearing before the county court judge, which took place in December, it appeared that the workman had on the 2nd of September, 1901, submitted himself to a medical examination by a doctor on behalf of the employers. The examination resulted in a report by the doctor certifying that the workman had completely recovered from the effects of the accident and was able to resume his former duties. That result, however, had not been communicated to the workman. The report was read to him at the hearing, and in answer to the county court judge he expressed his dissatisfaction with it. The learned judge, being of opinion that the medical evidence was insufficient, made an order for a report to be made to him as to the workman's condition by one of the medical referees. The medical referee was unable to make his report till the 2nd of January, 1902. He then gave his certificate, in which, after pointing out that there were certain lingering incapacities in the workman, or at any rate certain drawbacks to full capacity for work, he expressed the opinion that after a short interval he would by practice be able to do his regular work notwithstanding the loss of one eye. The matter came on again before the county court judge in April, when he arrived at the conclusion which he has embodied in his award. [His lordship read the award.] It is alleged on the part of the employers, and I think it is clear from the terms of the award, that the county court judge was of opinion that he had no jurisdiction to deal with the question at what date the incapacity ceased before the hearing. I think he was wrong in so holding. The question in dispute between the parties was whether at the date when the employers commenced proceedings to end the weekly payment the workman was incapacitated. The court did not escape the duty of deciding that question because the hearing was postponed. It is true that the certificate of the medical referee, though it was by law conclusive evidence of the condition of the man at the time of the examination, was not necessarily conclusive evidence of his condition at an earlier date. But it was essential to consider the date when the dispute as to whether incapacity had ceased was first formulated. The compensation was to be paid during incapacity. It was therefore necessary that the county court judge should address his mind to the question when the incapacity ceased, and this he does not appear to have done. He says in his award that the incapacity had ceased at the date of the certificate of the employers' doctor, but at the first hearing he held that that certificate was insufficient evidence. Therefore, unless the parties can come to some agreement, the case must go back to the county court judge in order that he may ascertain at what date the incapacity ceased.

DELVES v. GRAY. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Trustees with power of sale—Resale before completion to trustee—Specific performance—Damages—Substitution of name of purchaser's nominee in conveyance for name of purchaser.

A purchaser from co-trustees is not entitled to resell to one of such co-trustees while the original contract remains executory, nor will such purchaser be entitled under such circumstances either to specific performance or damages against the trustee to whom he has agreed to sell, nor independently of contract to have such trustee's name inserted in the conveyance in the place of his own.

Trial of action.

This was an action for specific performance, in which the plaintiffs, who had been appointed by an order of the High Court trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882-1890, of certain copyhold premises known as Mount View, in the village of Frant, in the county of Sussex, and were exercising the powers of a tenant for life under the said Acts on behalf of an infant, claimed specific performance of a contract for the sale of the same dated the 17th of January, 1902, against the defendant Mr. George Gray.

Gray counterclaimed for specific performance of a contract dated the 17th of February, 1902, between himself and David Delves, one of the plaintiffs, for the purchase by Delves from him of the same premises, or, in the alternative, damages.

The facts of the case were as follows: Under an order of the Chancery Division of the High Court, bearing date the 12th of December, 1901, the plaintiffs were empowered to sell the property, a reserve price having been fixed by the court. The defendant attended the sale and bought the property for £800. Afterwards, when the title had been investigated, the defendant discovered that there would be a considerable fine payable on admission and that enfranchisement would be expensive. He accordingly induced Delves to agree to sub-purchase the property from him for the sum of £800. His solicitors thereupon requested the plaintiff's solicitors to insert Delves' name in the assurance of the premises for his own. This the plaintiffs' solicitors, on Delves' behalf, refused to do, and the plaintiff Delves further, in his defence to the counterclaim, claimed relief upon the ground that the performance by him of the said agreement would involve him in a breach of trust.

Levett, K.C., and Jolly, for the plaintiffs.

Norton, K.C., and Hon. M. Macnaghten, for the defendant.—The fact that the person who contracts to purchase is a trustee, as is the plaintiff Delves, is no reason why a decree for specific performance should not be made against him. A trustee under such circumstances may purchase subject to the liability of having the matter reopened by his cestui que trust. Anyway the defendant is entitled to have Delves' name substituted for his own in the assurance of the premises.

Levett, K.C., replied.

The following cases were referred to in the argument: Ex parte Hughes, 6 Ves. 617; Campbell v. Walker, 5 Ves. 678; Williams v. Scott, 49 W. R. 33, [1900] A. C. 499; Parker v. McKenna, 23 W. R. 271, L. R. 10 Ch. App 96.

BYRNE, J.—For the purposes of the present case it does not appear to me to be material to consider whether or not the position of a trustee for sale in reference to the purchase of the trust property is defined with absolute logical accuracy in the phrase most frequently used—namely, that a trustee for sale cannot purchase from himself nor from himself and his co-trustee or co-trustees, because I find a sufficient statement of the law applicable to the circumstances of the present case in the judgment of Mellish, L.J., in Parker v. McKenna, L R. 10 Ch. App., at p. 125, which is as follows: "The main question appears to me to depend upon this, how far a trustee or agent for sale is precluded from purchasing from his own purchaser the property which he is entrusted to sell. In my opinion, as long as the contract remains executory, and the trustee or agent has power either to enforce it or to rescind or alter, as long as it remains in that state he cannot repurchase the property from his own purchaser except for the benefit of his principal. It appears to me that that follows from the established rule that he cannot purchase the property on his own account."

Then, also, in the judgment of the Privy Council in Williams v. Scott, [1900] A. C., at p. 507, Sir Ford North, in giving the opinion of their lordships, says, after dealing with the facts of the case, which is a somewhat complicated one: "It may be that the true account of the transaction is that suggested in the letter of the 9th of January, 1899—namely, that after John Austin had instructed to buy he desired to get rid of the purchase, and David Austin" (who was trustee) "agreed to take the land off John's hands and stand in his place and relieve him of his contract. This might account for the form of the conveyance. But this, it will be observed, is quite a different thing from an affirmance of John's contract to John, and a subsequent sale by John as owner to David, the state of facts to which Mr. White deposes. If these were the true facts, the transaction would be invalid upon a different ground—namely, that so long as the contract with John was executory only, and John had neither paid his purchase-money, nor taken up his conveyance, and the trustees, who were vendors, had power either to enforce, rescind, or alter the contract, it was not competent for David Austin to slip into John Austin's place or take over John Austin's contract for his own behalf: see Parker v. McKenna."

I have to deal with an action brought by trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts selling in the exercise of the powers of a tenant for life, on behalf of an infant under an order of the court, and the relief sought is specific performance of a contract to purchase certain copyhold property. There is also a counterclaim by the purchaser asking for specific performance or damages against David Delves, one of the plaintiff trustees, as sub-purchaser from the defendant. The matter still rests in contract, because the purchaser refuses to accept a proper assurance from the plaintiffs and claims the right to have the name of the plaintiff Delves substituted for his own. This is no answer to the action unless the defendant can establish the counterclaim. The short facts are that, after the defendant had agreed to purchase, he found out that there would be a fine payable on admission, which was considerable in proportion to the value of the property, and that the enfranchisement would be very expensive, and he persuaded the plaintiff Delves to enter into a contract to purchase from him, at the same price, and on the same terms, except that a very considerable proportion of the purchase-money was to remain on mortgage at 4 per cent. There is no mistake as to the meaning or intention of the second transaction. The defendant Gray said, in the course of his cross-examination: "My idea was that I was to lend Delves £700, and he was to take my place." Delves acted in good faith, but he was properly advised by his solicitors that, being a trustee, he could not purchase the trust property, and declined to allow his name to be inserted in the assurance as purchaser instead of Gray. I think that Gray is bound to complete his contract, and judgment must go against him in the action. He is not in a position to enforce specific performance against Delves, not being able to confer upon him a marketable title, nor is he entitled to damages. In law he must be deemed to have known that Delves was incapable of purchasing under the circumstances.

It was suggested that, independently of the contract, Gray, as purchaser, was entitled to have the name of Delves inserted in the assurance as his nominee, acting on the general practice that a purchaser may, in ordinary cases, take a conveyance to a nominee for himself; but I know of no principle or authority, which compels vendors to convey to one of their own number who declines to accept the nomination, and under circumstances which may certainly expose them to the risk of the suggestion of being parties to a breach of trust hereafter. The counterclaim must be dismissed with costs.

[On his lordship's being asked to state that he dismissed the counterclaim without prejudice to any claim against Delves that the defendant might think proper to bring after the completion of the purchase, his lordship refused to put into the order any statement to that effect, observing that he had dealt only with the claim raised on the defendant's part, and did not wish to say more than was necessary to decide the point. At the same time his lordship considered that Delves' contract was one which, if he wished to complete, the court might, with a little alteration, approve.]

In re ACCLES (LIMITED).
HODGSON v. ACCLES (a.)

Company—Debenture-holder's action—Sale by order of court—Purchase-money in court—Trustees' remuneration.

Trustees for debenture-holders who by the terms of their trust deed are entitled to remuneration, to be paid by the company, are not, in the absence of express provision in the trust deed, entitled to be paid such remuneration in priority to the debenture-holders, out of proceeds paid into court of a sale of the mortgaged property, in a debenture-holder's action.

Further consideration.

This action, which was commenced on the 23rd of April, 1898, was brought by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all debenture-holders of Accles (Limited) in order that the property comprised in the debenture-holders' security might be realized.

A receiver having been appointed, and judgment having been obtained, the property comprised in the security was, by a further order of the 16th of January, 1899, ordered to be sold.

After an abortive attempt at sale by public auction, the property was sold by private treaty and the purchase-money was paid into court.

After certain payments, including a dividend of 12s. 6d. in the pound to the debenture-holders, had been made thereout, a summons for further consideration was issued.

The proposed minutes of the order to be made on further consideration provided for the payment to the trustees for the debenture-holders of certain sums claimed by them as remuneration under the provisions of the trust deed.

The balance of the purchase-money being insufficient to meet the claims of the debenture-holders, certain debenture-holders, who were not parties to the action, attended by their solicitor before the the master and objected to these proposed payments on the ground that the debenture-holders were entitled to be paid the amount due to them in priority to the trustees. The summons was adjourned to the judge, and by him into court for the determination of this question. The clause in the trust deed under which the trustees claimed their remuneration provided that the company should pay to each of the trustees certain sums as and by way of remuneration for their services, and that the trustees should be at liberty to accept such remuneration.

Clause 35 of the debenture trust deed was as follows: "The trustees and every receiver, attorney, manager, agent, or other person, appointed by the trustees hereunder shall be entitled to be indemnified out of the mortgaged premises in respect of all liabilities and expenses incurred by them in the execution of the trusts hereof, or of any powers, authorities, or discretions vested in them or him pursuant to these presents, including liabilities and expenses consequent on any mistake, oversight, error of judgment, forgetfulness, or want of prudence on the part of the trustees or any such appointees, and against all actions, proceedings, costs, claims, and demands in respect of any matter or thing done or omitted in anywise relating to the premises; and the trustees may retain and pay out of any moneys in their hands upon the trusts of these presents the amount of any such moneys and also the remuneration of the trustees as hereinbefore provided.

Waggett, for the trustees, relied upon the practice in such cases, which is thus stated in Palmer on Debentures, p. 81: "Where an action is brought to enforce the debentures or debenture stock the remuneration allowed to trustees is always provided for out of the trust premises."

S. Dickinson, for the executors of a deceased trustee.

Austen Cartmell, for the objecting debenture-holders.—The right of the trustees is only to be paid by the company or out of trust property which is actually in their own hands.

FARWELL, J.—In my opinion this remuneration cannot be given. There is in the trust deed a contract by the company that it will pay the remuneration, but I find no contract by the debenture-holders that they will pay it, and no contract that it shall be paid out of the mortgaged property. It is provided by clause 35 of the trust deed that the trustees may retain the amount of their remuneration out of moneys in their hands; but this gives them no hold upon the moneys in court, and, in my opinion, the other part of this clause is fatal to their contention, for it provides that the trustees shall be entitled to be indemnified, out of the mortgaged premises, for liabilities and expenses incurred by them, but stops short of saying that they shall be entitled to their remuneration out of the mortgaged premises. The relation of trustee to cestui que trust implies that the trustee shall be indemnified for his expenses, but excludes remuneration of the trustee except by express contract, and I cannot extend this contract.

THOMAS (Appellant) v. PRITCHARD (Respondent). (a.)

Inland Revenue — Excise — Practice — Costs under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts — Power to grant to Crown — Finance Act (61 & 62 Vict. c. 10), s. 4—Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 18, and 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 47), s. 53.

In pursuance of section 53 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which provides that prosecutions under the excise laws are to be governed by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, costs can now be awarded to and against the Crown in cases under those laws.

Case stated by magistrate.

The special case set out the following facts: At the Town Hall, Cardiff, an injunction was preferred against the respondent by one Edgar Thomas, one of his Majesty's officers of Inland Revenue under the Finance Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict., c. 10), s. 4, for having on his premises on the 13th of January, 1902, a cask which was being subject to a process for the purpose of extracting spirit absorbed in the wood thereof. The information was heard on the 28th of February, when the magistrate found the offence proved, and fined the respondent £5 without costs. The solicitor for the appellant applied for costs, but the magistrate refused to grant them, but consented to state a case.

By section 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), it is provided: "And be it enacted that in all cases of summary conviction . . . it shall be lawful for the justices or justice to award and order in and by such conviction and order that the defendant shall pay to the prosecutor or complainant respectively such costs as to the justices or justice shall seem just and reasonable in that behalf, and in cases where such justices or justice instead of convicting . . . shall dismiss the information or complaint, it shall be lawful for him or them in his or their discretion . . . to award and order that the prosecutor or complainant shall pay to the defendant such costs as to such justices or justice shall appear just and reasonable."

Section 35 of the same Act provides (inter alia) "That nothing in this Act shall extend or be construed to extend to any information or complaint or other proceeding under or by virtue of any of the statutes relating to her Majesty's revenue of excise or customs, stamps, taxes, or post office."

Section 53 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), proceeds (inter alia): "That the Summary Jurisdiction Act shall, notwithstanding any special provisions to the contrary contained in any of the statutes relating to her Majesty's revenue under the control of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the Commissioners of Customs, apply to all informations, complaints, and the proceedings before a court of summary jurisdiction under or by virtue of any of the said statutes."

The magistrate refused to make an order as to costs on the following grounds:

1. That the Finance Act, 1898 (the statute creating the offence), makes no provision for the payment of costs to the Crown.

2. That section 53 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, makes no provision for payment of costs to the Crown, but simply applies the procedure of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to informations, complaints, and other proceedings which a court of summary jurisdiction has jurisdiction to hear and determine under the "statutes relating to her Majesty's revenue under the control of the Commissioners of Customs.

3. That section 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, is general in terms, and does not expressly provide for the payment of costs to the Crown.

4. That a general rule of law authorizing costs to be given between subject and subject does not override the rule of law that the Crown neither pays nor receives costs: Reg. v Beadle, 5 W. R. 498, 7 E. & B. 492.

5. That in cases where it is intended that the Crown shall receive or pay costs the Legislature signifies such intention by express enactment: cf. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 263, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether a court of summary jurisdiction upon convicting a person of an offence under the Finance Act, 1898, had power to order him to pay costs in addition to the fine.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the Crown.—The statute of 1848 gave costs in all cases under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and section 35 of that Act excluded prosecutions under the Inland Inland Revenue Acts from the scope of the Acts. Then there came section 53 of the Act of 1879, which provided that the Summary Jurisdiction Acts should apply to Inland Revenue cases. Therefore you have an express enactment applying the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to these cases, and the Crown is entitled under those Acts to receive costs. The case is governed by Moore v. Smith, 7 W. R. 206, 1 E. & E. 597.

Holman Gregory, for the respondent.—I admit the proposition that this case turns on the construction of section 53 of the Act of 1879, but that section only brings the Crown under the general law in respect of matters of procedure and does not override the rule that the Crown does not pay or receive costs except in cases where costs are given by statute. Moore v. Smith applies only to informations in the High Court. This case is governed by Reg. v. Beadle.

Sir E. Carson replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J—This case is not free from difficulty. It is a rule of law that the Crown is not bound by an Act of Parliament unless express words or words clearly implying that it should be are inserted in the statute. This principle is illustrated by two cases, both of which have been cited to us. In the first, Reg. v. Beadle, the court came to the conclusion that the words of the statute which was there being considered were not sufficient to bind the Crown, and that an order made against it for costs could not be supported. In Moore v. Smith the court came to the opposite conclusion and found that the words of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, which made the Crown a party to certain informations, were sufficient to enable it to receive costs under that Act. Lord Campbell, who was party to both judgments, laid it down in his judgment in the latter case that express language was not necessary to bind the Crown, and Crompton, J., agreed with him.

In the present case there are two important Acts. The first is the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43). In that Act express words were inserted to except excise and revenue cases from the operation of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts In that state of things the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), was passed. By section 53 of that Act the special exemption of the Crown in respect of excise and revenue prosecutions, contained in the Act of 1848 are repealed. The Crown is there referred to in terms, and in order to establish the respondent's case he has to say that the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts as to costs do no apply to the Crown. I think it was intended by the framers of this Act that the Crown should get costs, and that this was one of the cases in the mind of Wright, J., in his judgment in In re Archbishop of Canterbury, 50 W. R. 476, [1902] 2 K. B. 503, at p. 573.

I only wish to add that this case shows the absolute necessity for legislation on the subject.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

GLAMORGANSHIRE COAL CO. (LIMITED) AND OTHERS v. SOUTH WALES MINERS' FEDERATION AND OTHERS. (a.)

Trades union—Master and workman—Procuring breach of contract of service—Whether malice essential to illegality.

It is not unlawful for workmen to induce their fellow-workmen to break a contract of service if it be done bonâ fide and without any desire to injure the master.

In 1901 the South Wales Miners' Federation issued a manifesto ordering the men to stop work on certain days known as "stop days." This action occasioned great damage to the masters, but was induced by the workmen's bonâ fide belief that the price of coal would be thereby raised. In an action for damages by the masters,

Held, that no action would lie, as it was an essential element of an action in respect of procuring a breach of contract that actual malice should be proved against the defendant.

This action was first set down before Bigham, J., and a special jury, but during the third day of hearing the jury were discharged, and it was agreed that the whole matter in dispute, including the amount of damages to be awarded in the event of the plaintiffs succeeding, should be decided by the judge without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the Glamorgan Coal Co. (Limited) and seventy-three other companies and colliery owners, members of the South Wales Coal Owners' Association, and the action was brought against the executive officers and trustees of the South Wales Miners' Federation to recover damages to the amount of £100,000, on the ground that the defendants or their agents had wrongfully or maliciously induced the miners in the plaintiffs' employ to commit a breach of their contract under the sliding scale agreement.

The plaintiffs further asked for an injunction restraining the defendants from committing similar acts in the future, and a declaration that the property and funds of the federation were liable for such costs and damages as might be awarded in the present action.

The fact that the miners had broken their contract was not denied by the defendants, but it was denied that the defendants had induced them to do so. In the alternative, the defendants said that if their servants had induced the miners to commit a breach of a contract, that the notices sent out to the miners were sent out by the men's representatives on the sliding scale committee, and that the object of ordering the stop-days was to raise the price of coal, which would be equally to the benefit of the plaintiffs and defendants, and not with the object in any way to injure the plaintiffs.

It was also contended that the Federation could not per se be guilty of the acts complained of, and therefore could not be sued in the action, and that the acts of the men's representatives on the sliding scale committee were not wrongful, but were legally justifiable.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C., B. F. Williams, K.C., Montague Lush, K.C., and Trevor Lewis, for the plaintiffs.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and Holman Gregory, for the defendant federation.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Bailhache, for the sliding scale committee.

The facts and arguments of the case appear sufficiently from the judgment.

Aug. 7.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: This is an action brought by the Glamorgan Coal Co. (Limited) and seventy-three other plaintiffs against the South Wales Miners' Federation, its trustees, its officers, and a number of members of its executive council, to recover damages for wrongfully and maliciously procuring and inducing the workmen in the plaintiffs' collieries to break their contracts of service with the plaintiffs. In the alternative the plaintiffs also sue the defendants for wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously conspiring together to do the acts complained of. The plaintiffs claim both damages and an injunction. The defence consists of denials of the material allegations in the statement of claim, and of a plea that the acts complained of were done, if at all, with reasonable justification and excuse. The case came on to be tried before me with a special jury on the 22nd of July last, but after the trial had lasted three days the jury was discharged, and all questions of law and fact, as well as the ascertainment of the damages, if any, were by consent left to me. The facts I find as follows: The plaintiffs are seventy-four limited liability companies associated together for the protection of their own interests under the style of the Monmouthshire and South Wales Coal Owners' Association. They work upwards of 200 collieries in the South Wales district, and in these collieries they employ about 100,000 men. The defendants are, first, the men's federation, a body registered under the Friendly Societies Acts; secondly, the trustees of the federation; thirdly, Mr. Brace (the vice-president), Mr. Onions (the treasurer), and Mr. Richards (the secretary of the federation); and lastly, six men, who are members of the executive council of the federation, and who are also members of workmen's half of a body known as the Joint Sliding Scale Committee, to which I shall have to refer later on. The trustees are joined as defendants merely in order to enable the plaintiffs to reach the funds of the federation in the event of a judgment being recovered for damages against that body. It appears that for the last twenty or twenty-five years the masters and the men in the South Wales colliery district have worked together under an agreement, called the sliding scale agreement, by which the rate of wages paid to the men is made to depend on the price for the time being of a certain agreed class of coal. That is to say, as the price of such coal rises or falls, so the rate of wages moves up or down. It is thus to the interest, not only of the masters, but also of the men, to keep up the price of coal, but at the same time not to drive it up to such a point as will unduly interfere with the demand. Against the producers of coal there are always arrayed a number of coal dealers, known as merchants or middlemen, who buy coal to be shipped to foreign ports, or for resale in the South Wales market. The interest of those men is, of course, to keep down prices, so that they may buy as cheaply as possible. They frequently sell large quantities of coal for forward delivery at prices below those current for immediate delivery, trusting to supply themselves later on by purchases from one or other of the many collieries at prices which will make their bargains remunerative. This has the effect of depressing the market, and on more than one occasion, and particularly in the years 1896 and 1897, the masters and men have tried together to devise some scheme to so regulate the output of the miners, by means of stop days or otherwise, as to counteract this effect. There has, however, always been a difficulty in getting a sufficient number of the colliery proprietors to fall in with any scheme having for its object the restriction of output, and thus nothing has been done. On the 1st of April, 1898, a strike broke out in the South Wales district, and the collieries were closed from that date to the 31st of August. On the 1st of September work was resumed throughout the district. At the collieries of forty-seven of the plaintiff companies it was resumed under an agreement which embodied the old sliding scale. By this agreement it was provided that a joint committee of masters and men should be formed, which should be called the Joint Sliding Scale Committee; and that it should be comprised of twelve members representing the forty-seven firms, and of twelve men elected by the colliers in the employment of those firms. Each half of the committee was to have its own secretary, elected from its own twelve members, and it was contemplated that each half might from time to time meet separately to discuss matters affecting its own interests. One of the principal objects of the joint committee was to to ascertain, by audits of the sales of the forty-seven firms, the average price of coal, for the purpose of regulating wages thereby. The agreement contained many other provisions in addition to the provisions for the formation of the joint committee, but it is only necessary to refer to one of them. It is clause 23 of the embodied sliding scale agreement, and it is as follows: "It is hereby agreed that all notices to terminate contracts on the part of the employers, as well as employed, shall be given only on the first day of any calendar month, and to terminate on the last day of the same month." Although only forty-seven of the plaintiffs were parties to this agreement, and were alone to be represented on the Joint Sliding Scale Committee, the men employed by the other twenty-seven plaintiffs went back to work on the same terms, both as to wages and notice, as those contained in the agreement. On the 11th of October, 1898, the defendant federation was formed, and practically all the miners in the South Wales district became members of it. They number about 128,000, and they include all, or very nearly all, the men who work for the plaintiffs. The members at once proceeded to elect a president, a vice-president, a treasurer, and a secretary. They also elected an executive council, consisting of twenty-five men, who were to manage the affairs of the federation. The federation was subsequently—viz., in February, 1899—registered under the Friendly Societies Acts By its rules, its objects are declared to be to provide funds to carry on the business of the federation; to take into consideration the question of trade and wages; to protect workmen generally; regulate the relations between them and employers; and to call conferences to deal with questions affecting the workmen, of a trade wage and legislative character. On the 5th of November, 1898, the executive council met and resolved, "That this council in its entirety shall from time to time transact the whole of the business arising out of the sliding scale agreement, notwithstanding that only twelve of the said council can appear before the employers to deal with the Sliding Scale Joint Committee." and, having passed this resolution, they then proceeded to elect twelve of their own body to serve on the joint committee. The forty-seven plaintiff companies objected to this election upon the ground that the council represented all the miners in South Wales, whereas the joint committee was to be composed only of the representatives of the forty-seven firms, and of the men who worked for those firms. Thereupon another election was held, at which only the men in the collieries of the forty-seven firms voted. They, however, chose the same twelve men as had been chosen by the executive council, so that the masters took nothing by their objection. The effect of this was, in my opinion, that the twelve working men who formed the working men's half of the Joint Sliding Scale Committee, became the mere mouthpiece of the federation, of which, as I have said, they were all members. The federation prospered greatly, so that by the end of 1900 it found itself in the possession of funds amounting to £100,000. The price of coals also rose, and with it the rate of wages. But in October or November, 1900, the council of the federation seem to have felt some apprehension that this prosperity was being threatened by the merchant and the middleman. It is at this season of the year that the foreign Governments and others make their contracts for forward delivery of coal, and the prices at which these contracts were being effected alarmed the council, and foreshadowed a fall in prices. Whether the fear was well founded or not I cannot say, but I am satisfied by the evidence that it was honestly felt. On the 5th of November, 1900, Mr. Abraham, M.P., the president, made a speech at a meeting of the council of the federation from which I take the following passage: "There is an attempt being made by middlemen and merchants to bring about an undue reduction in the price of coal; 80 per cent. of the employers are trying to counteract this movement, but three or four large firms appear to desire that it should be successful. I therefore suggest that steps be taken to bring about a stop day throughout the coalfield as a protest against this action." Thereupon a resolution of the council was passed ordering a stop day for Friday, the 9th of November, and a further resolution was passed, that a general conference of the federation should be convened for the 12th of November. In the meanwhile the following manifesto was ordered to be circulated: "Fellow Workmen. Your council, having seriously considered the present condition of the coal trade, are strongly of opinion that an organized attempt is being made to unduly interfere with trade and prices to such an extent as will prejudice the interest of the members of the federation. With a view of preventing the industry being exploited by merchants and middlemen, we have unanimously resolved that a general holiday be taken throughout the coalfield by all colliery workmen on Friday next, the 9th of November, 1900. We also request you upon that day to hold general meetings for the purpose of appointing delegates to attend a conference at the Cory Memorial-hall on Monday next, the 12th of November, 1900, to consider and determine our future policy, as embodied in the following resolution: That the conference hereby authorizes the council to declare a general holiday at any time they think it necessary for the protection of your wages and the industry generally. —W. A. ABRAHAM." This manifesto had the desired effect, and on the 9th of November all the colliers in the coalfield, including the men working in the plaintiffs' collieries, stopped work. No notice of any kind was served on the masters, and they knew nothing of the matter until they saw a report of Mr. Abraham's speech in the newspapers of the 6th of November. This stoppage on the 9th of November is the first matter of which the plaintiffs complain in this action. On the 12th of November, 1900, the conference which had been convened for that day was held, and at it a resolution was passed authorizing the council of the federation to declare a general holiday at any time they might think it necessary for the protection of wages and of the industry generally. Having regard to what happened twelve months later, and to the present contentions of the federation, this resolution, which was passed by the conference in compliance with the request of the executive council in their manifesto, is of considerable importance. The representatives of the masters on the Joint Sliding Scale Committee were annoyed at the course which the executive council had adopted, and on the 13th of November, 1900, they held a meeting at which the working men's representatives on the committee were present. The latter assured the masters that the action of the council had not been taken with a view to injuring the owners, or to interfering with the relations between owners and workmen, but only to show middlemen that they were not to be allowed to do with the markets what they had done in the past. This assurance the masters accepted, recording their acceptance in a memorandum in the minute-book of Joint Sliding Scale Committee. The memorandum is as follows: "That, whilst accepting the assurances of the workmen's representatives that they thought they were acting for the good of the coal trade in having ordered a general stoppage of work at the collieries on Friday last, the owners' representatives are unanimously of opinion that the principle involved in such a stoppage is unsound, and the action is illegal, and will not achieve the object which the workmen's representatives apparently had in mind, and the owners' representatives protest against the course followed, for, so far from assisting the trade, such action is calculated to damage it, both temporarily and permanently. And, further, the owners' representatives are of opinion that, the stoppage having been in contravention of all established customs at the collieries, and so far-reaching in its effects, the general body of the associated owners will have to be consulted upon the course which the workmen have seen fit to adopt." On the 28th of November the associated owners met, and, after negativing the expediency of prosecuting the men, resolved as follows: "That the owners' side of the sliding scale committee point out to the workmen's representatives that a resolution has been passed by the association that, if the men make any future illegal stoppage the owners will take proceedings against the men." Thus this incident was closed; and, if nothing further had happened, I am satisfied that it would have been forgotten. I wish to say of it that I think the masters were right in accepting the assurances of the men. I am quite satisfied that in ordering the stop day the federation acted as they thought in the best interests of the men, and without any intention, malicious or otherwise, of injuring the plaintiffs.

I must now deal with the events which lead up to the ordering of the other stop days, in October and November, 1901, of which the plaintiffs complain. It is necessary to consider them with some care, inasmuch as the federation by their counsel allege that they did not order these stop days, and that they cannot therefore be held responsible for them. In this connection it is to be remembered that on the 22nd of July, 1901, the House of Lords had decided in the Taff Vale case, 50 W. R. 44, that a friendly society could be sued, and its funds reached, to answer any damages that might be recovered against it. On the 12th of October, 1901, the defendant Brace, the vice-president of the federation, made a speech to the miners, in which, after congratulating them on the flourishing position of the federation finances, he insisted that unless some steps were taken to prevent the depression of prices, which was likely to result from what he called the cut-throat competition in the trade, the workmen's wages would be seriously diminished; and in this connection he referred to the low prices at which contracts for coal had recently been made. He concluded by saying that "if there was the slightest tendency to a slump in prices brought about by unfair competition the executive council of the federation, in whom power was invested by the whole of the workmen, according to the conference resolution, would immediately declare a series of stoppages, with a view to regulating the supply according to the demand." Four days later, on the 16th of October, 1901, Mr. Brace made another speech, in which, referring to his speech of the 12th of October, he intimated that if a stop was ordered it would not be by the federation, but by the workmen themselves. On the 19th of October Mr. Richards the secretary of the federation, made a speech to a body of miners, in which, replying to the possibility of a stop day being ordered, he said that the executive council would have to move carefully, in view of the decision of the House of Lords in the Taff Vale case, and that, if any notice of a stop was found necessary for the purpose of keeping up wages, it would come from the sliding scale committee. About the same time, on the 18th of October, 1901, Mr. Onions, the treasurer of the federation, made a speech, in which, after observing upon the comparatively low prices at which some large contracts for coal had recently been made, he stated that some general action would have to be resorted to by the workmen to protect themselves, and that, in the face of the recent decision in the Taff Vale case, they would have to exercise great care. He added: "It would be better to take some action to save themselves now than to be compelled later on, when wages had been reduced to starvation point, to take drastic measures." Those speeches preceded a meeting of the executive council of the federation, which was held on the 23rd of October, 1901, and they foreshadowed what was to be done at the meeting. The federation, or its officers, obviously desired that one or more stop days should be declared, but, having regard to the decision of the Taff Vale case, they desired that the order for the stop days should be issued by some other body than their own, by some body which had no funds with which to answer any judgment that might be recovered in the event of the order turning out to constitute an actionable wrong. At the meeting of the executive council held on the 23rd of October, 1901, there were twenty-two members present, ten of them being also members of the working men's division of the Joint Sliding Scale Committee. The vice-president, Mr. Brace, and the treasurer, Mr. Onions, were there. Mr. Brace appears to have called attention to several contracts for forward delivery of coal which had been made at many shillings below the average price as ascertained at the last sliding scale audit, and thereupon a discussion ensued as to whether the federation should take steps to counteract the bad effects of the contracts. Then it seems to have been moved that the executive council should not take upon itself the responsibility of declaring any stop day; and to that an amendment was proposed that, if any stop days were to be ordered, the orders should be issued by the executive council of the federation, no other body having any authority to do so. The amendment being put, only three voted for it, while nineteen voted for the original motion. Thus it stands recorded on the minute-book of the federation that the council of the federation should take no responsibility for ordering stop days. Immediately after this vote had been taken all the members of the council who were not members of the sliding scale committee left the room; and the remainder, by some process not explained, resolved themselves into the working men's half of the Sliding Scale Joint Committee and proceeded in that capacity to declare two stop days—the 25th and 26th of October, 1901—and thereupon the following manifesto was published: "To the workmen employed at the South Wales and Monmouthshire Collieries. It having come to the knowledge of your representatives on the sliding scale committee that large contracts have already been made at considerably lower prices than the average price declared by the last sliding scale audit, and the result of those contracts upon annual and other contracts about to be made, which must of necessity mean a heavy reduction in wages, it was unanimously resolved that the workmen shall observe as general holidays Friday and Saturday next. (Signed) W. BRACE, ALFRED ONIONS, ENOCH MOREL, THOMAS EVANS, D. WATTS MORGAN, C. B. STANTON, THOMAS THOMAS, D. D. BEYNON, DARONWY ISAAC, EVAN THOMAS, THOMAS RICHARDS." Telegrams were then sent to all the collieries in South Wales, notifying the fact that the stop days had been declared. It is of importance to observe that with many of these collieries the sliding scale committee, as a committee, had no concern, for that committee only represented the forty-seven firms before-mentioned, and the working men's representatives on this committee were elected only by the men working in the collieries of those firms. Yet the committee took upon themselves to do that which the federation alone had authority to do—namely, to order stop days in all the collieries in South Wales. One other fact. The cost of printing the manifesto and of sending out the telegrams was paid out of the funds of the federation, and the organization of the federation was used for the purpose of making the stop days known to the men throughout the district. Subsequently two other stop days were ordered, one for the 31st of October and one for the 6th of November. They were also declared at meetings of what was called the working men's half of the sliding scale committee; but, as before, communications to the men were distributed by means of the organization of the federation and the cost was defrayed out of the federation funds. The result of all this was that the men stayed away from work on the four days, and so broke their contracts with their masters.

It was argued on behalf of the federation that they, the federation, could not be held responsible for the consequences of stop days, for the reason that the federation had expressly refused to meddle in the matter, as appeared by the resolution of the 23rd of October. I do not, however, think this argument well founded. It is true that the hand of the working men's representation on the sliding scale committee is made to appear as directing these stop days, but I cannot doubt that the hand was guided and controlled by the federation itself. In truth, it was the federation who were acting, the name of the sliding scale committee being used as a blind, a very transparent blind, to conceal what was being done. The writ was issued on the 22nd of November, 1901. After the writ was issued Mr. Evan Thomas, one of the defendants, and a prominent official of the federation, speaking at a meeting of miners as to the way the stop days would affect the right of haulers to a certain bonus payable to them by the masters, said, "When a stop day is declared, it is expected that every one will morally abide by it, but if the haulers do not they are in a sense acting disloyally towards the federation, and it will certainly mean that the executive council will either have to give this policy up or to do something else to meet the difficulty of carrying this policy out." It is true that within two or three days of this speech being reported Mr Evan Thomas wrote to the newspapers to say that he had used the expression "executive council" by a slip; and that he ought to have said sliding scale committee. But, for my part, I think this official made no slip at all, and he was quite right when he attributed the stop day to the executive council of the federation.

A number of witnesses were called before me on the part of the plaintiffs and on the part of the defendants. Mr. Dalziel, secretary of the owners' association, stated that he did not suggest that in giving the advice to stop in November, 1900, there was any intention of injuring the masters, and the resolution of the masters passed on the 13th of November confirms Mr. Dalziel in that view. Then it appears that in October, 1901, circumstances similar to those that led up to the stoppage in 1900 again occurred, and that these circumstances afforded the only reason for ordering the stop days in October and November, 1901. There was no quarrel between the masters and the men, and, so far as I can see, no illwill. The men objected to the course of business adopted by the middlemen, and in this objection some, at least, of the masters seem to have shared. The evidence satisfies me that the action of the federation, and of the other defendants in 1901, was dictated by an honest desire to forward the interest of the workmen, and was not, in any sense, prompted by a wish to injure the masters. Neither the federation nor the other defendants had any prospect of personal gain from the operation of the stop days. Having been requested by the men by the resolution of the 12th of November, 1898, to advise and direct them as to when to stop work, the federation and the other defendants, who were its officers, in my opinion, did to the best of their ability advise and direct the men. Whether they advised them wisely I cannot say, though I am inclined to think not. But I am satisfied that they advised them honestly and without malice of any kind against the plaintiffs.

I have to decide, in these circumstances, whether an action in tort will lie against the defendants. The advice and guidance of the defendants was solicited and involved, if followed, as the defendants knew, the breaking of subsisting contracts. It was followed, as the defendants wished it should be; and damage resulted to the masters; but there was no malicious intention to cause injury, no profit was gained for themselves by the defendants, and their sole object was to benefit the men, whom they were advising and directing. These circumstances, in my opinion, disclose no cause of action. In all the cases cited to me, where the action has been for damages for procuring the breach of contract, the element of actual malice—that is to say, a real intention to harm the plaintiff—has been regarded as essential. In Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 E. & B. 216, the allegation was that the defendant "maliciously procured the servant to break her contract," and the judgment rests on the malice so imputed to the defendant. It is true that Crompton, J., in that case says that it must be considered clear law that a person who wrongfully and maliciously, or, which is the same thing, with notice, interrupts the relation subsisting between master and servant by procuring the servant to depart from the master's service, whereby the master is injured, commits a tort. If this means that mere notice of the existence of the contract of service raises an irrevocable presumption of malice, I do not think it is good law. If a brother believes that his sister is in a service that is injurious to her health, cannot he advise her to break her contract without rendering himself liable in tort to the master? In such a case, in my opinion, it would be impossible to say that an action would lie. It may be different in cases where the servant is taken into service by the defendant with notice of the existing contract, or is kept in such service after notice of the contract, so that the defendant gets a benefit; in such cases there may be some evidence of malice; though I have a difficulty in persuading myself that by giving a servant, whom I know to be a truant, half-a-day's work to save him from starvation I run the risk of making myself liable in tort to his master. If the cases to which Crompton, J., refers be pushed to their logical conclusion, it would seem that if a man, having entered into the service of another to do a particular piece of work, say to sweep out a stable, goes away refusing to do the work, no one with notice of the facts can ever afterwards employ that person without rendering himself liable in tort to the man who originally employed him. Mere notice cannot, in my opinion, be at most more than some evidence of actual malice, rebuttable by showing that, in fact, no malice existed. The cases to which Crompton, J., refers are cases either of enticing servants from the service of their masters or of harbouring them after they have improperly left the service, and with notice, and the expressions enticing and harbouring appear to me to suggest a malicious intention to injure the master. Erle, J., declined to limit the principle upon which he based his judgment in Lumley v. Gye to contracts of service. He declared the principle to be of universal application, and he states it in these words: "He who maliciously procures a damage to another by violation of his right ought to be made to indemnify, and that whether he procures an actionable wrong or breach of contract." Wightman, J., puts the case in the same way: "It was undoubtedly primâ facie an unlawful act on the part of Miss Wagner to break her contract, and, therefore, a tortious act of the defendant maliciously to procure her to do so." Both these learned judges evidently thought that actual malice was essential to the cause of action. In Bowen v. Hall, 29 W. R. 367, 6 Q. B. D. 333, the action was against the defendants for wrongfully receiving and harbouring a servant after notice of his being the servant of the defendants. Bovill, C.J., in delivering a judgment in which Lord Chancellor Selborne concurred, 6 Q. B. D., at p 337, states the facts upon which the judgment is based: "We are of opinion," he says, "that the act of the defendants was done with the knowledge of the contract between the plaintiff and the servant; was done in order to obtain an advantage for one of the defendants at the expense of the plaintiff; was done from a wrong motive, and would, therefore, justify a finding that it was done in that sense maliciously." Having found these as the facts, he proceeded to state the law as laid down in Lumley v. Gye in the following terms: "Wherever a man does an act which in law and in fact is a wrongful act, and such an act may as a natural and probable consequence of it produce injury to another, and which in the particular case does produce such an injury, an action in the case will lie." And later on he says: "Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact . . . but if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act, which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore actionable, if injury ensues." This again seems to me to show that to support an action for procuring a breach of contract it is essential to prove actual malice. Lord Macnaghten, in Quinn v. Leathem, 50 W. R. 139, [1901] A. C. 495, at p. 510, speaking of the decision in Lumley v. Gye says: "Speaking for myself, I have no hesitation in saying that I think the decision was right, not on the ground of malicious intention—that was not, I think, the gist of the action—but on the ground that a violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and that it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractural relations recognised by law, if there be no sufficient justification for the interference." If this is the true rule, as it appears to me it may be, then in order to get a cause of action there must be an interference without sufficient justification; in other words, if from all the circumstances it appears that the interference was justified, the cause of action does not exist. In the case of the Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co., 37 W. R. 756, 23 Q. B. D. 598, 40 W. R. 337, [1892] A. C. 25, when it was brought before the Court of Appeal, Bowen, L.J., put the case in very much the same way. He says (6 Q. B. D., at p. 613), "Intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage, another in that other person's property or trade is actionable, if done without just cause or excuse;" and at p. 614 he says, "The intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it, is forbidden." Thus it seems that the mere procurement of a breach of contractual rights is not necessary actionable; and that it will not be actionable, if it appears to have been sufficiently justified (per Lord Macnaghten), or if it appears to have been done with just cause or excuse (per Bowen, L.J.). What may be a sufficient cause or excuse is perhaps difficult to determine. But Bowen, L.J., gives some indication of what may or may not amount to a sufficient cause or excuse. He says (6 Q. B. D., at pp. 618-619 of the Mogul case), "Then comes the question, Was it done with or without 'just cause or excuse'? If it was bonâ fide done in the use of a man's own property, in the exercise of a man's own trade, such legal justification would, I think, exist, not the less because what was done might seem to others to be selfish or unreasonable; see the summing up of Erle, J., and the judgment of the Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Rowlands, 17 Q. B. D. 671. But such legal justification would not exist when the act was merely done with the intention of causing temporal harm, without reference to one's own lawful gain, or the lawful enjoyment of one's own rights. The good sense of the tribunal, which had to decide, would have to analyze the circumstances, and to discover on which side of the line each case fell. But if the real object were to enjoy what was one's own, or to acquire for one's self some advantage in one's property or trade, and what was done was done honestly, peaceably, and without any of the illegal acts above referred to, it could not, in my opinion, properly be said that it was done without just cause or excuse." One may with advantage borrow for the benefit of traders what was said by Erle, J., in Reg. v. Rowlands of workmen and of masters: "The intention of the law is at present to allow either of them to follow the dictates of their own will, with respect to their own actions, and their own property; and either, I believe, has a right to study to promote his own advantage, or to combine with others to promote their mutual advantage."

Then do the facts in the present case constitute a justification or excuse? I think they do. I have already found that there was no malice, no desire to injure; then why was the order to stop issued? It was issued because the men had asked the council of the federation to advise them from time to time as to when they should stop. Stopping, no doubt, involved a breach of the men's contract with their masters. But, if a man asks another for advice as to whether or not it is wise to break a contract, is not the person asked entitled (so long as he acts honestly) to give the advice, and if the advice is followed, do not the circumstances afford the man who gave it a sufficient excuse within the meaning of the rule? Solicitors, parents, and friends are over and over again consulted as to whether it is better to continue to perform a disastrous contract, or to break it and submit to a claim for damages. Do they by giving the advice, and so procuring the breach, make themselves liable in tort? Or does not the fact that they were asked for advice, and gave it honestly, afford a sufficient excuse for what they did? A man may persuade himself to break his contract, and the only consequence is that he renders himself liable in damages for the breach; he certainly does not thereby create a further cause of action against himself in tort. Then why should his friend, who advises him, and perhaps prevails upon him, to do the same thing incur the consequences of such a course of action.

In the present case I find that the federation and all the other defendants acted honestly, and without any malice, and in ordering the stop days did no more than that which they conceived to be in the best interests of the men whom they represented, for whom they were acting; and I find, moreover, that they had lawful justification or excuse for what they did in this, that having been solicited by the men to advise and guide them on the question of stop days, it was their duty and their right to give the advice and to secure that the advice should be followed.

Taking the view which I do of the facts of this case, it is only necessary to say a few words as to the cause of action founded on conspiracy. An actionable conspiracy exists when a number of men combine either to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. I have already said that in my opinion the acts of the individual defendants were not unlawful, and there is good authority for saying that a combination entered into for the mere purpose of doing a lawful act cannot constitute an actionable conspiracy. In order to give a cause of action, the combination to do the lawful act must be entered into with a malicious intention of damaging the plaintiff, and must cause him damage. Here no such conspiracy ever, in fact, existed, for there never was any malicious intention. My judgment, therefore, must be for the defendants on both branches of the plaintiffs' claim. If this case is taken further and my judgment is reversed, it will then become my duty to inquire into the question of damages; but even at the risk of being told that I am going outside my province, I strongly advise the parties to consider whether they cannot end this litigation. I doubt if it serves any useful purpose, and I am sure that it creates bitterness of feeling, and makes the relations between the masters and the men difficult and unpleasant. The plaintiffs must pay the defendants' costs except the costs incurred by the federation in putting forward the defence that the federation was not responsible for the acts done in in October and November, 1901. Those costs the federation must itself bear; and the federation must also pay such part of the plaintiffs' costs as is attributable to meeting that defence.

PARISH COUNCIL OF RUTHERGLEN v. PARISH COUNCIL OF GLASGOW. (a.)

Poor law—Law of Scotland—Wife deserted—Acquiring settlement.

Under the Scotch law, where a husband deserts his wife, she cannot acquire a settlement for herself; the fact of the desertion cannot avail to alter the liability of the husband's parish to support his wife and children.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Session in Scotland, 38 Scot. L. R. 528.

The question was whether Mrs. Faulds, who was deserted by her husband in 1893, had acquired by residence a settlement for poor law purposes in the parish of Rutherglen.

The birth settlement of both husband and wife was the Barony parish of Glasgow, now part of the respondents' parish.

In 1893 the wife applied to the Barony parish for relief for herself and her five children, who were under age, and her application was granted. Later Mrs. Faulds left the Barony poorhouse, taking her eldest child with her.

After the release of her husband from prison for desertion, he contributed nothing to the support of his wife and the child she took with her; but he sent small sums to the respondents for the maintenance of the other four children up to 1896, when he ceased to contribute.

Mrs. Faulds resided continuously in the appellants' parish without application for parochial relief for three years and ten months, until she became chargeable to the parish.

The case was argued before seven judges, and a majority held that the wife had acquired a settlement in the appellant parish.

Graham Murray, L.A., Orr Deas, and W. C. Henderson, for the appellants.

Shaw, K.C., Clyde, K.C., and R. B. Pearson, for the respondents.

Their lordships took time for consideration.

Lord ROBERTSON.—For the clearer discussion of the important general question raised by this appeal, I intend to assume, without reservation, that Alexander Faulds had deserted his wife from and after the 16th of October, 1893. By the time she became chargeable she had resided for the statutory period (without begging or receiving relief) in the appellants' parish, and if it be legally possible for the wife of a living Scotsman who himself has a parochial settlement in Scotland to acquire an industrial settlement for herself in a different parish from his, and so to relieve her husband's parish, then the appellants are liable. But the starting point of the case is that the respondents are the parish of the husband's settlement; and what they have got to make out is that they are freed from their liability for his wife by the fact that he deserted her; for but for the fact of his desertion, it is not, in the meantime at least, maintained that her separate residence in Rutherglen would of itself avail. Why this distinction should be drawn, and what is the special virtue of desertion in releasing the husband's parish from liability to maintain his wife are, however, questions which it is difficult to evade, and this will recur in what I have to say. The question before your lordships' House is simplified by the clearness with which it is stated in the opinions of the learned judges. What their lordships have held is, to quote the words of Lord Kinnear, that "it is settled now in law that the desertion by a husband of his wife is the death of the husband, and that the desertion by the husband puts the wife in the position of earning a residential settlement for herself, because it enables her or compels her to earn her own living, and to earn her own living as if she was an unmarried woman or a widow." Now, there is certainly some show of authority for this proposition, although of itself it sounds rather startling, and although the boldness of its expression invites criticism. But, while the majority of the seven judges, whose decision is under review, may have been right in thinking themselves bound by the more recent instead of by the earlier statements of the law on the subject, I am sorry that so strong a court as was constituted to consider this question did not critically examine the grounds upon which the formula rests, for they might ultimately have deemed themselves free to act on their independent judgment. The very careful argument to which your lordships have listened has compelled such an examination by this House; and, as far as I am concerned, I am unable to support the judgment appealed against. First of all, the proposition that the desertion of the husband is equivalent to his death is, no doubt, suggested by the juridical position of a widow under the Scottish poor law. A widow, it had been held in Heritors of Crieff v. Heritors of Fowlis-Wester, 4 Ct. Sess. Cas., 2nd Ser., 1538, in 1842, can acquire a residential settlement for herself, and for children living with her in a parish where she has resided industriously as the head of the family. This seems a very sound proposition, and for present purposes I have nothing to say against it. The woman in that case has no husband; she is under no disability, and there is nothing and nobody to prevent her from acquiring a settlement for herself. But when it is proposed to assimilate to a woman having no husband a woman who has one, a question of the gravest principle arises. Now, this question did arise in Scotland five years after the Crieff case in Gray v. Fowlie, 9 Ct. Sess. Cas., 2nd Ser., 811, in circumstances which, for practical purposes, are exactly the same as the present (the husband being a living but deserting Scotsman with a Scottish settlement), and it was decided by the whole court (by nine to four) that a deserted wife was not in the same position as a widow, but presented a case distinguished by the most vital difference. The case was deliberately considered. All and more than all the arguments which have been submitted to your lordships' House on the present occasion on behalf of the respondents are to be found in the judgments of the minority of the court.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was then said that the law recognized in a deserted wife capacities to act independently, in contracts and in suits, which made it reasonable that she should be held to acquire by her independent and industrious residence an independent settlement, and this view was supported by full illustrations of the common law. The reply of the Lord Justice-Clerk Hope shows that this view of the question, at its best, was fully realized and fully met. His lordship pointed out, in a passage of great merit, that the Scottish law in the chapter referred to did no more than come to the aid of a deserted wife by relaxing her disabilities so far as is necessary for the business of life in her isolated position, that the law in making such exception did not proceed on any view that the marriage was dissolved, or the woman's status altered, or that third parties can plead liberation of obligations towards her because of the husband's illegal conduct in deserting her. The right to separately contract and separately sue, where this conduced to or facilitated her gaining her living while left alone, did not, in the view of the Lord Justice-Clerk, and of the majority in Gray v. Fowlie, involve any change of liability on the part of third parties to support her as the wife of the deserter. Now, if this case of Gray v. Fowlie stood alone, it is admittedly directly in point; it is a decision of the whole court, and it meets, directly, the argument on the common law rights of a deserted wife, which at your lordships' bar has been indicated rather than developed. No one can pretend that Gray v. Fowlie is not in diametrical opposition to the doctrine that desertion is the same as death; and what is said is that Gray v. Fowlie is no longer law. Now I think it is true that, in later decisions, the Divisions of the Court of Session have disregarded this decision of the whole court, and have pronounced judgments inconsistent with it, but it has never been formally overruled. What is more, from Gray v. Fowlie down to the present time, there has been no revival of the theory that the common law capacities of a deserted wife led to, or opened the door for, her acquisition of a residential settlement in the parish where she had exercised those capacities. As will immediately appear, the cases which set up the doctrine that desertion is death were not cases of a residential settlement at all, but of a maiden settlement. The theory that desertion is death may be good or bad, but it does not pretend to rest on the common law about deserted wives being able to contract and to sue. How the newer and conflicting doctrine came into vogue was thus: A series of cases occurred in which, instead of the deserting husband having, as in Gray v. Fowlie, a Scottish settlement, he had (or was supposed to have) no settlement available for attack by the relieving parish. This was the case in Hay v. Skene, 12 Ct. Sess. Cas., 2nd Ser., 1019; in Gibson v. Murray, 16 Ct. Sess. Cas., 2nd Ser., 926; and in Carmichael v. Adamson, 1 Ct. Sess. Cas., 3rd Ser., 452. What was said in those cases was that you must find a settlement somewhere, and that as the husband had none you must turn to the wife's own settlement (which in all these three cases was her maiden settlement, and not a residential settlement). Now, in passing it may be observed that in more recent times there would probably not be held to be any compelling necessity to discover for the relieving parish some other parish liable to it; and also that where the husband was an Englishman it did not follow that the relieving parish had no remedy under the 77th section of the Act of 1845 merely because that remedy was troublesome. But I will assume, as the court did, that the husband had no settlement; and this is, past all doubt, the ground of decision in the first and most referred to of these three cases—Hay v. Skene. The theory of Hay v. Skene was that a wife does not lose her maiden settlement unless she gets one from her husband in exchange. This is most distinctly laid down by every one of the three judges who were parties to the decision, and, indeed, is repeated to elaboration in the leading opinion. This, moreover, is stated as the justification for distinguishing the case from Gray v. Fowlie—"here the wife has direct interest in the question raised;" that is to say, in Gray v. Fowlie she got, and here she did not get, a new settlement. Now, it is observable that, in the later development of the doctrine, this case of Hay v. Skene was appealed to as settling that desertion was the same as death. In the reported judgments there is no direct expression of such a theory. The view taken was that the woman had her own settlement all along, until she or her husband got another, whereas in Gray v. Fowlie she exchanged her own for her husband's. From the decision in Hay v. Skene Lord Moncreiff dissented, on the ground the proposed judgment was in conflict with the decision of the whole court in Gray v. Fowlie, and Lord Moncrieff, who had been in the minority in the decision of Gray v. Fowlie, says: "The principle is that a wife cannot be separated from her husband except by death, divorce, or other legal process, and must be considered as still part of himself, for whom no claim can be made except through him and against parties liable on his account. But the plea of the pursuer assumes a persona standi in the wife apart from her husband, to the effect of creating rights in one third party against another without any provision to that effect in any statute." Gibson v. Murray, the second of the cases I have named, is distinguished from the present by two vital differences; first, it is the case of a husband having or assumed to have no settlement; and, second, it is not a case of desertion at all but of death, the dispute being whether, the husband being dead, the children took their own birth settlement or their mother's maiden settlement. Its bearing is therefore too remote to justify further comment. Carmichael v. Adamson has much more importance, for several reasons. Here we have, launched for the first time, this maxim that desertion is equivalent to death—received as it was by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis with the remark that he could "find for it no reasonable or intelligible ground." The question in the case was whether an Englishman, assumed to have no settlement, having deserted his wife, the settlement of his child was that of its own birth or its mother's birth and the whole court held that it was the latter. The minority was headed by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, and included Lord President Colonsay. I have grouped these three cases together because they are all cases where the husband had no Scottish settlement. We next come to a case—Mason v. Greig, 3 Ct. Sess. Cas., 3rd Ser., 707—where it was held to be doubtful in fact whether he had or had not a Scottish settlement, and the decision is to that extent unsatisfactory. It was a First Division case in the time of Lord Colonsay. The respondents can fairly claim at least two of the judges as acquiescing in the desertion-equal-death theory, and it is ascribed by Lord Ardmillan to Hay v. Skene. Johnston v. Wallace, 11 Ct. Sess. Cas., 3rd Ser., 699, is another case of a man without a Scottish settlement deserting his wife; he was an Irishman by birth. It was decided on the authority of Carmichael v. Adamson, the Lord President Inglis remarking that he could not say that that decision obtained any support from him, "but it is now a settled rule." Now, down to this point it cannot be said that there was any decision or even dictum to the effect that the same rule would be applied where the deserting husband had a Scottish settlement. But, curiously enough, this was said afterwards, obiter in Greig v. Simpson, 3 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th Ser., 642, by Lord President Inglis, who had most strenuously resisted the rule to which he now yielded, but it was said in a case in which the dispute was between the birth settlement of the husband (of course Scottish) and his alleged residential settlement (also, of course, Scottish)—said, too, on the authority of a decision (Beattie v. Greig, 2 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th Ser., 923) about a deserting Englishman. Greig v. Simpson accordingly seems a rather significant case. The "rule" that desertion is equal to death had now hardened into inflexibility and had lost all relation to its original principle. The question to be decided in that case was whether by efflux of time (five years), during which the man was de facto absent from the parish where he had acquired an industrial settlement, he had not lost it; and the decision was that, having deserted his wife, he must be held to have been dead and therefore not absent, and not to have lost the settlement. The great lawyer who thus followed and extended decisions from which he had vigorously dissented cannot but have seen in this application of the rule a new confirmation of his original opinion that it had no "reasonable or intelligible ground." This closes the catena of cases on which the respondents rely. Of them all there is but one (Mason v. Greig) where, on any possible view of the facts, the deserting husband had a Scottish settlement. The most definite statement of judicial opinion in favour of the respondents on the case of a deserting husband having a Scottish settlement occurs, as I have shown, in a case where neither of the disputants represented either the wife's maiden settlement or her residential settlement, and where, therefore, the vital element in the present controversy was wanting. In these circumstances, on a review of the authorities, Gray v. Fowlie stands out as the only decision directly determining the present question, and it is a decision of the whole court. Its authority might be adequate for the decision of the present appeal. But some of the more recent judgments on which the respondents rely are irreconcilable with Gray v. Fowlie, and the "rule" that "desertion is death" is in direct conflict with the principle of Gray v. Fowlie. It seems to me to be, therefore, impossible to avoid dealing with the question on a somewhat broader ground than at first sight might seem adequate for the disposal of the case. It is not necessary to go back to the origins of the poor law, but it is well to remember that, while by the old Scots Acts birth and residence gave statutory right to relief in the parishes of birth or residence, the two other modes of acquiring such rights—viz., parentage and marriage—are, in the words of the Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in M'Crorie v. Cowan, 24 Ct. Sess. Cas., 2nd Ser., 723, "engrafted on statute law by the necessary application to the statutory system of certain essential and inflexible rules of the common law in the relations of husband and wife and of parent and child." We are taken, therefore, at once to the common law of husband and wife, and the general rule about such matters as are on hand is so clear that the only question is whether some exception arises where a wife is deserted. In order to judge of this question, however, it is needful to notice the ground of the general rule. For this purpose I am going to refer to a case, not cited at the bar, but highly relevant to the the present question, in which this subject was considered by the whole court—the case of M Crorie v. Cowan. The question before the court was whether the Scottish birth settlement of the wife of an Irishman, resident in Scotland, but having no settlement in Scotland, could be made liable for moneys expended on her maintainance in a lunatic asylum by the parish from which she has been sent to the asylum under the Lunacy (Scotland) Act. "To that question," said Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, "I am prepared to give an unhesitating answer in the negative, on the broad and simple ground that a married woman is in law incapable of having any settlement in her own right, or independently of her husband. If her husband has a settlement that also is her settlement. If her husband has no settlement, just as little has she. She is, in my opinion, as completely incapable of possessing a settlement in her own right during the subsistence of the marriage as she is of having a separate domicil from her husband or of enjoying any other personal status or franchise in her own right." I turn to the joint opinion, in the same case, of the Lord President (Colonsay) and Lords Ivory, Curriehill, Ardmillan, and Kinloch, and I find this as the ground of their judgment: "The demand is resisted (inter alia) on the ground that by her marriage with Donaldson her birth settlement was suspended or put in abeyance, and that it cannot revive so long as the marriage subsists; that, being a married woman, she cannot have any settlement of of her own apart from her husband, or any settlement that is not his settlement; that her fate in that respect is linked to his; and that the circumstance which here occurs of her husband not having a settlement in any parish in Scotland does not exclude the application of the general rule. We are of opinion that, in reference to the present case, this defence is well founded, that it is sufficient for the decision of the settlement, and that the parish of Monkton (the wife's maiden settlement) ought to be assoilzied." I cite these considered utterances of eminent judges as enunciations of the geneal law and its grounds; and the grounds are of high and peremptory principle. But occurring, as this case did, after Hay v. Skene, it is evident that M'Crorie v. Cowan was sent by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis to the whole court because of Hay v. Skene, and in M'Crorie v. Cowan the Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis declared himself "unable to reconcile the judgment now to be pronounced with the decision in the case of Hay v. Skene or to save the authority of that case in pronouncing this judgment." His lordship examined the grounds of decision in Hay v. Skene, and pronounced them unsound: "The loss of the maiden settlement does not depend on the acquisition of another settlement, but on the complete merging of the person of the wife in that of the husband by force of the marriage." As I am referring to M'Crorie's case I may explain that, as it is not a case of desertion, its bearing on the series of cases now before the House is through the principles which it laid down. But historically it is quite clear that it went to the whole court because of that relation to Hay v. Skene; and, again, that Carmichael v. Adamson, which occurred the following year, and as already seen, was a case of desertion, went to the whole court because the Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis again saw that, after the decision in M'Crorie v. Cowan, the rule of Hay v. Skene could only be reapplied, if reapplied at all, by the whole court. After Carmichael v. Adamson the Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis seems to have seen that nothing more could be done in the Court of Session, and he gave (in Greig v. Simpson) free play, or perhaps more than free play, to the rule.

The general principle, then, being that the wife is disabled by marriage from having a settlement of her own, how does the fact of desertion effect a change? I have already referred to the judgment of Lord Justice-Clerk Hope as containing an admirable discussion of this question, and I repeat that the common law in the case of separation goes no further towards enlarging the capacities of the wife than is required by the necessities of her efforts at self-maintenance. But all these legal facilities lead no distance towards changing her settlement, and the only reason suggested for that result—viz., the justice of making the community which—conjecturally—has profited by her residence bear the burden of maintaining her is founded on totally different considerations, not relating to the interests of the wife at all, but to the equities of parishes. But, further, what is now asked is that we should hold that the fact of desertion operates as a release of the liability of the wrongdoer's parish and deprives the wife of her claim against that parish. I cannot say that I think this a very rational proposal, but it is at least plain that it bears no relation to the aid given by the law to separated wives, and can claim no support from that chapter of law. I may add that the inapplicability to the present question of the common law appealed to is further illustrated by the fact that the law so appealed to is at once too wide and too narrow for the present case. In some of the aids given to separated wives the law takes no account of the reason of separation, while in others the husband must be abroad in order to give rise to them. It seems to me that the true principle to be applied in all these cases is that laid down by the Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in the case of M'Crorie v. Cowan, that it is of universal application, and that adherence to this principle is the only solution of the numberless complications which otherwise arise. The same rule which was laid down by your lordships' House in Adamson v. Barbour, 1 Macq. 376, in the case of children applies to the wife. The wife is a part of the husband's family. The fact of the husband's desertion cannot avail to alter his own parish's liability for wife any more than for children. But the existence of children in the present case affords another test of the question. One of the children, Catharine, was living with her mother in the appellant's parish. In which parish is Catharine's settlement—in her father's or her mother's? This challenge was not met by the respondents, and their difficulty in answering it is increased by the fact that there are other four children who have not been living with their mother. Where is their settlement? The only way in which these questions can be answered rationally and in accordance with Adamson v. Barbour is by keeping the whole family to the settlement of its head. I regret that it should be necessary to pronounce a judgment which may disturb a certain amount of practice, and I entirely share the reluctance of the learned judges to unsettle poor law decisions. But what has already occurred has shown how an erroneous maxim once asserted is drawn into analogies and deductions alien even to its original conception. The only safeguard against such consequences is adherence to clear and dominant principles, and I have the satisfaction of knowing that the motion which I support does no more than re-establish the doctrine of the earliest and most authoritative Scottish case upon the subject.

CORPORATION OF TRURO v. ROWE. (a.)

Fishery—Oyster fishery—Depositing oysters on foreshore—Incident to right of fishery—Lease of foreshore by municipal corporation—Validity—Sea Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45), s. 41—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 105, 106, 107, 250.

A claim to the exclusive occupation of part of the foreshore belonging to a stranger for the purpose of depositing freshly dredged oysters thereon cannot be supported at common law as incident to the right of fishing for oysters.

Decision of Wills, J. (50 W. R. 151, [1901] 2 K. B. 870), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Wills, J., reported in 50 W. R. 151, [1901] 2 K. B. 870.

The action was brought to recover damages for alleged acts of trespass on a part of the foreshore of the estuary of the Truro River, of which the plaintiffs were lessees, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from committing the acts of trespass alleged.

The plaintiffs were an ancient corporation incorporated by royal charter, and by a charter of 31 Eliz. it was provided that the corporation "may and shall be for ever at all future times persons fit and capable in law to hold, purchase, receive, and possess lands, tenements, liberties, privileges, jurisdictions, franchises, and hereditaments, of what kind or nature soever they be, to them and their successors in fee and perpetuity, and also goods and chattels and other things whatsoever of what nature or kind soever they may be, and to give, grant, demise, and assign lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all and singular other acts and deeds to do and execute by the same name."

By an order of the Board of Trade made under the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, and confirmed by the Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Order Confirmation Act, 1876, the power of regulating the oyster and mussel fishery in a part of the estuary of the Truro River was conferred upon the plaintiff corporation.

By an indenture dated the 4th of June, 1897, the plaintiffs, in order to enable them more efficiently to carry out their powers under the said order, obtained from the lord of the manor a lease of certain parts of the foreshore of the said estuary for fourteen years from the 29th of September, 1896, at a yearly rent of £15.

The oysters, when freshly dredged from the oyster beds in the fishery, were unfit for the market owing to the water being contaminated with copper from the washings of the copper mines in the vicinity, and the fishermen had from time immemorial been in the habit of depositing oysters, when dredged from the fishery, for a considerable time upon a portion of the foreshore leased to the plaintiffs as aforesaid in order to get rid of the copper.

The defendant and other fishermen exercised this right, each having a particular space for depositing his oysters, which space was allocated by an arrangement amongst the fishermen themselves and was staked out by withies stuck in the bed of the river. The defendant, in accordance with this custom, was in the habit of depositing the oysters dredged by him upon a particular space on the plaintiffs' foreshore.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-Law.

The plaintiffs, claiming as lessees of the foreshore under the lease of the 4th of June, 1897, brought the present action against the defendant, alleging that the acts of the defendant in depositing the oysters on the foreshore as above described were acts of trespass committed on the foreshore.

The jury at the trial found (1) that the acts done by the defendant did not constitute an actual occupation of the soil; (2) that such acts were merely incidental to the fishing for oysters; and (3) that the oyster fishery could not be practically carried on without a storage.

Wills, J., gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Duke, K.C., R. J. Parker, and J. A. Hawke, for the plaintiffs, contended that the acts of the defendant were acts of trespass on the plaintiffs' soil.

J. A. Foote, K.C., and Bodilly, for the defendant, contended (1) that depositing the oysters on the foreshore was a necessary incident to the right of fishing, and that such a right as was claimed might exist at law; and (2) that the plaintiffs had no power to take a lease of the land.

Aug. 11.—COZENS-HARDY, L J., read the judgment of the court as follows: The title of the lord of the manor to the foreshore of the estuary of the Truro river (in which term "foreshore" I include for convenience not only the foreshore proper but also the fundns) is not in dispute. The plaintiffs have taken a lease of the foreshore from the lord of the manor. Wills, J., has upheld the title of the plaintiffs under the lease. I think this decision was correct. It may be justified by reference to the ancient charters of the corporation, the rights under which are expressly saved by section 250 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. It is not, and cannot be, disputed that the defendant, as a member of the public, has rights of fishing over the foreshore covered with water. The facts are admitted. The defendant dredges oysters in deep waters and deposits them in a particular section of the foreshore indicated by sufficient boundary marks, partly for cleaning, partly for fattening, and partly to be ready for distant markets. By his statement of defence the defendant claims this as a right—(1) by virtue of a several fishery, (2) by virtue of a local custom, and (3) by virtue of his possession of the ground. By his evidence in the witness-box he treated the ground as his ground and the oysters as his oysters. If it is important to consider quo animo certain acts are done, the statements of the doer are surely the most material, if not the only material, elements. Here the evidence is all one way. But the judge was asked to accept, and apparently accepted, the statements of the defendant's counsel in preference to the uncontradicted evidence. And we have been urged to hold that the defendant only deposits the oysters on the foreshore as an incident of fishing, and that, in short, he is only putting the oysters into the water where anyone may get them. I cannot adopt this view. It makes the action a mere farce. It seems to me plain that the parties intended to try, and did try, the important question whether the defendant has a right to appropriate a section of the foreshore for his own purposes, for storing his own oysters, to the exclusion of the rest of the public. In my opinion such a claim cannot be suggested as a common law right. No authority has been produced in favour of it. Unless interrupted the defendant might acquire a title against the plaintiffs. The findings of the jury were—(1) that the acts done did not constitute an actual occupation of the soil, but were only incidental to the fishing for oysters; (2) that oyster fishing could not practically be carried on without what has been called storage; and judgment was entered for the defendant with costs. The findings of the jury can only be supported on the assumption that all the contentions raised in paragraphs 8, 9, and 10 of the defence were either abandoned by or decided against the defendant, and that the defendant relied solely upon his rights as a member of the public, and in particular that he did not claim any property in the oysters deposited in his section of the foreshore. The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, on the other hand, have raised contentions which they did not attempt to justify. Under these circumstances it does not seem right that judgment should be entered simpliciter either for the plaintiffs or for the defendant. The proper course will be to vary the judgment by making such a declaration as is needed to settle the real questions raised between the parties in this action. Declare that the defendant, in common with the rest of his Majesty's subjects, is entitled to enter on the hereditaments demised by the indenture of lease in the statement of claim mentioned, and on every part thereof, for the purpose of fishing for and taking and carrying away oysters and other shellfish, and also for the purpose of depositing oysters and other shellfish thereon, but is not entitled to the exclusive occupation of any part of the said hereditaments, and is not entitled to any such oysters or other shellfish so long as the same shall continue so deposited. Having regard to the unfounded claims made by both parties, there should be no costs either in the court below or of this appeal. But the costs which the plaintiffs have paid to the defendant must be returned.

CACKETT v. KESWICK. (a.)

Company — Prospectus — Director — Promoter — Shareholder — Contract by directors and promoters — Omission from prospectus — "Fraudulent" prospectus — Waiver clause — Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.

The directors and promoters of a company in process of formation agreed with a firm that, in consideration of the latter's underwriting 10,000 shares in the company, the firm was to receive 12,000 vendor shares as a commission therefor, but 10,000 shares were in fact for the use of the firm's name on the prospectus on their approving of the soundness of the undertaking; and, further, that the firm was to be appointed commercial agents for the company, whose registered office was to be situate at its address, while a member of the firm was to go on the prospectus as chairman of the company. The prospectus of the company did not disclose this agreement, but contained a waiver clause, that there might be various trade contracts and business arrangements of which intending subscribers were to be deemed to have notice.

Held, that the contract was one which it was material to an intending investor to know, that the waiver clause did not give such intending investor fair and sufficient notice of the omission, and that by reason of its omission from the prospectus the prospectus must be deemed fraudulent within section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, though such omission was not in fact made with any fraudulent intent.

Decision of Farwell, J. (50 W. R. 10). affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported 50 W. R. 10).

The plaintiff Cackett, an architect, residing at Newcastle-on-Tyne, claimed relief for non-disclosure in a company prospectus of a contract in breach of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, on the faith of which he had applied for shares which were allotted to him.

The defendants were William Keswick, a member of the firm of Matheson & Co., of 3, Lombard-street, London, E.C., who since its incorporation had been chairman of the board of directors of the Panuco Copper Co. (Limited), Samuel Watkin Carlton, a metal merchant, the vendor to the company and also one of the directors, and Edmund Cook Wheater, a stockbroker in Newcastle.

The last two defendants had been engaged in the formation and promotion of the company.

The company was incorporated on the 24th of May, 1899, with a capital of £500,000, divided into shares of £1, and with the object of acquiring copper mines situated at Monclova, in the Republic of Mexico.

In the same month a prospectus was issued to the public, as the plaintiff alleged, by the defendants inviting subscriptions for 333,334 shares, in which Mr. Keswick and Mr. Carlton were named as directors and the firm of Messrs. Matheson & Co. were described as commercial agents to the company.

The prospectus, after referring to a certain trade agreement dated the 3rd of January, 1898, and setting forth the objects of the company and extracts from reports of experts showing the probability of successful working of the mine and the prospect of large profits, proceeded as follows: "The directors, with other underwriters, have guaranteed the subscription of part of the company's capital, and will receive a commission from the vendor for so doing. The following contracts have been or will be entered into: An agreement dated the 8th of February, 1899, and made between the Panuco Copper Mining Co of the one part and Samuel Watkin Carlton of the other part, under which the vendor agreed to purchase the mine and other property to be acquired by this company. An agreement also dated the 8th of February, 1899, and made between the same parties as the last-mentioned agreement, extending the time fixed for the completion thereof. An agreement dated the 10th of March, 1899, and made between the said Samuel Watkin Carlton of the one part and the said Edmund Cook Wheater of the other part, providing for the division of the profits of the resale to this company. An agreement between the said Samuel Watkin Carlton of the one part and this company of the other part, for the resale to this company at a profit. There may also be various trade contracts and business arrangements in addition to the before-mentioned agreement of the 3rd of January, 1898. As these contracts and arrangements and the above-mentioned underwriting agreements may constitute contracts within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, applicants for shares shall be deemed to waive the insertion of the dates and names of the parties to any such contracts, arrangements, or agreement, and shall accept the foregoing as a sufficient compliance with section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, or otherwise."

By the form of application for shares accompanying the prospectus it was provided that the applicant agreed with the company, as trustee for the directors and other persons liable, to waive any further compliance with section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, than that contained in such prospectus.

The plaintiff, who was an architect residing at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the faith of the prospectus, as he alleged, applied for 500 shares in the company on the 26th of May, and paid the full nominal value in cash.

The company did not prove successful, and an order for compulsory winding up was made on the 4th of April, 1900.

A dividend of 4s. a share had since been paid, but the plaintiff alleged that the assets would only be sufficient to pay a small further dividend.

After the winding-up proceedings had commenced, the plaintiff discovered that on the 10th of March, 1899, the firm of Messrs. Saunders, Fielding, & Carlton, metal workers, in which the defendant Carlton was a partner, had written to Messrs. Matheson & Co. a letter in the following terms:

"Messrs. Matheson & Co., 3, Lombard-street,
"10th March, 1899.

"Dear Sirs,—In re Panuco Copper Co.—We beg to confirm the following arrangement made with you to-day—namely, that in consideration of your underwriting 10,000 shares in the above company about to be formed, you are to receive 12,000 vendors' shares as commission therefor. You are also to be appointed commercial agents for the company and the registered offices are to be located at your address. It is further agreed that your Mr. Keswick will go on the prospectus as chairman of the company.—Yours faithfully, SAUNDERS, FIELDING, & CARLTON."

It was admitted that in pursuance of the contract contained in this letter Messrs. Matheson & Co. underwrote 10,000 shares, were appointed commercial agents of the company, whose registered offices were located at their address, and that they received 12,000 shares.

In view of the existence of this contract the plaintiff contended that the statement in the prospectus as to the contract entered into, was misleading and untrue, and alleged that if he had known of the said contract he would never have applied for shares.

Accordingly he claimed a declaration that the prospectus of the company was fraudulent on the part of the defendants, who knowingly issued the same without specifying the date and names of the parties to the contract contained in the letter of the 10th of March, 1899, and damages.

Farwell, J., held that the prospectus must be deemed fraudulent within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1867, s. 38, and ordered an inquiry as to what sum ought to be allotted to the plaintiff by way of compensation having regard to the price paid by him for his shares and the real value of the shares on the day after the contract.

The defendant Keswick appealed.

Upjohn, K.C., and Martelli, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I always approach these cases under section 38 of the Act of 1867 with a strong feeling of repugnance to the duty which I have to perform, because I think that the section, which, in effect, provides that people who omit to mention in a prospectus a contract which would be material to an intending investor to know—I am adopting here Thesiger, L.J.'s, limitation of the section—though honest men and acting honestly, are to be deemed fraudulent, is one which no judge can give effect to not only without a feeling of repugnance but without a feeling that that which he is doing does not really tend to the maintenance of commercial honesty and commercial morality. To herd together under a collective word like "fraudulent" people who are honest and people who are dishonest in my mind cannot possibly tend to the maintenance of commercial morality. We have in this case a statement of the conclusion arrived at by Farwell, J. He says: "I desire to state clearly that I find no ground whatever for imputing to any of the defendants any fraudulent intention of or any scheme for fraudulently concealing this contract." And the question which we have to decide on this appeal is whether or not upon the facts of the case the issue of this prospectus is an issue which the section compels us to hold to be deemed fraudulent upon the part of these men whose conduct Farwell, J., has thus characterized. Having said that I will now proceed to deal with this case and see how far the facts bring it within this section.

I have already said that I do not propose, and I do not think any judge ever has proposed, to read section 38 as a section in which the words are to be literally construed. If they were to be literally construed the section would really be impossible of just application at all, and therefore I take Thesiger, L.J.'s, limitation in Sullivan v. Mitcalfe, and I ask myself whether this contract is a contract which it would be material for a would-be investor to know before he made his investment. I cannot doubt myself but that this is a contract which it would be material to an investor to know. Even if the contract had been exactly the contract contained in the letter of the 10th of March, 1899, I should have come to that conclusion. I mean by that if there had been no statement on behalf of the defendants as to what the real contract was I should have said that this letter ought to have been disclosed in the prospectus. I cannot doubt myself but that every investor, or would-be investor, in this company would think it a matter of importance that he should know before investing that these were the terms of an agreement under which, amongst other things, Mr. Keswick agreed to appear on this prospectus as chairman of the company, and the promoters agreed that he should be entitled to the position; and when one sees that upon the face of the letter his firm was to underwrite, receiving in shares 120 per cent. for so doing, it seems to me that it is still more abundantly clear that it was a letter which it was material for anyone to see before determining whether he would take shares in this company or not. When one gets to facts outside the letter which are not mentioned in it, that Messrs. Matheson were intended to get the ordinary remuneration as commercial agents quite outside any remuneration provided for in this agreement, and that they were to receive £1,500 a year for locating the new company in their office, and providing the necessary clerical staff, I think they emphasise the materiality of this letter to a would-be investor. It is said that this letter does not contain the real agreement, and Farwell, J., emphasizes that by saying (and it is after he has heard the whole case): "No one now contends that this letter expresses the real bargain with precise accuracy. It is common ground that the whole 12,000 shares were not the commission for underwriting 10,000 shares; 2,000 only were attributable to this commission, and the balance of 10,000 is said by the plaintiff to be for the use of the names of Matheson and Keswick on the prospectus, and it is said by the defendants to be remuneration for acting as commercial agents of the company." I do not think it makes any real difference on this point whether we take the plaintiff's view or whether we take the defendants' view. It seems to me that, even if we treat it as being remuneration to Messrs. Matheson for acting as commercial agents for this company, it was very material for a would-be investor to know that Messrs. Matheson, a member of whose firm was by this very agreement entitled to become chairman of the company, were to receive this sum of £10,000 in vendors' shares. I think it right to dwell upon this part of the case because, speaking for myself, I have a little difficulty—I do not think it is shared by my brethren—in formulating the proposition, about this which is said to be the true contract. It has not been suggested here that there was such a mistake about this contract as would have entitled the parties to have a rectification of the contract. It is rather put that this was an understanding, but if it was not the contract binding between the parties and the letter of the 10th of March was in law and in fact the contract binding between the parties, I have my doubts, not as to whether an oral contract, where there is the oral contract and nothing else, comes within the scope of section 38, but whether, where you have a contract in such a form that as between the parties it excludes any other term whatsoever, a sort of understanding between the parties ought to be mentioned if that understanding was of such a nature that it could not be enforced between them. I daresay there may be some mode of expressing this so as to leave in the statement evidence as to the payment of the £10,000 as remuneration for acting as commercial agents—a contract or a part of a contract—but I have not myself quite arrived at a conclusion as to how such a proposition would in the face of the evidence in the present case have to be stated. I have a difficulty about that; but taking the view that I do of this letter, it seems to me that there is no need for me to attempt to formulate such a proposition at all. I think that this contract, notwithstanding the fact that this or that passed at the interview, even if it be regarded as the only enforceable contract which was entered into between the parties, is a contract which ought to have been mentioned in the prospectus for the reasons which I have given.

So much for that part of the case. I think that the contract comes within section 38. That being so, the only question left is the question as to the waiver clause. I should not like myself to say that in every case where contracts are known to exist the statement that there may be contracts which ought under section 38 to be disclosed would of necessity make the waiver clause tricky or misleading or cause it to be calculated to deceive, which, I think, is the safer expression to use. I think that in each case you must look first at the collocation of words, and I think in this particular case that the break in the first two sentences has a tendency to make the words "there may be" refer rather to the existence of the contract than to the fact of the contract being of such character as to fall within the section. All I wish to guard against is it being supposed that the use of the words "may be" must always make the waiver clause misleading. I think you have first to look at the collocation of words as I have said, and secondly you have to look at the facts and see what is the nature of the contracts which in fact had been entered into and are known to the directors. I gave an example during the argument of a supposed shipping company in which the promoters had secured the services of captains and engineers and others who were versed in the particular seas on which the proposed ships of the new company were to run, and the contracts with them were not disclosed. I cannot conceive that because it was said there may be a contract which ought to be scheduled under section 38 it would, in the case of contracts of that character, make the waiver clause so misleading as to prevent the promoter or whoever was the defendant in the action relying upon it as against the shareholders who had taken shares upon the basis of the waiver clause. On the other hand it is obvious that with regard to some important contracts—with regard to a contract I should say of the character of the contract contained in the letter of the 10th of March, 1899, certainly if you take it in the way Farwell, J., did, who treated it on the evidence apparently according to the contention of the plaintiff as being a contract for lending the name—to use the words "may be," even qualified with the words "which ought to be mentioned under section 38," would make such a waiver clause misleading or calculated to deceive, and in this particular case I do think that the waiver clause, having regard to its exact terms, and also to the nature of the contract which was not mentioned, is a clause which cannot be relied upon as preventing a shareholder who took his shares upon the basis of that clause from suing for damages under section 38. I think that the advice that the letter of the 10th of March, 1899, did not require to be mentioned because of the general words in the waiver clause about the underwriting agreements was not sound. If it was an error of judgment it is one which anyone might make. We all make errors of judgment, especially on questions of law, and that sometimes when the people are solicitors, sometimes when they are barristers, and sometimes when they are judges. I only express my opinion that that was an error of judgment and that this letter would not have been covered by the waiver clause even treating it as expressing the very terms of the contract.

I wish to add, and very emphatically, that I entirely agree with what I understand to be the meaning of the observations of the Master of the Rolls in Greenwood v. Leathershod Wheel Co. I understand those observations to mean that there nothing in the enacted law as it stands to prevent a waiver clause being enforced if it is honestly made and is not misleading, and if that is the case I do not think we have any power, sitting here as judges, to legislate and say we hold that a waiver clause cannot be entered into so as to debar a person who has taken shares from suing under the provisions in section 38. Of course one knows there is a class of cases in which a person cannot contract himself out of the benefit of a statute, but no one suggests that section 38 of the Act of 1867 comes within that class of case. I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the conclusion arrived at by my lord and Farwell, J. I confess that for myself this seems a clear case, and I need only add a very few words. In the first place I cannot doubt that the true contract which was made by the defendant Keswick was one which under the provisions of section 38, ought to have been specified in the prospectus, and that the omission of it from the prospectus compels the court to deem the prospectus fraudulent upon the part of the defendants. But I should like to say that, wholly apart from the provisions of section 38 in my opinion, in common fairness to an intending investor to whom a prospectus of this kind is issued, such a contract as we have to deal with ought to be specified and referred to in the prospectus. Intending investors, to my mind, in common fairness ought to know of the existence of such a contract as this, and I am bound to say that, in my opinion, in this case section 38 works no injustice.

I will only further say with regard to the so-called waiver clause that it gives no fair or sufficient notice to any intending investor that such a contract as this exists, and that the investor is to waive the omission of its details from the prospectus. Further, I think that in the circumstances of this case it was not open to the appellant here to say that the waiver clause had the meaning and operation now contended for on his behalf. I agree in thinking that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion on both points. I think that the contract—by which I mean the real contract made between Mr. Keswick and the promoters is one which ought to have been disclosed. It was a contract made by the promoters of the company with a gentleman who was to be not merely a director but the chairman of the company, and the effect of it was that the firm of which that gentleman was a member were to receive from the promoters a large sum by way of remuneration for the performance of certain services to the company. The nature of these services is stated by the gentleman himself in his evidence. He says that his firm, Messrs. Matheson & Co., were adopting the Panuco Co., that they were to take it into their office and that they were to have the responsibility over a considerable period without especial remuneration in the form of commission, and that it would take a great deal of attention, that it would be necessary to construct a railway, to develop the mines, to undertake the selection of the right people, to investigate fully the property, to survey the country for the railway, and to do many things before it would be possible that the mine would give results—and with reference to these matters services were to be rendered by the firm. It may be observed that some of these things are matters which in the ordinary course would have to be dealt with by the board of directors as such, and further that they would not fall within the scope of the ordinary duties of commercial agents which the firm of Mathesons were to be. The question is, would the knowledge of such a contract affect the mind of a reasonable intending investor thinking of taking shares in this company? It seems to me where we find promoters dealing with a director the fact that the firm of which the director is a member is getting a large benefit in a contract made between the promoters and the chairman of the company is one that naturally would influence the mind of an intending investor in these circumstances.

Then it is said that the plaintiff is prevented from availing himself of any remedy under the statute because he has waived the benefit of the statute by the terms of his contract. I entirely agree with what has just been said by the Lord Justice, that we are not to hold that it is impossible for an intending shareholder in a company to exclude himself from the benefit of the statute by an express stipulation of this kind; but when persons who issue a prospectus make statements in that prospectus with reference to contracts as to which the benefit of the statute is to be excluded, the statements must be in all respects well founded and direct the attention of the intending shareholders to the nature of the contract which has been completed and entered into. In my judgment that condition is not fulfilled by the terms of this prospectus. I think the contract, being what I have stated it to be, is not comprised in any one of the classes of contracts which are referred to in the waiver clause upon a fair construction of that clause. But it is said, and Mr. Keswick has relied upon it, that, having taken great pains, as he evidently did, with reference to the prospectus, and having obtained legal advice as to whether or no everything had been done which ought to have been done in the prospectus, he ought not to be held liable. Unfortunately for him, as it appears to me, he never communicated to those who advised him the real nature of the contract. However unfortunate the omission so to do may be, it seems to me that under these circumstances he is not entitled to avail himself of the benefit of the waiver clause. I agree, therefore, that the decision of Farwell, J., should be upheld.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Nov. 11.

In re VERRELL'S CONTRACT AND THE VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT, 1874. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Leaseholds—Sale by executor—Non-existence of debts.

An executor can sell leasehold property, either for the purpose of paying debts (even after twenty years from the testator's death) or for the purpose of defraying other expenses of administering his testator's estate; but where an executor-vendor gives the purchaser notice that there are no debts, and does not assert that the sale is made for the purpose of defraying other expenses of administration, he cannot make out such a title as can be forced upon a purchaser.

In re Whistler, 35 W. R. 662, 35 Ch. D. 561, and In re Venn and Furze's Contract, 42 W. R. 440, [1894] 2 Ch. 101, distinguished.

This was a vendor and purchaser summons taken out by the purchaser under the following circumstances: Ambrose Verrell, who died in 1884, by his will appointed his wife (the vendor) sole executrix and trustee, and gave all his real and personal estate unto his trustee upon trusts for conversion and to invest the proceeds thereof, and after payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, to retain the income thereof for her own use during her widowhood, and after her death or second marriage upon the usual trusts in favour of the testator's children.

The said will contained the following proviso: "Provided always, and it is my wish that, unless circumstances otherwise require it, my leasehold estates shall not be converted during the life of my said wife, or so long as she shall remain unmarried, but the income arising therefrom shall be paid to her as hereinbefore provided, and at her death or marriage. I give my leasehold house No. 20, Ferntower-road to my son Edward."

On the 1st of September, 1902, the vendor entered into an agreement to sell the leasehold house No. 20, Ferntower-road to the purchaser, but the agreement did not disclose the fact that the vendor was selling in a representative capacity. After examination of the abstract of title the purchaser took the objection that, having regard to the proviso in the will and the specific gift over in favour of the son, the vendor had no power to sell as trustee, and (it being admitted that there were no debts of the testator) that the vendor had no power to sell as executor. The vendor asserted her right to sell either as executor or trustee. This summons was accordingly taken out to determine the question in dispute.

R. H. Roope Reeve, for the purchaser.—The vendor cannot adduce such a title as can be forced upon a purchaser. The vendor cannot sell as executor, for, although it is well settled that the purchaser need not inquire as to the existence of any debts, yet in the present case the purchaser had direct notice that there were no debts. The vendor cannot sell as trustee, having regard to the proviso in the will and the specific gift over of the leasehold property to the son Edward.

R. J. Woodfin, for the vendor.—The vendor has power to sell either as trustee or executor. There is no limit of time after which an executor cannot sell: In re Whistler, 35 W. R. 662, 35 Ch. D. 561; In re Venn and Furze's Contract, 42 W. R. 440, [1894] 2 Ch. 101. The proviso in the will is only an expression of the testator's wishes, and does not prevent the trustee selling if she thinks fit.

R. H. Roope Reeve, in reply [not called upon to reply as to vendor selling as trustee].—In re Whistler and In re Venn and Furze's Contract cannot apply here, as the purchaser has had actual notice that there are no debts in existence.

KEKEWICH, J. (after stating the facts).—The trust for sale is mere machinery. Upon the wife's death the testator gives the property to his son Edward. This is a specific gift to him, and it shows that there is no absolute trust for sale. What the circumstances are that may require a sale it is not easy to guess, but at any rate it has not been shown that any circumstances at all require it, and unless they do so the son could, I apprehend, interfere to prevent the trustee selling, except in pursuance with the terms of the trust for sale. As trustee, therefore, the vendor can make no title. But the vendor is also executrix. Can she sell in that capacity? The testator died less than twenty years ago, but that is immaterial, as even if it were more than twenty years ago there would be nothing in that to prevent the vendor making a title as executrix, as it has been laid down in In re Whistler, and followed in In re Venn and Furze's Contract, that the twenty years' rule made with regard to freehold estates does not apply to the case of an executor selling leaseholds. In the present case, however, there is a peculiar fact which requires consideration. The vendor's solicitors have stated that there are no debts of the testator and that the vendor is not selling for the purpose of paying such debts. That fact does not exist in either of the cases I have referred to and it distinguishes the present case from them. The question then is, has the executrix power to sell the leasehold property which is not required for the purpose of paying debts of the testator. It is true that an executor has power to sell for other purposes besides that of paying debts, as is pointed out in the judgment of Kay, J., in In re Whistler, where he says: "The suggestion is made, with which I entirely agree, that it is not merely the debts of the testator which the executor has to pay; he may have incurred expenses of administration, and he may have to raise money by pledge or mortgage of the personal property of the testator, and these are matters for which it is essential that he should retain the power of dealing with the assets of the testator." In the present case we know that the sale is not for the purpose of paying the debts of the testator; it is true it might be for the purpose of paying such other expenses as are mentioned by Kay, J., but nobody suggests that it is in fact made for any such purpose. I do not think, therefore, that I am bound by the two cases I have considered to hold that the executor can make a good title without making any explanation at all. It is enough for me to say that there is a sufficient doubt about the case for me to hold that this is not such a title as the vendor can force upon the purchaser. [His lordship accordingly held that a good title had not been made out by the vendor.]

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Company—Winding up—Action for calls before winding up—Set-off pleaded in defence—Liquidation of plaintiff company before judgment in action—Summons in winding up for balance order.

Where an action for calls had been commenced prior to a voluntary winding up and set-off pleaded as a defence, but no judgment had been given,

Held, on a summons being taken out in the winding up for a balance order in respect of those calls, that no allowance could be made by way of set-off against the sums payable under that order.

This was an originating summons issued by the liquidator of the above company in its voluntary winding up against the Sir Hiram Maxim Electrical and Engineering Co. (Limited) for a balance order in respect of calls.

The Hiram Maxim Lamp Co. was formed (inter alia) for the purpose of selling lamps manufactured by the Sir Hiram Maxim Electrical and Engineering Co. (Limited). The Engineering Co. held shares in the Lamp Co. upon which calls became payable on the 2nd of February, 1902.

An action was brought by the Lamp Co. against the Engineering Co. for these calls and interests, amounting in all to £1,260 19s. 2d. The Engineering Co. claimed that £1,136 4s. was due to them from the Lamp Co. for goods supplied, and on a summons under order 14, obtained unconditional leave to defend on bringing the difference between these two sums into court.

The Engineering Co., in their defence in the action, pleaded set-off as to the remaining £1,136 4s.

On the 11th of July, 1902, the Lamp Co. passed a resolution for voluntary winding up and appointed a liquidator.

On the 22nd of July, 1902, this summons was issued.

The action had not yet come on for trial.

Rowden, K.C., and Stutfield, for the liquidator.

H. Terrell, K.C., and Hansell, for the Engineering Co.

BYRNE, J., said that it was clear that without the action and the plea of set-off there could have been no set-off against the calls. He was unable to adopt the view that the original debts were gone as soon as the set-off was pleaded; the debts remained separate debts until judgment, and there had been no judgment in the action. On the commencement of the winding up new rights arose and the liquidator was entitled to a balance order for the costs without any allowance by way of set-off. A balance order was accordingly made on the liquidator undertaking to discontinue the action and to consent to the money paid into court being returned.

MACGUARE v. MILLIGAN. (a)

Practice—Costs—Notices after summons for directions—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, Appendix N., 51—Ord. 65, r. 38.

The Rules of the Supreme Court, Appendix N., item 51, apply to notices taken out after a summons for directions has been issued.

This was a summons to review the taxation of a bill of costs, and raised a question as to what was the proper charge to be allowed for notices of applications on further directions after an order for directions has been made in the action.

Before the practice arose of summonses for directions the charges for ordinary summonses were: Preparing and attending to issue, 3s.; paid, 3s.; copy for chambers, 2s.; copy and service on the other side, 3s. 6d. Since, it has been the practice to issue in every action a summons for directions and for all subsequent applications to be made by a notice, instead of a summons, and in place of the allowances formerly made for the summons the taxing-masters now allow: Preparing and attending to issue, 1s. 6d.; copy and service, 2s. 6d.; copy for chambers, 1s.; total, 5s.

In the present case the latter sums only had been allowed by the master for such notices.

Borthwick, for the plaintiff, contended that a notice following a summons for directions was not provided for by Appendix N. to the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, and that the former amounts ought to have been allowed as in the case of a summons.

Rolt, for the defendant.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: In substance the question raised by the summons was whether an allowance of 5s. each for notices after a summons for directions had been taken out was a reasonable and proper allowance. There was nothing special in the particular case, and the matter was one which must be determined on general principles. The present summons was taken out with a view of ascertaining what was the practice to be adopted in future cases. In accordance with the usual practice, a summons for directions was taken out, and then followed notices as to matters incidental—viz, for discovery of documents and a notice to stay the action on the terms of a compromise. The point taken by Mr. Borthwick was that a notice following a summons for directions was not provided for by Appendix N. to the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, and therefore, that the old practice ought to be applied. Item 51 in Appendix N. is, "For preparing any necessary or proper notice, not otherwise provided for, or any demand pursuant to ord. 7, rr. 1 and 2—

(a) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1s. 6d." The notice in question falls within that rule. It was true that notices under summonses for directions were not in force when the scale in Appendix N. was prepared, but the item applied to all notices not otherwise provided for. The 5s. fixed by the master was a fair and reasonable sum for the work in the present case. In some cases it might be high; in others it might be insufficient; but, if the notice were a special one, the master, under item 52, might make a special allowance. Under ord. 65, r. 38, the master in taxing costs had a very wide discretion. In the generality of cases the sum of 5s. was a fair and reasonable sum to allow for notices. The summons, therefore, failed, and would be dismissed with costs.

REX v. JUDGE OF BIRMINGHAM COUNTY COURT AND ANOTHER. (a)

County court—Practice—Joint judgment—Order for committal against one defendant—Power to issue further summons—County Court Rules. 1889, r. 25.

The power of the county court judge to issue a committal order is a new jurisdiction in which he has to consider all the facts of the case, and is not analogous to the old writ of fi. fa. It is therefore within his jurisdiction to give leave to issue a judgment summons against a debtor, even though one has been already issued against a co-defendant to which no return has been made.

This was the hearing of a rule nisi calling on the judge of the Birmingham County Court, or alternatively the registrar, to show cause why an application by the Birmingham Industrial Land and Deposit Co. for leave to issue a judgment summons against one Dryhurst should not be heard and determined.

The facts of the case are as follows: A judgment upon a joint and several promissory note for £7 had been obtained by the applicants against three persons named Dryhurst, Simcox, and Price, and the amount had been ordered to be paid by instalments of 10s. 6d. a month. The instalments fell into arrear, and on the 11th of December a single judgment summons for £2 12s. 6d. was issued against all the defendants. It was found impossible to serve Dryhurst and Simcox, and on the 24th of January, 1902, a committal order was made against Price for £2 12s. 6d. and costs, but it was suspended on payment of 4s. a month. Shortly afterwards Dryhurst's address was discovered, and on the 3rd of February, 1902, the registrar was applied to for leave to issue a judgment order against him. The registrar refused, and his refusal was affirmed by the judge on the ground that the proceedings by way of a committal order were in the nature of an unexecuted execution, and that a second execution could not issue till there had been a return to the first, and that therefore he had no jurisdiction to issue the summons.

H. D. Bonsey showed cause.—The plaintiffs having elected to take a joint judgment against three, cannot now obtain a further execution until a return has been made to the first execution. The execution must follow the judgment: Clark v. Clement, 6 T. R. 525.

Bancroft, in support of the rule.—The plaintiffs have made no election, and are entitled as of right to proceed against the other two. The arrest of a defendant under the old writ of ca. sa. did not operate as a discharge of a joint debtor: Chitty's Practice (1885 ed.), p. 901.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute, and that the plaintiff is entitled to have his application for leave to issue a summons against Dryhurst determined on its merits. No doubt if a committal order were analogous to the old writ of fi. fa. no further execution could issue till a return is made to the first writ. But the jurisdiction by means of a committal order is a new class of jurisdiction. The county court judge has to consider the means of the judgment debtor, knowing how much of the judgment debt has been received on behalf of the judgment creditor. I therefore think that the contention of the judgment creditor is right, that, unless there is a rule of law against it, he ought to have a remedy against the other defendants. But I think it is impossible for us to say that the judge must issue and hear a judgment summons. He has a right to satisfy himself as to position of defendant, and if a very large proportion of the judgment debt had been paid into court it would be wrong to say the judge had not a discretion as to whether the summons should issue. The rule must be made absolute for the judge to hear and determine the application for leave to issue this summons. Upon the hearing of the application the judge can require such information to be supplied to him as he thinks fit.

DARLING and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

KODAK (LIMITED) v. CLARK. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—English company holding large majority of shares of foreign company—Whether controls or carries on business of foreign company—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, Schedule D., case 1.

An English company which holds an immense majority of the shares of a foreign company in which, however, there are independent shareholders, does not carry on the business of that company, nor is that company its agent, and consequently the English company is not assessable to income tax upon the full profits of the foreign company under 5 & 6 Vict. c 35, s. 100, Schedule D., case 1.

Case stated by Commissioners of Income Tax.

This was an appeal by the Kodak Co. (Limited) against an assessment of £1,400,000 for the year ending the 5th of April, 1899, and £365,515 for the year ending the 5th of April, 1900, under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, Schedule D, and 5 & 6 Vict., c. 35, Schedule D., case 1.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case set out the following facts:

In 1880 the business of George Eastman was established at Rochester, New York, to deal in photographic apparatus. In 1884 this business was transferred to the Eastman Dry Plate and Film Co., which had established an agency in London, from which business was carried on all over Europe.

In 1889 this company sold its business in the United Kingdom and in all other parts of the world except North and South America to the Eastman Photographic Materials Co., an English company registered under the Companies Act. The business of the company so sold was carried on wholly independently of the American company by the English company, and the ownership of the two companies was in separate hands.

In 1890 the American company (the Eastman Dry Plate and Film Co.) became merged in the Eastman Co. of New York, and in January, 1892, this company was consolidated under the laws of New York with another company called the New Process Film Co. as the Eastman Kodak Co. This company still carries on business in New York.

The Eastman Co. and its successor, the Eastman Kodak Co., were wholly independent of the Eastman Photographic Materials Co. (Limited), but the latter bought from the former a considerable quantity of the goods in which it dealt.

In 1898 it was determined to form a new company to acquire the business of the Eastman Photographic Materials Co. (Limited) and also the majority of the shares of the Eastman Kodak Co. (Limited).

It appeared there had been a difficulty in getting supplies from the Eastman Kodak Co., and that the object in acquiring the shares was to secure the consideration which would be due on business principles to the holders of a preponderating amount of the shares.

On the 30th of September, 1898, an agreement was entered into between the Eastman Photographic Materials Co. (Limited) and George Eastman for the sale to him of the former's business.

On the 15th of November, 1898, Kodak (Limited) was registered under English laws to acquire (according to the statements in the prospectus) the "property and business of the Eastman Photographic Materials (Limited), and not less than 95 per cent. of the shares of the Eastman Kodak Co. of America, thereby bringing under one control all the Eastman Kodak companies covering the world. "The services of Mr. George Eastman have been secured for a period of five years . . . on advantageous terms."

By an agreement of Kodak (Limited) with Mr. George Eastman it was provided that he should act as joint managing director of the company . . . and should use his best endeavours to promote the interests of the American company.

The bye-laws of the Eastman Kodak Co. provided that the trustees or directors of the company were to be seven, the majority of whom was to be citizens and residents of the State of New York. These were to be elected annually, and shareholders could vote either in person or by proxy.

Kodak (Limited) acquired the whole of the business of the Eastman Photographic Materials Co. (Limited), and carried it on without any change or interval.

They also acquired from Mr. George Eastman 98 per cent. of the shares of the Eastman Kodak Co., but there are, however, and always have been, 818 shares of the Eastmen Kodak Co., held by 30 independent shareholders, whose shares Mr. G. Eastman did not acquire. Some of these shares are held as qualifying shares by the trustees or directors of the company. By the laws of the New York State, Kodak (Limited) is unable to exercise any control over the Eastman Kodak Co. otherwise than as a shareholder at the annual general meetings. On the 27th of January, 1899, Kodak (Limited) granted to Mr. G. Eastman H. A. Strong, and B. H. Clark its proxy to vote at any meeting of the Eastman Kodak Co. Eastman and Strong are directors of both companies and Clark is a director of Eastman Kodak Co. Eastman voted once as proxy for Kodak (Limited) at a meeting of the Eastman Kodak Co. for the appointment of the directors, but otherwise it appeared that Kodak (Limited) had never controlled or interfered with the management of the Eastman Kodak Co. Kodak (Limited) has a number of American shareholders, and the bankers of Kodak (Limited), the Rochester Safe Deposit Co., receive from the Eastman Kodak Co. the dividends due to Kodak (Limited) and retain in America such dividends and utilize a certain proportion for the payment of the dividends due to American shareholders. The residue is left to the order of Kodak (Limited), and no moneys whatever attributable to the dividends coming to Kodak (Limited) from the American company have ever in fact been remitted to England.

It was contended on behalf of the company—

1. That the business carried on by the Eastman Kodak Co. was carried on in America, and neither wholly nor partly in the United Kingdom, and that there was no fact from which it could be found or held that the business was carried on in the United Kingdom, and that therefore no assessment could be made by or under the Income Tax Acts in respect of the profits of the business upon Kodak (Limited).

2. That the profits of the business of the American Eastman Kodak Co. were not the profits of Kodak (Limited).

3. That Kodak (Limited) had only such an interest in the business and profits of the Eastman Kodak Co. as holders of shares in the latter company would have, and no other; that they were entitled only to such profits as were converted into and distributed in the shape of dividends in respect of these shares, and to nothing else.

4. That the dividends to which Kodak (Limited) were entitled in respect of these shares in the Eastman Kodak Co. were taxable only (at most and if at all) under case 4 or case 5 of section 100, Schedule D, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and not otherwise.

5. That the said dividends upon the said shares of Kodak (Limited) in Eastman Kodak Co. were taxable only (if at all) to the extent to which they were actually received in the United Kingdom, and that, as no part of any such dividends had been received in the United Kingdom in fact, Kodak (Limited) were not taxable in respect of any such dividends.

6. That as no part of the said dividends had been constructively received in the United Kingdom, Kodak (Limited) could not be assessed in respect of any part of any such dividends.

7. That the Eastman Kodak Co. and Kodak (Limited) were distinct and independent entities, and that the ownership by the latter of shares even to the extent of 98 per cent. of the total shares in the former did not make the business and profits of the former the business and profits of the latter, and that there was no evidence from which it could properly be found that the business or profits of the former were the business or profits of the latter, and that the holding of shares was not such evidence.

The surveyor maintained—

1. That Kodak (Limited), having their registered office in England, were liable to assessments upon their total profits, including those of the Eastman Kodak Co.

2. That if Kodak (Limited) were held to be chargeable under case 4 or 5 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D, s. 100, then that the whole of the dividends of the Eastman Kodak Co. were constructively, if not specifically received in the United Kingdom.

Paragraph 15 of the special case is as follows: "After hearing the whole of the evidence . . . we found as a fact that the English company controlled the American company from England, and that the head and seat and directing power of the appellants' company are at their registered office in London."

Paragraph 16: "We therefore held . . . that the American company is carried on by and is the business of Kodak (Limited), and that the profits and business are technically the profits and business of Kodak (Limited). That if the business at Rochester is, and the profits made thereat are technically the profits of the American company, the American company for all purposes are the agents of the appellant company. That Kodak (Limited) is liable for its profits made in America, under Schedule D, case 1."

The question for the opinion of the court was whether on the facts there was any evidence to justify these holdings, and whether such holdings were correct in point of law or were erroneous.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Kerly with him), for the appellants.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and Sir E. Carson, S.G. (S. A. T. Rowlatt with them), for the Crown.

The following cases were also cited in addition to those mentioned in the judgment: Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Bishop, [1901] 1 K. B. 153, 49 W. R. Dig. 77; Rex v. General Commissioners of Taxes for Clerkenwell, [1901] 2 K. B. 879, 50 W. R. Dig. 76.

PHILLIMORE, J.—This is a very important case evidently in point of amount. The facts in it are numerous and complicated, but I have been so much assisted by the learned counsel on both sides that they have been brought in my mind to a very small point, and I am prepared to give judgment at once.

The commissioners have found in an inferential form—upon the facts already found, that the American company—the Eastman Kodak Co.—"is carried on by, and is the business of the appellants, and that the profits and business are technically the profits and business of Kodak (Limited)." Secondly, "That if the business at Rochester and the profits made thereat are technically the business and profits of the American company, the American company for all purposes are the agents of the appellant company"; and having so found, they state this question for the court: "The question for the opinion of the the court is whether on the facts there was any evidence to justify our holdings, and whether such holdings are correct in point of law or are erroneous." They find, of course, a great number of other facts in the course of the case, and in paragraph 15 they find some of the facts—facts summing up the whole evidence—which have also to be considered; and I am bound to say at once that of the two findings in paragraph 15, I think the earlier is the only important point in conflict with the holdings of paragraph 16. They "found as a fact that the English company controlled the American company from England, and that the head and seat and directing power of the appellants' company are at the appellant's registered office in London." As to their second conclusion there is no doubt; but with regard to the first, if the English company controlled the American company from England, it would seem to me (for reasons which I will give more fully in the course of my judgment) that the proper thing to do would be able to apply the principle of the case of the San Paulo Railway Co., 43 W. R. 339, 44 W. R. 336, [1895] 1 Q. B. 580, [1896] A. C. 31, and to say that the American company was carrying on the business in England, and that the American company could be taxed in England. The view of the commissioners is not that, but that the English company is to be taxed in England because the business which is carried on in America is substantially the business of the English company.

Now, in order to arrive at conclusions of law in this case I am guided by certain decisions. First of all, there is the case of Colquhoun v. Brooks, 38 W. R. 289, 14 App. Cas. 493, which establishes shortly that a sleeping partner in England in a business carried on abroad is taxable in respect of the income which he receives in England from that business, but is not taxable on the profits of that business or bound to return them; and when I have said that about Colquhoun v. Brooks I have said all that is necessary for this case, except that I ought to quote that passage from Lord Herschell's judgment which was put before me in argument (38 W. R., at p. 291): "Indeed in this very case, if the business in which the respondent is a partner were disposed of to a joint stock company, and he retained his interest in the form of shares in that company, though the annual return to him might be precisely the same, he would, I take it, be clearly free from the taxation it is now sought to impose." Following on the case of Colquhoun v. Brooks comes the case of the San Paulo Railway Co. v. Carter, to which I have already referred. That case pointed out that in Colquhoun v. Brooks the successful appellant was merely a sleeping partner, and that where the partners resident in England are not sleeping partners, and do a portion of the partnership work in England, or where it being a company doing the main part of its work abroad, there is still a controlling power and brain power exercised in England by a body of directors in England, that company is held to be, or that partnership is held to be, a partnership or a company which carries on its business partially—not wholly—in England, and by reason of this partially carrying on of its business in England is liable to be taxed. Then, following on those cases, comes the case of the Bartholomay Brewing Co. v. Wyatt, 42 W. R. 173, [1893] 2 Q. B. 499, which, I cannot help saying, has, I think, been sometimes not sufficiently understood. My brother Wright's judgment in that case seems to me to rest, as he put it, upon two grounds. It was decided by him before the House of Lords had decided the case of the San Paulo Railway Co. v. Carter, and therefore on the first ground it was not strange that he did not see the limitation of Colquhoun v. Brooks, and that he took a point which the San Paulo Railway Co. v. Carter shows not to be a good point; but the second point which he took is, I think, well worthy of attention, and I do not think it has been interfered with by any subsequent decision or withdrawn by the learned judge himself (42 W. R., at p. 176): "I think that in point of law whatever control is exercised by the English company is exercised by it as the holder of practically all the shares in the American company; and if that is so, the English company cannot be properly said to carry on the business of the American company at all." I need not read the following words. That passage shows that one must not make the jump from "control" to "carrying on business." A company may control another company; but it does not necessarily follow that because an individual controls the company, or the company controls the company, or the company controls the individual, that the business carried on by the person or company controlled is necessarily a business carried on by the controller; and particularly is that the case when the machinery of companies is used and the controller is a company; and I do not think my brother Wright's language in that case can be passed by, for it is, to my mind, very important. Then comes a group of cases, in all of which Mr. Apthorpe appeared as the surveyor of taxes and as the respondent, and I think that those cases require a little consideration; but when considered it will be seen that no one of them covers this case. In the first of them—the Frank Jones Brewing Co. v. Apthorpe, 15 Times L. R. 113—there was but one company in England carrying on the business in the United States, and for the purpose of the business there working through the American committee. All that the court had to decide was, did that come within the San Paulo case or did it not? Was so much of the brain power exercised out in America and so little in England that it did not come within the San Paulo case, and that the company was an English company carrying on business in America, though, no doubt, largely carrying it on through an American committee, and, therefore, was taxable? In United States Brewing Co. v. Apthorpe, [1898] 4 Tax Cas. 17, the facts were the same, except that the United States Brewing Co. was carrying on the business in several States in America, in some of which it was not possible for a corporation to hold land, and did in those States carry on its business through the machinery of its native company—a company formed in that State—and while having by far the largest part of the interest in shares in those subsidiary companies, still had allowed those shares to be owned, or apparently owned, by individuals. Whether those individuals held them in their own right, or whether they held them merely as trustees for the company, is not very clearly found by the case; but the learned counsel who argued the case for the United States Brewing Co. said this: "The only difference between this case and that of the Frank Jones Brewing Co. v. Apthorpe is that two of the five breweries belonging to the United States Brewing Co. are in the State of New York. In that State property cannot be held by an English company, and, therefore, an American company actually holds the breweries. But inasmuch as the committee of management is appointed from home by the English company, and for that reason the existence of the American company is only a question of title and machinery, I cannot distinguish this case from that of Frank Jones Brewing Co." I do not know that I quite follow his chain of argument in which he says: "and for that reason the existence of the American company is only a question of title and machinery." I think the gap in that argument should be filled in this way: "That inasmuch as I cannot rely on these three shareholders as having any substantial interest, and then it only becomes a question of where the actual work is done, I cannot distinguish this case." However, upon the case—which did not find that these three shareholders had any substantial interest—which did find that the company was formed merely in order to meet the rules of the State of New York—and upon the admission of counsel, the court, which had already decided the Frank Jones case, said they could see no distinction there; so upon that admission and on those definite findings, they gave the same decision. I do not regard that case as touching this. Then comes the somewhat difficult case of St. Louis Breweries v. Apthorpe, 47 W. R 334, 79 L. T. Rep. 551, where I cannot help thinking that the learned judges were allowed to suppose by some mistake that my brother Wright had withdrawn more of his judgment in Bartholomay Brewery Co. v. Wyatt than in fact he had done; but, at any rate, there are two or three reasons why that case does not decide this; and the first reason is that in that case—as in the next I am going to mention—the commissioners stated the parties out of court. They found the facts. They did not say that they had put all the evidence upon which they found those facts into the case; they did not ask the court whether the evidence in the case stated by them was sufficient to entitle them to find those facts; but they found the facts, and did not ask the court whether or not there was legal evidence to support them, and they found that the business which was carried on in the United States was in fact carried on by, and was the business of, the appellant company, and that the profits made were the profits of the appellant company; and then there was a subsidiary finding too. That is the first reason why that case does not govern this. The second reason is this. There were (as in this case) two companies, and (as in this case) the great majority of the shares in the American company belonged to the English company, which was the controlling company; and (as in this case) there were a small number of shares (fourteen in all) which did not belong to the controlling company, thirteen of which were held by the directors (thirteen in number) out in America, who held one each; but there was no finding there that those directors held those shares in their own right and as independent people. There were several points in that case which would lead any court to hold that substantially they were nominees, or trustees, or conduit pipes, and that the business of the American company was as much the business of the English company as if the English company had owned every share in the American company; and upon that the court held (as I should myself be quite prepared to hold, even unguided by that case) that in those circumstances the mere existence of the paper company out in America did not prevent the business carried on in America being the business of the English company, and that, therefore, the English company was taxable for that business. Last of all comes the case of Apthorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Co. (Limited), 80 L. T. Rep. 395, 47 W. R. Dig. 75, which is more important because it went to the Court of Appeal. There, as here, there were two companies. There, as here, the majority of the shares were in England. There, as here, there were a few shares left outstanding (in that case three); but there again the commissioners found as facts that the business carried on at Chicago, in the United States of America, was in fact carried on by, and was the business of, the respondent company; and the Court of Appeal largely went upon the question that they could not go behind those facts. Smith, L.J., though he does, no doubt, discuss the facts, says at the end and at the beginning of his judgment that he was really concluded by the decision of the commissioners in point of fact. He goes so far as to suggest that if the facts are incorrectly stated (and he evidently thinks it possible that they were) it would be possible to raise the matter upon a new assessment in another year. And Collins, L.J., says the commissioners had stated the brewery company out of court; and more than that, there were two very important considerations in that case. First of all, in that case the English company not only bought the shares of the foreign company, but they bought the business and assets and goodwill, and everything else of the foreign company, and took transfers of everything except the real estate, which they were obliged to leave outstanding in the foreign company, and I think that it is upon that and the finding of the commissioners that Collins, L.J., decided. He found as a fact that they were carrying on the business as brewers in Chicago; and he, I think, considered that the American company was not so much the instrument with which they carried it on as the screen behind which they carried it on, and taking the two matters—that they had actually bought the assets in the business, and that the commissioners found as a fact that it was their business—he had very little difficulty in deciding that they must be taxed upon it. The second point is this—that I do not find throughout that case any suggestion that the three outstanding shareholders had any real interest in their shares; and when I come to the judgment of Romer, L.J., I feel sure that he assumed that they had no interest, however small, in those shares at all. I read from his judgment (80 L. T. Rep., at p. 400): "I think that intention was carried out. The business was taken over by the English company, and has since been managed under the direction of the English company, which acted in Chicago by its agents there, although, no doubt, the American company was kept on foot for the purpose of holding real estate in Chicago for the English company, and otherwise preventing American law from interfering with the carrying on of the business by the English company in America." Now, those are the previous cases.

In this case the position is remarkable. No doubt Kodak (Limited) holds 98 per cent. (an enormous proportion) of the shares in the Eastman Kodak Co. in America, but it does not hold the remaining 2 per cent., and it is stated—and the facts before me show, as far as they stand—that the number of shareholders holding 2 per cent. of the whole shares are independent people, having their own interest in the Eastman Kodak (Limited), to which they adhere, and in respect to which they must be considered. Now, that being the case, I do not think it can possibly be said that Kodak (Limited), though controlling and managing the Eastman Kodak Co., is, when the Eastman Kodak Co. carry on business under its control, thereby itself carrying on the business. The Eastman Kodak Co. carries on business for its 100 per cent. of shareholders; 98 per cent. of those are the English company, and it has to carry on its business, as far as it lawfully can, under the control of, and in obedience to, the English company and its nominees; but it does not carry on the business for the English company, but for the English company plus the 2 per cent. in America; and when one comes to consider what the relations between the two companies are, one sees that it is very important to keep that provision in view. The American company are manufacturers and vendors, and the English company are buyers. Obviously, if the business of the American company was the business of the English company it would not matter, except as a matter of book-keeping and account, at what rates the goods transferred from the Eastman Kodak Co. to Kodak (Limited) were debited and credited. It matters exceedingly to the 2 per cent. of the American shareholders that those goods should be debited and credited at the highest possible value which could be obtained for them in the market. Therefore, I think, though the English company controls the American company, the business which the American company carries on is not the business of the English company; and it is impossible upon the documents so to hold; and the matter being—except in respect of some oral evidence which was given, not on behalf of the Crown, but on behalf of Kodak (Limited)—entirely a matter of documentary evidence and construction, I am bound to hold that there was no evidence on which the commissioners could lawfully hold that the American company is carried on by, and is the business of, the English company, so that the profits and business of the American company are technically the profits and business of Kodak (Limited); 98 per cent. it may be of the profits and business are technically the profits of their business, but the whole are not. The second finding there is even more difficulty in supporting, and it is more easy to dispose of: "That if the business at Rochester and the profits made thereat are technically the business and profits of the American company, the American company for all purposes are the agents of the appellants' company." They are not. They are a different entity with different constituents bound to carry on the business for the best advantage of those constituents; no doubt very largely the English company is the principal constituent of it; nevertheless, the American company carries on the business for its own company, and not for the appellant company. As I have already said, and I now repeat, the statement in paragraph 15 does not help, but to my mind rather interferes with the finding of the commissioners in paragraph 16. They seem to have mixed up, and throughout the argument in this case there seems to be a mixing up of, two very different questions. First of all, whose business is it that is being carried on abroad? That is one question. A company may be formed in England and there may be a sham company in America purporting to be carrying on business, and yet it may be the business of the English company carried on abroad. That is one question. Then the other question is, If the business is really carried on abroad, but the directorate—the company that carries it on—is in England, where is the control for the purpose of settling the question of taxation? One question is, Whose business is it? The other is, Who controls the one business? Now, the San Paulo Railway case and the Frank Jones Brewery Co. case (and some others) deal with the question of, Where is the control? There is one business carried on in America—one business carried on abroad: Where is the control? If it is in England, then the business is partially carried on in England, and is taxable here. The other class of cases do not deal with that. They deal with the question of whose is the business carried on abroad, Is it the business of the English company, or is it the business of someone else? If it is the business of someone else, it matters not that the English company control it, supervise it, administer it; it is the business of the foreign company, and the foreign company own it. Therefore I think that, upon this case and these questions, I must give judgment for the appellants and remit the case to the commissioners, directing them that there was no legal evidence upon which they could hold "that the American company is carried on by and is the business of the appellants, and that the profits and business are technically the profits and business of Kodak (Limited)," nor that they could hold "that if the business at Rochester and the profits made thereat are technically the business and profits of the American company, the American company for all purposes are the agents of the appellant company." But having done that, there remain at least two very serious questions, which may or may not have been pressed by the Crown, that have to be considered before this matter is settled. The first of those, which I confess I have only arrived at late in the course of this case, is the question whether the proper view is not that Kodak (Limited) ought to return as part of its profit, not merely the profits which it makes and the dividend which it receives from the Eastman Kodak Co., but, if for some reason or other it is more convenient to the Crown to try it in another way, the actual profits made by the Eastman Kodak Co. I am not at all certain that the true view is not that 98 per cent. of the profits of the Eastman Kodak Co. ought not to be returned by Kodak (Limited), as part of its profits; but that point has not been argued before me, nor does the case probably state every fact necessary in order to determine that; and, of course, one must remember that no shareholder has a right to any profits until the dividends are declared. At the same time, remembering here what an enormous preponderance Kodak (Limited) holds of the shares, it may be that the true view here is that Kodak (Limited) ought to be taxed upon 98 per cent. of the profits of the Eastman Kodak Co. The other question is, which is not, of course, raised in this case, whether they ought not to include, at any rate in their return, the dividends declared—I do not say received, but the dividends declared—by the Eastman Kodak Co., and paid over, at any rate to the agent of Kodak (Limited) in America, even if they never reach, in meal or in malt, this country.

There remains again another question, which might or might not affect this case, as I have said earlier, upon the finding in paragraph 15; if that be correct (of course it does not bind the Eastman Kodak Co.), that is whether the Eastman Kodak Co. must not return its profits as a company carrying on its business partially in England, because the control and brain is in England, and whether under one of those clauses of the Act (which I have not carefully looked into) under which factors, agents, and stewards, and so on must make a return, so perhaps the Crown may compel Kodak (Limited) to make a return on behalf of the Eastman Kodak Co. Those are all matters which I am not determining to-day. I suppose that all I can do is to pronounce my opinion upon these two questions and remit the case to the commissioners; and there will be the costs of the appeal.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

In re ILIFF. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Proof—Substitution of proof by assignee of proving creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 58, 63.

The assignee of a proof who desires to take the benefit thereof, after satisfying the official receiver or trustee of the validity of the assignment, should apply to the court to give leave to the official receiver to place a proof by him (the assignee) on the file in place of the proof of the assignor.

Application by way of appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge O'Connor, in the county court at Sunderland, for directions as to the procedure to be adopted by the assignee of a proof in order to obtain the dividends due under the proof.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The applicant, who was the assignee of a proof in the bankruptcy, had asked the official receiver, as trustee in the bankruptcy, to examine into the proof and the assignment, and if satisfied therewith to put a proof on the file in the name of the assignee in substitution for the proof of the assignor, that being the procedure suggested by the court in the case of In re Frost & Frost, 47 W. R. 512, [1899] 2 Q. B. 50.

The official receiver, having examined into the matter, expressed his willingness to place the assignee's proof on the file if ordered to do so by the court.

The assignee thereupon applied to the county court at Sunderland for an order directing the official receiver to place his proof on the file in place of the proof of the assignor.

The county court judge refused to make any order on the grounds that it was no part of the business of the court, and that the official receiver ought to deal with the proof on his own responsibility.

The assignee appealed.

A. Read, for the appellant, placed the facts before the court and asked for their directions in the matter.

H. Sutton, for the official receiver, did not oppose the application.

WRIGHT, J.—In future cases of this kind after the official receiver or trustee has examined into the assignment, and satisfied himself as to its genuineness, the assignee should apply to the court to give leave to the official receiver to place a proof by him (the assignee) on the file in place of the proof of the assignor. In the present case we grant that leave without further application.

TOLHURST v. ASSOCIATED PORTLAND CEMENT MANUFACTURERS (LIMITED).

ASSOCIATED PORTLAND CEMENT MANUFACTURERS (LIMITED) AND IMPERIAL PORTLAND CEMENT CO. (LIMITED) v. TOLHURST. (a.)

Contract — Assignability — Obligation performable by deputy—Action by assignor and assignee.

By a contract between T., the owner of a chalk quarry, and a cement manufacturing company, who were the owners and occupiers of neighbouring land, it was agreed that T. would supply and the company would take and buy at a specified price 750 tons of chalk a week, and so much more as the company should require for the manufacture of cement on their said land. The contract was to last for fifty years. Subsequently the company went into liquidation for the purpose of being amalgamated in a new company with a very much larger capital, and all the property and the business of the old company, and the benefit of its trade contracts, were assigned to the new company. The deed of assignment contained a covenant by the new company to indemnify the old company against all liabilities on trade contracts. In an action by the old company and the new company against T.,

Held, that, as there was nothing personal to the old company in the receiving or paying for chalk, or in the requirements for the manufacture of cement on the said land, the contract remained enforceable against T., and he was bound to supply chalk to the new company at the price specified in the contract.

Decision of Mathew, J. ([1901] 2 K. B. 811, 50 W. R. Dig. 38), reversed.

Appeals from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of two actions without a jury: [1901] 2 K. B. 811, 50 W. R. Dig. 38.

By a contract dated the 5th of January, 1898, between Alfred Tolhurst and the Imperial Portland Cement Co. (Limited), after reciting that the company were the owners of a piece of land at Northfleet, and that Tolhurst was the owner of chalk quarries in the vicinity, it was agreed that the company would construct a tramway on their said land as therein specified, and that when the tramway should be completed Tolhurst would, for a term of fifty years, to be computed from the 25th of December, 1897, or for such shorter period (not being less than thirty-five years) as he should be possessed of chalk available and suitable for the manufacture of Portland cement and capable of being quarried, supply to the company, and the company would take and buy of Tolhurst at least 750 tons per week, and so much more (if any) as the company should require for the whole of their manufacture of Portland cement upon their said land. The price to be paid by the company was 1s. 3d. per ton.

In November, 1900, the Imperial Portland Cement Co. (Limited) went into liquidation for the purpose of being amalgamated with other cement works, and a new company, the Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900) (Limited), was formed for the purpose of acquiring the property and business of the Imperial Co. and of other cement manufacturers. The capital of the Associated Co. was £5,000,000, being very much larger than that of the Imperial Co. By a deed dated the 30th of November, 1900, all the property and business of the Imperial Co. and the benefit of their trade contracts, including the contract with Tolhurst, were assigned to the Associated Co.

Notice of the liquidation and of the sale of the business of the Imperial Co. to the Associated Co. was given to Tolhurst on the 12th of December, 1900.

On the 20th of December Tolhurst wrote to the Associated Co. that he was willing to supply them with chalk at 2s. a ton. On the next day the company wrote in reply that they were entitled to the benefit of the contract of the 5th of January, 1898. Tolhurst wrote in answer that the contract was not one which the Imperial Co. could transfer, that the contract had been terminated by the liquidation of the Imperial Co., and that he was not bound to supply chalk to the Associated Co. under the contract.

The Associated Co. took possession of the works and business of the Imperial Co., and Tolhurst supplied the Associated Co. with a large quantity of chalk.

The first of the two actions was brought by Tolhurst against the Associated Co. The second was brought by the two companies against Tolhurst.

In the first action Tolhurst claimed payment at the rate of 2s. a ton for chalk supplied by him since the formation of the Associated Co., and a declaration that he was not bound to supply the Associated Co. upon the terms of the contract. In the second action the plaintiff companies claimed a declaration that the contract was still subsisting and was a valid and binding contract, and that they were or one or other of them was entitled to be supplied with chalk by the defendant on the terms of the contract.

It was agreed that Tolhurst should go on supplying chalk to the Associated Co. without prejudice to the question whether the price should be 2s. or 1s. 3d.

Mathew, J., held that, as the Associated Co., being an amalgamation of several companies, would have a larger trade than the Imperial Co., and would probably require a larger quantity of chalk, the effect of the assignment might be to place upon Tolhurst a greater burden than he had originally agreed to, and that, therefore, he was not bound to supply chalk to the Associated Co. on the terms of the contract. He accordingly gave judgment for Tolhurst in both actions.

The two companies appealed.

J. Alderson Foote, K.C., Younger, K.C., A. M. Bremner, and H. E. Wright, for the companies.

Pickford, K.C., and George Wallace, for Tolhurst.

Aug. 12.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: The question raised in these appeals is whether a contract made between one Tolhurst and the Imperial Cement Co. (Limited) for the supply of chalk by Tolhurst to the company for their manufacture of Portland cement upon a certain piece of land can be enforced against Tolhurst, the company having assigned to another company called the Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (Limited) its property and undertaking, including the contract in question, without the consent of Tolhurst. The Imperial Co. went into liquidation immediately upon the assignment, and during the pendency of this litigation all its assets have been fully distributed, but it has been kept alive so far as to admit of actions being brought in its name to recover book debts. The deed of assignment also contains a covenant by the new company to indemnify the old against all claims and liabilities in respect of trade contracts, and we were told that this right to indemnity is its sole remaining asset. On the 12th of December, 1900, the old company wrote to Tolhurst as follows: "Dear Sir,—I have been instructed to advise you that the sale of our business to the Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900) (Limited) was completed yesterday, to take effect as from the 30th ult.—Yours faithfully, Imperial Portland Cement Co. (Limited), in liquidation, Ernest W. Elliott for the liquidators." Tolhurst, on the 20th of December, wrote to the secretary of the new company as follows: "Dear Sir,—I have received a communication from the Imperial Portland Cement Co. (Limited), in liquidation, informing me that they had sold their business to the Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900) (Limited), and that such sale took effect as from the 30th ult.; but, as I have received no similar communication from your company as the purchasers, I should be glad to know whether we are to continue to supply these works with chalk, which I am quite willing to do at 2s. per ton delivered alongside your chalk store, your men tipping the trucks on their arrival so that the engine takes back empty trucks without being detained. Pending hearing from you I will continue to supply what may be required at the above rate." Some further letters followed, in which both parties adhered to their original positions, and it was ultimately arranged that Tolhurst should continue to deliver chalk to the new company pending the decision of the court as to whether he was bound to supply it at the price agreed in the contract with the old company. The material parts of that contract was as follows: After reciting that the company had recently bought a piece of land from him, and that he was the owner of chalk quarries, and had constructed a tramway up to a point on land of the company, the latter undertook to connect with it and carry forward another tramway for the purpose of receiving and delivering chalk from Tolhurst's quarries at their works. By clause 2 it was provided as follows: "When the tramway to be constructed by the company as aforesaid shall be completed the said Alfred Tolhurst will for a term of fifty years to be computed from the 25th of December, 1897, or for such shorter period (not being less than thirty-five years) as he shall be possessed of chalk available and suitable for the manufacture of Portland cement and capable of being quarried and got in the usual manner above water level, supply to the company, and the company will take and buy of the said Alfred Tolhurst at least 750 tons per week and so much more, if any, as the company shall require for the whole of their manufacture of Portland Cement upon their said land. And the said Alfred Tolhurst will provide all rolling stock and traction power, and will deliver such chalk by conveying it in wagons, such wagons to be side or end tip as required by the company over the tramways aforesaid, to alongside the wash mills or stores of the company or other convenient places to be provided by them as the company shall direct, but this agreement shall not preclude the said Alfred Tolhurst from supplying chalk from his said quarries to other persons than the company for ballasting or manufacturing purposes or otherwise." By clause 4 the price to be paid for the chalk is 1s. 3d. per ton, and the company are to pay in cash monthly on the 10th of the month following delivery, subject to neither party being prevented from delivering or taking by strikes, &c., as stated in clause 6, which further provides that if Tolhurst is so prevented from delivering, the company may obtain chalk elsewhere. It will thus be seen that the goods were deliverable on credit, and—beyond a minimum amount—to the extent of so much more as the company should require for the whole of their manufacture of Portland cement upon their said land. The litigation was initiated by Tolhurst suing the new company for the price of chalk delivered by him to them at 2s. a ton, and for a declaration that he was not bound to deliver at the contract rate as between him and the old company. The defendants relied upon the defence that they were entitled to the benefit of the contract to have the chalk delivered at 1s. 3d. a ton. The old company was not, in fact, a party to these proceedings, but, I think that, having regard to the correspondence, no point can be made of this. A cross-action was then brought by the new company joining the old to establish that the contract was subsisting and binding upon Tolhurst, and to have it performed. Mathew, J., has held that the contract cannot be enforced against Tolhurst.

It is, I think, quite clear that neither at law nor in equity could the burden of a contract be shifted off the shoulders of a contractor on to those of another without the consent of the contractee. A debtor cannot relieve himself of his liability to his creditor by assigning the burden of the obligation to someone else; this can only be brought about by the consent of all three, and involves the release of the original debtor: see Liversidge v. Broadbent, 7 W. R. 615, 4 H. & N. 603, and cases collected in the notes to Lampleigh v. Brathwait, 1 Smith's Leading Cases (10th ed.), p. 136. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the benefit of a contract can be assigned, and wherever the consideration has been executed and nothing more remains but to enforce the obligation against the party who has received the consideration, the right to enforce it can be assigned, and can be put in suit by the assignee in his own name after notice. Whether the right so created involves privity between the debtor and the assignee is, I think, doubtful; and the rule of the common law that the action must be brought in the name of the assignor shows that it did not regard such a transaction as equivalent to a novatio. The right seems rather to be based on the equitable principle that it would be against conscience on the part of the person on whom the obligation lay to discharge it to the original contractee after he had notice that the latter had assigned the benefit of it to another person. The special right of ignoring altogether the consent of the person upon whom the obligation lies to the substitution of one person for another as the recipient of the benefit would seem in principle and in common justice to be confined to those cases where it can make no difference to the person on whom the obligation lies to which of two persons he is to discharge it, and I think the right of dropping the original contractee out of the discussion must be limited to those cases only in which the contract—that is, the benefit of all that remains to be done under it—has been assigned; and it is in this sense only, as it seems to me, that contracts can be said in strictness to be assignable. There is, however, another class of contracts where there are mutual obligations still to be enforced and where it is impossible to say that the whole consideration has been executed. Contracts of this class cannot be assigned at all in the sense of discharging the original contractee and creating privity or quasi-privity with a substituted person. "You have a right," says Lord Denman, C.J., in a passage cited by Gray, J., in delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of Arkansas Smelting Co. v. Belden Mining Co, 127 Davis's U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, at p. 387, "to the benefit you contemplate from the character, credit, and substance of the party with whom you contract": Humble v. Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310, at p. 317. To suits on these contracts, therefore, the original contractee must be a party, whatever his rights as between him and his assignee. He cannot enforce the contract without showing ability on his part to perform the conditions performable by him under the contract. This is the reason why contracts involving special personal qualifications in the contractee are said, perhaps somewhat loosely, not to be assignable. What is meant is, not that contracts involving obligations not special and personal can be assigned in the full sense of shifting the burden of the obligation on to a substituted contractor any more than where it is special and personal, but that in the first case the assignor may rely upon the act of another as performance by himself, whereas in the second case he cannot. He cannot vouch the capacity of another to perform that which the other party to the contract might, however unreasonably, insist was what alone he undertook to pay for—viz., work to be executed by the party himself. If, for instance, he had ordered a painting from some unknown artist of his own choice, he could not be compelled to accept instead of it the work of another artist, however eminent.

These considerations seem to me to establish beyond all question that the present case is not one where it would be possible to assert that on any rule of law or equity the new company could be deemed to be substituted into the place of the old one at the mere will of the assignor without the consent of Mr. Tolhurst. The latter may be wrong, but he is entitled, it seems to me, to have a choice in the matter of the person or company to whom he is asked to give credit, and he may prefer, and I think he is entitled to prefer, to deal with a particular company doing business in one place on a comparatively small scale, rather than with one which is about to embark on a large combination of competing businesses requiring a very large capital and involving commensurate risks. No instance of such a contract being sued on in the name of the assignee has been adduced, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case cited is clear against it; while for the reasons I have above given it seems to me to fall outside that limited class of cases in which privity or quasi-privity can be said to be established without novation. To support this ground of claim counsel for the appellants relied upon section 157 of the Companies Act 1862, and section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873. But these sections must, I think, be read with some limitation. They have never been construed as rendering assignable contracts which were before incapable of assignment, such as those involving special personal qualifications on the part of the person claiming performance, and they do not override the common principles of law and equity so as to compel a man against his will to accept something essentially different from that which he stipulated for: see the judgment of the court delivered by Channell, J., in Torkington v. Magee, 18 Times L. R. 703. It would seem, then, that the appellants' case can be supported only, if at all, on the ground that the old company is a party to the proceedings, as it certainly is in the action brought by it.

The case, therefore, must be considered now solely on the footing that the action is brought by the original contractees, the old company. In this view the assignment is only material as negativing capacity on the part of the plaintiffs to perform their obligations under the contract. The privity between them and Tolhurst still subsists notwithstanding the assignment, and they are entitled to insist on performance on his part unless he can show a valid defence. Such a defence he might establish if he could show that the plaintiffs had by their conduct repudiated the contract, and that he accepted such repudiation. Or he might show that the plaintiffs had disabled themselves from performing their part of the contract, and therefore could not insist upon performance by him. Both these defences are in fact put forward by Tolhurst, and both are based on the circumstances of the voluntary liquidation and the assignment. It is necessary therefore to consider carefully what is the effect upon the contract of these two facts together or separately. Liquidation of itself clearly does not involve inability to carry out the contract, though it certainly may, coupled with other circumstances, such as those mentioned in Ex parte Chalmers, In re Edwards, 21 W. R. 349, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 289, and Morgan v. Bain, 23 W. R. 239, L. R. 10 C. P. 15, ground an inference that the liquidating company has renounced the contract. Here there does not seem to me to be sufficient evidence to justify any such inference. At the time when these actions were brought and tried the company was in possession of assets undistributed amounting to a very large sum, and could in no sense be described as insolvent, even if insolvency without more could be treated as equivalent to a repudiation of the contract, as it clearly could not: see Ex parte Chalmers. Insolvency alone could at most entitle the person called on to deliver to refuse to do so except on cash terms (see Morgan v. Bain, and Ex parte Stapleton, In re Nathan, 27 W. R. 327, 10 Ch. D. 586); and no point could be made by the defendant here that cash was not offered, since by refusing to deliver at all on the ground that the contract was at an end he clearly absolved the plaintiffs from tendering cash, had such tender been a condition precedent to their right to demand delivery. But, as I have said, at the time of the trial there was no evidence of insolvency. It is true that since the trial and before the hearing of the appeal the assets of the company have been completely distributed, and nothing is left to it but its name and its right to claim indemnity from the new company. But even if we could decide the case by reference to facts as they exist now, insolvency, for the reason I have given, would not be an answer to the claim. How far, then, does the assignment alter the case? It is relied upon for two contentions: first, that coupled with insolvency it proves repudiation; secondly, that the obligations of the contract are such that they cannot be discharged by deputy, and that the company having assigned has disabled itself from performing them. But with reference to the first contention, it is clear from the terms of the assignment that there was no intention to renounce the contract, but that, on the contrary, it was part of the bargain that it should be kept in force, the assignees taking the benefit of it and indemnifying the assignors against the burden, while provision is made for the use of the old company's name. There is, therefore, nothing to ground an inference of repudiation, and the question must be determined by reference to the second point only. That depends on whether the two obligations resting on the old company were capable of performance by them according to the contract, notwithstanding the assignments. The two are, payment for the chalk and "requirement by them for the whole of their manufacture of Portland cement upon their said land" as a condition of receiving the extra quantity. I think there is clearly no personal element in the payment of the price. It could make no difference to Tolhurst from what source it came; and the old company can therefore discharge this obligation by the hand of the new company. As to the other there is undoubtedly more difficulty. The measure of an original contractee's requirements may be very different in a given case from those of a substituted person. In such case clearly the original contractee could not insist on his contractor furnishing a supply equal to the requirements of the substitute, and could not prove that he required it himself. This part of the contract would be personal, and could only be fulfilled by the contractee himself. I confess that I have felt very considerable difficulty on this part of the case, for though the contract provides a minimum quantity I am by no means satisfied that it could be split up, as contended by the appellants, without the assent of the vendor so as to limit it to the minimum quantity only. The price may have been fixed by reference to the possible maximum as well as to the minimum clause. I have come to the conclusion, however, though with some hesitation, that the provision as to requirement is not personal in its nature in this case so as to involve manufacture by the old company itself as the condition of requirement. It is a stipulation regulating the amount of supply only, and the limit is "so much more, if any, as the company shall require for the whole of their manufacture of Portland cement upon their said land." The capacity of the land and the machinery thereon rather than anything personal to the company is here made the standard, and I think the vendor must be taken to have contemplated all such changes as the company might make according to law in increase or reduction of its capital and the possible expansion or contraction of its requirements above the minimum quantity. The minimum and the maximum quantities of chalk to be taken are thus regulated by limits quite outside anything personal or peculiar to the old company. The general rule, Qui facit per alium facit per se, applies to contracts of this class unless there is something in the terms of the bargain or the nature of the obligation imposed to require personal performance. The case of British Wagon Co. v. Lea, 28 W. R. 349, 5 Q. B. D. 149, is a clear authority both that liquidation coupled with assignment does not determine a contract, and that the assignors, a company who by their contract had undertaken to keep in repair wagons which they had let to the defendant, were not prevented from proving readiness and willingness to perform the contract on their part by the fact that they had assigned their business and all their repairing plant to another company. While, therefore, I have had grave misgivings whether the new state of facts brought about by the liquidation and the assignment, involving the practical extinction of the original company party to the contract, and the virtual substitution of another and a very different one, has not so radically altered the vendor's position that he ought to be held absolved from his bargain, I am unable on the whole to find a sound legal basis for his defence. There is certainly an apparent hardship, unless he accepts the new company instead of the old, that whereas before the assignment he had a solvent company to deal with against whom he had an effectual remedy if they refused to perform the contract, now, if the price of chalk was to fall below 1s. 3d., and the new company no longer cared to take it at that price, his only remedy would be against the company wholly denuded of assets. But a vendor has no right to the continuous solvency of his purchaser, and cannot cease to deliver as long as he is paid, although he knows that if the purchaser should decline to take any more in a falling market he would be without remedy. It is further very undesirable that, except so far as we are constrained by law to do so, we should put any barrier in the way of traders disposing freely of the goodwill of their businesses which generally consist largely of trade contracts.

I have attempted to consider the question of the change of position brought about by the assignment on purely legal principles, but it seems to me on the facts, so far as we know them from the correspondence, that these considerations had really nothing to do with Mr. Tolhurst's attitude. He seems to have seized a convenient opportunity of getting rid of a burdensome contract, not because of any real or supposed change of position by reason of the assignment, but because the market price of chalk had risen considerably above the contract price, and he was very willing if he could to reap the advantage of the rise. He must have been cognizant of all that had taken place in the antecedent negotiations involving assignments of the benefit of his contract to nominees and ultimately to the new company before final and formal execution, and he continued to deliver throughout this period and for a week after formal notice without objection. His objection when made is put on technical grounds only. Having regard also to the length of time contemplated by the contract for the continuance of the arrangement, he must, I think, have contemplated possible changes by devolution or assignment on both sides. For the reasons I have given, therefore, I feel compelled to differ from the conclusion arrived at by Mathew, J. But, as far as I can see, we differ only upon an inference of fact as to what under all the circumstances was the real meaning of the bargain. Was it intended to exclude performance by any person other than the old company itself of their part of the obligation? I have come to the conclusion that it was not. I think, therefore, that the appeals must be allowed. The President of the Probate Division agrees with this judgment.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: This appeal raises the question whether by reason of a transaction between the two companies which are co-plaintiffs—viz., the Associated Co. and the Imperial Co., a contract entered into between the Imperial Co. and the defendant Tolhurst has ceased to be operative, or whether the plaintiffs or either of them can now recover damages against the defendant for breach of the contract. The terms of the contract of the 5th of January, 1898, have been fully stated by the Master of the Rolls. It is sufficient for me to say that it provided for the delivery of chalk from the defendant's quarries, by means of an existing tramway constructed on the defendant's land and of a new tramway to be constructed on the adjoining land, at cement works in course of erection on the company's land. The price was 1s. 3d. per ton, and payments were to be made monthly. The tramway and other works contemplated by the contract have been completed.

The Associated Co. was formed for the purpose of acquiring the business of the Imperial Co. and also the business of other cement manufacturers. The price arranged for the purchase from the Imperial Co. was £18,000, payable partly in debenture stock and partly in shares of the Associated Co. The sale was carried through by means of a preliminary agreement and a voluntary winding up of the Imperial Co., followed by a conveyance and assignment dated the 30th of November, 1900. By this deed the Imperial Co. and its liquidator conveyed to the Associated Co. the land and buildings mentioned in the contract and all other the land of the Imperial Co., and assigned to the Associated Co. all the goodwill and connection of the business of the Imperial Co., and the sole use of the trade name of the old company, and the sole right to represent the new company as carrying on the business of the old company, and the full benefit of all pending trade contracts and engagements in connection with the old business, including expressly the contract of the 5th of January, 1898, and all book debts. The deed contained a power of attorney in the usual form and a covenant by the new company to indemnify the old company against all proceedings, costs, damages, claims, demands and liabilities in respect of trade contracts and engagements the benefit whereof was thereby assigned. On the 12th of December, 1900, notice of this was given to the defendant, and the correspondence took place which has been referred to by the Master of the Rolls. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs contend (1) that the Associated Co., as the assignees of the contract, can sue the defendant for the breach thereof, or alternatively (2) that the Imperial Co. can sue the defendant, there having no breach on their part and no abandonment of the contract.

As to the first point, it is clear at common law no action could be maintained by an assignee for breach of a contract of this nature. There is no privity between the Associated Co. and the defendant. But it is said that all this has been altered by section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873—that there is here an "absolute assignment" of a "legal chose in action," which is effectual to transfer the legal right to such chose in action Now this section relates to procedure only. It does not enlarge the class of choses in action the assignability of which was previously recognized either at law or equity. It is designed to avoid the necessity of going first to a court of equity and then to a court of law. Some limit must be put upon the words used. It is plain that there are many contracts of such a personal nature that they do not admit of being assigned—e.g., a contract to paint a picture. And even where the personal element did not come in, the old Court of Chancery did not, any more than the courts of common law, regard the burthen of a contract as assignable. There was an exception in the case of contracts of which specific performance could be granted. But the contract of the 5th of January, 1898, is not in its nature capable of specific performance. In old days the Associated Co. could not have maintained a bill in Chancery to enforce it, and I think the Judicature Act in no way alters the position. It was further contended that a special and larger right was conferred upon the Associated Co. by virtue of sections 95, 133 (7), and 157 of the Companies Act, 1862. But the same considerations which lead to the conclusion that some limitation must be put upon the word "chose in action" in the Judicature Act apply to the use of the word in the Companies Act. It follows that, in my opinion, the Associated Co. cannot maintain this action in their own right as assigns of the Imperial Co. I may add that where there has been an attempted assignment it takes very little to establish a tripartite agreement resulting in a novation, and it may well be that, if evidence had been addressed to the point, novation might have been established in the present case.

The second point presents more difficulty. The Imperial Co. are plaintiffs. Unless something has happened to destroy it, there is now an existing contract between the Imperial Co. and the defendant. The obligations imposed upon the Imperial Co. do not involve any personal skill. To receive chalk when delivered on the premises and to pay for the chalk once a month are things which may well be done by a third person by the direction of the Imperial Co. A power of attorney conferred upon the Associated Co. would enable the latter to do all this in the name of the Imperial Co. Nor would it be material, for the present purpose, to consider the pecuniary position of the Imperial Co., so long as no default is made in payment. If a receiver and manager of the undertaking of the Imperial Co. were appointed by the court in a debenture-holder's action, the defendant could not for that reason treat the contract as at an end. The chalk would be ordered, received, and paid for by the receiver in the name of the company, although the business was being carried on for the benefit of the debenture-holders, and although the company had not a penny of assets not covered by the debentures. Having regard to the number of cases in which receivers and managers are carrying on large businesses, the prosperity, or indeed the continuance, of which depends upon trade contracts or contracts for forward delivery of coal or other materials, I think it important that there should be no doubt on this point. Would the voluntary winding up of the company, after the appointment of a receiver and manager, make any difference? I think not. But suppose the voluntary winding up takes place without the previous appointment of a receiver and manager. Whether the company is insolvent or, as in the present case, not insolvent, I see no reason for holding that the winding up would of itself terminate the contract or authorize the defendant to terminate it. The chalk would be ordered, received, and paid for by the liquidator in the name of the company. Does it make any difference that in the course of the winding up the liquidator transfers the business to a purchaser with a power of attorney, who orders, receives, and pays for the chalk. The liquidator in the present case received a large consideration from the purchaser. If, which I doubt, it be relevant to consider the pecuniary position, the liquidator had, when this action was commenced, ample assets in his hands to discharge all liabilities for chalk, apart from the purchaser's covenant to indemnify. It has been stated that since the assignment and pending this action the liquidator has advertised for claims and has discharged all that have been sent in, and that he has distributed all or the greater part of the residue of the assets between the shareholders. But the company has not yet been dissolved, and I am not satisfied that it can properly be dissolved, under sections 142 and 143, so long as its continued existence is necessary to give effect to the contractual obligations of the company towards the purchaser. Unless, therefore, there is something peculiar in the contract itself, I think the defendant cannot treat it as abandoned. This view seems to be consistent with, and indeed to follow, the decision of the Queen's Bench Division in British Wagon Co. v. Lea. That case decided two points—(1) That voluntary liquidation did not in itself incapacitate the company from performing its contract—the court left open the question as to the position of the parties if and when the company was dissolved; (2) that the company fulfilled its obligations under the contract by finding a new company (assignee of the contract) able and willing to execute the repairs which the old company contracted to perform. That decision in the year 1880 has never, so far as I am aware, been questioned in a court of law. And, unless we are prepared to overrule it, I think the principles there laid down must govern the present case. So long as the Imperial Co. continues to exist, it is capable of suing and liable to be sued. The defendant has no right to insist upon the company retaining free assets to meet future liabilities. The company, before and apart from winding up, might have charged all its assets present and future with a sum far in excess of their value. Such facts, which might reasonably induce the defendant not to enter into a fresh contract with the company, would not justify him in treating an existing contract for forward delivery to the company as at an end. In the present case the Imperial Co. is willing to fulfil, and able to fulfil, all its obligations towards the defendant through the Associated Co. In truth there is no doubt or difficulty as to the money for the chalk being forthcoming.

I have hitherto assumed that there is nothing in the contract which renders it unreasonable to allow the Imperial Co. to perform its obligations by deputy. Whether this assumption is well founded is the real and serious difficulty which this case has presented to my mind.

It is contended that the contract itself binds the defendant to supply not only a fixed quantity of 750 tons of chalk per week, but also so much more chalk as the Imperial Co. may require for the whole of their manufacture of cement upon the land, and that, as the requirements of the Imperial Co. have necessarily ceased, it is unreasonable to substitute the requirements of a new and larger company which may impose a greater burthen on the defendant. Now it is important to observe that no words of succession are found in the contract, although it was to be in force for fifty years. It seems to me that such words must be implied, at least to some extent. The death of the defendant would not terminate it. His executors would be liable to damages unless they fulfilled the obligations to deliver chalk through the agency of his heir or devisee or other person for the time being owning what are called "his said quarries." The stipulation that the agreement is not to "preclude the said Alfred Tolhurst from supplying chalk from his said quarries to other persons than the company for ballasting or manufacturing purposes or otherwise," which is a qualification of what might otherwise have been held to be an absolute obligation to deliver chalk to the company, would, I think, be available after Tolhurst's death. In other words, Tolhurst agrees that, so long as there is chalk in his quarries available and suitable, the owner of the quarries will supply it for manufacture of Portland cement on the particular site which was connected with the quarries by a tramway. That was the real and substantial limitation. The personal element did not come into consideration on either side. No limit is imposed upon the size of the works to be erected on this site, or upon the capital to be embarked in the trade. If the Imperial Co. had increased its capital to £5,000,000 and covered every inch of the site with buildings, the defendant could not have complained. And I cannot accept the suggestion that a burthen is thrown upon the defendant greater than he contracted to bear by reason of the large capital of the Associated Co.

I agree with the Master of the Rolls in holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration that the agreement of the 5th of January, 1898, is a subsisting and valid and binding agreement between the Imperial Co. and the defendant, and for consequential relief on that footing.

I have treated the action in which the two companies are co-plaintiffs as the substantial action. But the question raised in the other action is really identical, and both appeals must be allowed.

Trade-mark—Label—Words "trade-mark" printed on part only of label—Misleading label—Removal from register—Innocent deception.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There is no general rule that whenever the words "trade-mark" appear on a label they must be intended to refer solely to the particular part of the label on which they are placed.

To justify the removal of a trade-mark from the register, on the ground that it is calculated to deceive, it must be shown that it is reasonably calculated to injure some person, and is not a mere innocent deception which would injure no one.

In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Marks, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, 39 W. R. Dig. 237, distinguished.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (86 L. T. 186, 50 W. R. Dig. 170), reversed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 86 L. T. 186), on two motions to remove from the register of trade-marks certain trade-marks registered by Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton (Limited). The first motion related to marks Nos. 915 and 31,837, which were registered as old marks respectively in January, 1876, and March, 1883—915 for Burton ales, brown beers, and stouts, and 31,837 for beers generally. They both consisted of the device of a plain diamond or triangle, and Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton used them coloured red, with the words "trade-mark" on them coloured brown. The second motion related to marks Nos. 2, 27,781, 31,839, 31,840, 43,808, 43,809, and 53,995. These had all been registered as old marks with one exception, and at various dates commencing in 1876, and consisted of oval labels containing a device of a diamond in the centre, across which were printed the words "trade-mark." The diamonds in the labels were of different colours. The labels bore Bass & Co.'s signature, with a description of the kind of beer to which they severally related, and also a printed statement that they were issued only by Bass & Co. The objection taken to the marks was based on the allegation that the diamond was a device common to the trade at the time of registration, and it was further alleged that the labels were calculated to mislead on the ground that the words "trade-mark," being printed on the diamond, would induce a belief that the rest of the label was not protected. The proceedings originated in an action by Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton for an injunction to restrain John Davenport & Son's Brewery (Limited) from infringing their trade-marks and passing off beers as theirs by the use of devices similar to their registered trade-marks. The defendants denied the infringement and the use of similar devices, and brought the two motions to remove the plaintiffs' trade-marks from the register; and Kekewich, J., gave judgment in the defendants' favour both in the action and on the motions. His lordship held that there had been no infringement, that the device of a diamond was common to the trade, and that the printing of "trade-mark" on the diamond alone made the labels misleading within In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Marks, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, 39 W. R. Dig. 237.

Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton appealed from the order to remove their trade-marks from the register.

There was no appeal from the judgment in the action.

Moulton, K.C., Cutler, K.C., and Schiller, for the appellants.

Warmington, K.C., Neville, K.C., and Sebastian, for the respondents.

R. J. Parker, for the Comptroller of Patents.

On the first motion, raising the question whether the device of a diamond was common to the trade at the date of registration, a number of trade-marks were produced in support of this contention, but the court held on the evidence that at the date of registration the diamond had not become common to the trade, and that the other marks could not be confused with that of the appellants. The appeal on this motion was therefore allowed.

On the question arising, on the second motion, whether the placing of the words "trade-mark" on the diamond alone rendered the labels misleading, In re Phillips' Trade-Mark, [1891] 3 Ch. 139, 40 W. R. Dig. 264, and In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Marks were referred to.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L J.—The position of the words "trade mark" on this diamond cannot mislead anyone or do any harm, and that is all that it is necessary to say.

ROMER, L.J.—I should like to say a few words about this case, because our decision may and probably will have an effect hereafter on other cases. I am bound to say, speaking for myself, I do not like the decision, on the point we are now considering, of the Court of Appeal in the Apollinaris case. Of course I should be bound by that decision if it was a decision on a question of law, but I do not consider it was a decision on a question of law. I think it was a decision on a question of fact, and we are therefore not bound by it where the facts of the particular case before us are not precisely the same, and they are not the same here. Personally, I am bound to say that I should not have come to the same conclusion as a question of fact as the Court of Appeal did in the Apollinaris case, but that is immaterial. I should like, however, to say a few words on the principle of a case like this. I think it cannot be that in every case the printing of the words "trade-mark" on a trade-mark label, without more, would be something calculated to deceive. It cannot be wrong, on a label intended to be used as a trade-mark, to state that it is a trade-mark; and you may put the words "trade-mark" on a label so as to denote that the whole is intended to be included by those words. You must put it somewhere on the label; and why, because it is on some particular portion, you are to assume of necessity in every case that that particular portion alone is intended to be designated by the words, I cannot see. You may, no doubt, assume it in some particular circumstances; but I can only say that it ought not to be assumed in every case, whenever you see the word "trade-mark" on a label, that it must be intended solely to refer to the particular part of the label on which it is placed. Take the particular case before us, that of this Bass label. Suppose the words "trade-mark" had been on the ornamental rim that you have round it, would anybody suppose, or would it be a natural inference, that Bass & Co. really meant that the rim was the trade-mark? No. Therefore I think it is clear that you cannot lay down as a general rule that whenever the words "trade-mark" appear on a label they must be intended to denote the particular part on which they are individually placed. In the present case I do not know that I need really say more than this. The words "trade-mark" are here in the centre of the label, and I do not know why I should be bound to assume that they are intended to apply to the diamond; but I will assume that they do. What then? In every case of a label where the words "trade-mark" are put upon a particular portion of it to denote that that portion is a trade-mark, is the court bound to hold that the label is one calculated to deceive? In my opinion, no; it may be so if, for example, the part which it is alone intended to refer to is not in fact the subject of a separate trade-mark. That, I think, would be calculated to deceive, because it would lead any ordinary person reading it to suppose that the owner of the label, as a whole, had a specially greater right than he really had as against the public. But if there were a separate trade-mark for the part of the label which is designated by the words "trade-mark," why is it to be assumed in every case that the words are to be treated as calculated to deceive. It is not sufficient to say "calculated to deceive." You must show that it is reasonably calculated to injure someone—to lead them to do some act, or abstain from doing some act, which may possibly injure them. Now, there may be a perfectly innocent deception which would injure nobody, and that ought not to be a ground for removing a trade-mark. The fact is, you ought to see in each case whether, assuming the words "trade-mark" to refer to a particular portion of the label, there would be in the first place a natural inference that the rest of the label, or the label as a whole, was not a trade-mark. Speaking for myself I refuse to take it as a natural or necessary inference in every case, from the fact that a particular portion of a general label is in itself designated as "trade-mark," that the whole of the label is not a trade-mark. Such a conclusion ought not to be drawn in every case; and one ought to go further and ask in each case whether anyone could suppose, from the facts of the particular case, that there was any substantial likelihood of injury. The matter could not be better illustrated than by the case we have before us. If anyone were led to suppose that "trade-mark" here referred to the diamond alone, would it be a natural inference for him to suppose that he might with impunity imitate or disregard the rest of the label? I should say, certainly not. He could not possibly be injured. There could be no such deception as would injure any ordinary reasonable human being, and on that ground alone I should have thought you could not say that there was such an intention to deceive or that the label itself was so calculated to deceive as to justify you in saying that the label was an improper subject of a trade-mark on that ground. I should like again to say that where the words "trade-mark," which do not of necessity mean the only trade-mark, are capable of being used innocently, I should have thought that there would be a natural presumption in favour of innocence, and that you ought not to assume that deception is intended, or is likely to result, unless it is a very necessary inference. As I have said, I cannot see that in every case the description of a particular portion of a trade-mark with the words "trade-mark" would justify you in holding that there is deception because it implies that the rest is open to the trade, or is not the subject of a trade-mark at all. There ought to be a presumption in favour of fairness and honesty, and that applies especially to the present case, seeing that here this trade-mark has been in use and has been registered for so many years, and no one has ventured to come forward to say that anyone has been injured or could possibly be injured. I am perfectly certain that no one could be injured, and therefore think the appeal ought to be allowed.

"THE DOWLAIS." (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Freight—Option to pay freight on weight delivered or intake weight—Time to exercise option.

By the terms of a charter-party cargo was to be delivered "on payment of freight at the rate of 6s. 3d. per ton delivered or intake weight less 2 per cent. at charterers' option." The shipowners not having required the charterers to declare their option as soon as the cargo was delivered, the latter elected to pay on the intake weight, less 2 per cent.

Held, that the charterers could elect to pay the lesser—i.e., the intake freight, as they were not bound to exercise their option until the time for payment of the freight had arrived, the shipowners having waived their right to require the charterers to declare their option as soon as the cargo had been delivered.

Appeal by the plaintiffs, the Dowlais Steamship Co. (Limited), from the judgment of a Divisional Court sitting in Admiralty, affirming the decision of the county court judge of Cardiff.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Dowlais against Messrs. Budd & Co., the charterers, to recover £9 6s. 5d., being the balance of freight alleged to be due on a cargo of pitwood carried in The Dowlais from Bordeaux to Newport under a charter-party dated the 12th of January, 1900.

By the charter-party it was agreed that the cargo should be delivered on being paid freight at the rate of 6s. 3d. per ton delivered "or intake weight less 2 per cent. at charterers' option." It was provided that freight was to be paid after unloading and right delivery of the whole cargo, in cash. There was no dispute that the intake weight of the cargo was 1,272 tons and the weight delivered 1,277 tons, or that when freight was paid, and not before then, the charterers claimed to pay freight upon the intake weight less 2 per cent. Further, it was not suggested that the plaintiffs called upon the defendants to exercise their option before that time.

It was contended by the plaintiff shipowners, however, that the option had to be declared before bulk was broken, and that as the defendants had not done so freight had to be paid on the delivery weight.

The sole question, therefore, was when the option given had to be exercised by the charterers.

The county court judge thought that if the plaintiffs had required the defendants to declare their option as soon as the cargo had been delivered, the defendants would have been bound to have done so, but the plaintiffs did not require this to be done, and therefore waived their right to have it done. He held that in the circumstances the defendants were not bound to exercise their option until the necessity for doing so arose, and that necessity did not arise until the freight was paid. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

On appeal to the Divisional Court (Sir F. Jeune and Barnes, J.) the decision of the county court judge was affirmed.

The plaintiffs now further appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., Montague Lush, and Bailhache, for the appellants.

Ernest Todd (H. H. Gregory with him), for the respondents.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question here is whether the particular option given to the charterers must, on the true construction of the charter-party, be exercised before delivery. The option is with respect to a timber cargo, and is contained in a few words in the early beginning of the charter-party—to deliver, and so on, at the usual time and place as directed, on being paid freight "at the rate of 6s. 3d. per ton of 20 cwt. delivered, or intake weight, less 2 per cent., at charterers' option." Then follows "freight to be paid, after unloading and right delivery of the whole cargo, in cash." Now it was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that on the true construction of the charter-party the option which is expressly given to the charterer must be exercised before he knows all the facts, and must be exercised before delivery, and certainly before the cargo has been weighed. A very great point was made by the plaintiffs' counsel upon the inconvenience which he suggested would arise if it became practically necessary in all cases for the shipowner to incur the expense of weighing the cargo so as to ascertain the precise amount of the freight for which he had his lien, and it was suggested, therefore, that the true meaning was that the charterer must act reasonably, and determine the option, so that if he did elect to pay at the intake price the shipowner would not have to incur the superfluous expense of weighing the cargo at the port of delivery. The case has been left singularly disembarrassed of any facts that might have thrown light on that part of the discussion. We know nothing as to the process of weighing or unloading cargoes which is carried out at the port of Newport. We have no evidence upon it all, nor, indeed is there any evidence that it is in accordance with custom at that port that the shipowner has to weigh under any circumstances the cargo, or whether the cargo as a matter of fact, whatever the provisions of the charter-party, does undergo the process of weighing at somebody's instance and somebody's expense. We know nothing of the actual facts as governing the customs of the port at which the cargo was delivered. We have this also, that there was nothing on the face of the contract itself providing for the exercise of the option by the charterer at any particular time, and that really seems to me to be the governing factor in this dispute. I was a good deal impressed by some of the inconveniences which the plaintiffs' counsel pointed out in the construction which has been adopted by the court below, but the learned county court judge has given a well-reasoned judgment upon it. That judgment has been confirmed by the judgment of Barnes, J., and though I agree there is a good deal to be said from the plaintiffs' standpoint as to the convenience and desirability of the option being exercised at some earlier period, it seems to me that ought to have been a matter of express stipulation, and we have not got before us materials which would enable us to read it into the charter-party when the parties themselves have not put it in. On these grounds, though I have had some misgivings about it during the arguments, I should not be justified when the case is left in such a jejune condition as to evidence, in differing from the judgment both of the learned county court judge and the Divisional Court. I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The word "option" is used in this charter-party evidently to suggest it should not be an election in the dark, which is what Mr. Lush has contended it should be. What is the position of the shipowner? It did not matter to him where this election was made—if it be made before the cargo left Bordeaux or during the course of the voyage, or on its arrival at its port of destination—Cardiff. Why is it said, then, that the owner here is placed in a better position than if the option had been exercised, and notice given him when the cargo left on the voyage? Mr. Lush argues that the position of the shipowner has been altered by what has occurred at Cardiff—in other words the charter has been estopped, if the option can be exercised after the cargo had been delivered. Of course, Mr. Lush says, if an intimation had been given before a cargo had begun to be discharged the shipowner would be saved the expense he had incurred. It is singular that before the learned county court judge, surrounded by people familiar with this trade, this point was never made, nor was it suggested in the argument before the Divisional Court. We are not in a position to say under these circumstances whether or not any additional expense is cast upon the shipowner by reason of having to weigh the cargo. I should infer there would be a very rough way of ascertaining the tonnage of such a cargo as this, consisting of 1,277 tons of pit-props, but however that may be, I cannot conceive that it was intended that there should be a constructive exercise of a lien and a demand for payment of the freight as each portion of each ton of this cargo was delivered. At any rate, according to the ordinary reasonable construction of the words of the contract, following, as they do, on the conditions of the payment of freight, it was meant—unless some other arrangement was come to between the parties—that the charterer was to be free to exercise the option when he knew what he was doing, and I therefore think the appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It is a mere question of the construction of these different documents in the absence of all evidence as to circumstances.

Adjourned summons.

Edmund Roberts, deceased, by his will dated the 26th of May, 1902, directed that all his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses should be paid as soon as possible after his decease, and after a bequest of chattels the testator gave two pecuniary legacies of £500 and £200 respectively. He then devised certain real estate specifically to his brother and certain other real estate to his cousin. The will contained a good residuary gift of personalty, but there was no residuary devise of real estate, which, except for the specific devises above-mentioned, descended to the heir-at-law.

The general personal estate and the descended realty proved insufficient for the payment of the testator's debts, and this summons, which was taken out by the executrix of the will, raised (among others) the question whether the pecuniary legatees were entitled to have the assets marshalled so as to stand in the place of creditors as against the specifically devised real estate to the extent to which the personal estate should be applied in payment of debts.

T. T. Methold, for the executrix.

KEKEWICH, J. (after stating the facts).—Under these circumstances the pecuniary legatees claim that since the testator has, by directing payment of his just debts, charged them upon his real estate they can insist that in so far as the personalty has been applied in payment of debts it should be made good to them by the specific devisees of the real estate. It is a question of great importance, and there is some difficulty owing to the decision in In re Bate. That case was carefully examined by Stirling, J., in In re Stokes, and was not followed by him. Again, in In re Salt Chitty, J., felt himself unable to follow In re Bate having regard to the view which Stirling, J., had expressed in In re Stokes. In Seton on Judgments (6th ed., vol. 2), p. 1673, it is stated that upon this point In re Bate must be taken to be overruled. That, I think, is a correct statement of the law, and I shall adopt it. I therefore hold that the doctrine of marshalling in favour of the pecuniary legatees must be here applied.

(a.) Reported by GODFREY R. BENSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that H. had the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons asking for the determination of the question whether the plaintiff, the Hon. Mrs. Herbert, was tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts, or entitled to exercise the powers under the said Acts of a tenant for life in respect of certain mansions devised to trustees by the will of her mother, Lady Llanover.

By her will, Lady Llanover devised certain hereditaments, including the mansion-houses in question, to trustees upon trust to enter into possession or receipt of the rents and profits of, or to manage or superintend the management of the same, with powers in respect to all the hereditaments to cut non-ornamental timber, and to repair and erect farmhouses and cottages, and with powers to let, sell, or exchange the said hereditaments or any part thereof, except the two mansion-houses and grounds at Llanover, a mansion-house and grounds called Abercarn Uchaf, and a mansion-house and premises in Great Stanhope-street, Mayfair, and with power for all or any of the purposes aforesaid to employ such agent or agents or other persons as might be deemed expedient, and who upon personal inquiry might be proved to be not only of high standing in regard to moral character but also well qualified for the situation, provided that no land or mineral agent should be appointed who should not be fully able to speak, read, and understand the Welsh language. And after divers provisions in regard to charges upon the hereditaments and the gift of certain annuities the testatrix directed that subject thereto her trustees or trustee should apply such annual sum as might be necessary for keeping up the four mansion-houses and the grounds above mentioned in a fit state for residence in accordance with such scale and rules, if any, as she might before death have expressed orally or in writing, or otherwise in accordance with such scale and rules as they or he might think fit, including in such keeping up the wages of all servants and other persons employed by her trustees or trustee in or about such mansion-houses and grounds, which servants and other persons should be Welsh and speak the Welsh language and should not be of the Roman Catholic religion. And the testatrix directed that her trustees or trustee should permit Mrs. Herbert at any time and from time to time during her life to reside at the said mansion-houses, and that during any and every such residence at any of the said mansion-houses under such permission as aforesaid her trustees or trustee should out of the rents and profits of the devised hereditaments (subject to the prior payments before mentioned) pay to her said daughter an allowance of £80 per week during such residence if the surplus rents and profits should be sufficient for that purpose, and if not then an allowance at the rate of so much per week as her trustees or trustee might in their or his uncontrolled discretion think that such surplus rents and profits could fairly bear; and the testatrix provided for the disposal of the ultimate surplus, if any, of the rents and profits of the hereditaments. After the death of the testatrix, Mrs. Herbert entered into and continued in the occupation of the mansion-houses.

It was contended for Mrs. Herbert that the provisions of the will that the trustees should permit her at any time and from time to time during her life to reside in the mansion-houses gave her the rights of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts.

Warmington, K.C., and Fellows, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is either within the definition of a tenant for life in section 2, sub-section 5, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, or within section 58, sub-section 1 (vi.), of the same Act. In In re Eastman's Settled Estates, 68 L. J. Ch. 122, a house was devised to trustees upon trust to permit the testator's widow to live there during her life or widowhood, and an annuity was given her with a provision cutting the annuity down in case she should not live in the house. Romer, J., held that she was tenant for life, and that the provision for cutting down the annuity was void, as being calculated to deter her from exercising the powers of the Settled Land Acts. In In re Carne's Settled Estates, 47 W. R. 352, [1899] 1 Ch. 324, where there was a trust to permit the plaintiff to reside in a house rent free so long as she should choose to do so, North, J., followed In re Eastman's Settled Estates.

They also referred to Co. Litt. 42*a*, and to Burton, R. P. (7th ed.), p. 239.

Haldane, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the trustees.—The testatrix intended to give Mrs. Herbert no estate, but only a personal license; for the trustees are to enter into possession of the mansions, as well as of the other hereditaments, and to manage them; and they alone are to have possession, for Mrs. Herbert's license to live there is not exclusive, since the trustees are to put in servants and manage and pay them; and all power for the management of the mansions is in the trustees. In In re Eastman and In re Carne there were no provisions for management.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—I think the lady is tenant for life and has really the powers of a tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, and I am quite unable to distinguish this case from In re Eastman's or In re Carne's Settled Estates which have been cited. True it is that in this case the trustees have the obligation imposed upon them by the will of keeping up the mansion-houses, grounds, and premises in a fit state for residence, with the obligation of paying the servants indoors and outdoors for that purpose, but the plaintiff has the absolute right to occupy all or any of the premises in question. The trustees "shall permit" her. So, although in one sense she resides there by their permission, it is a permission which the will compels them to grant. She has the absolute right to reside there, and nobody else has the right to reside there. The trustees are not empowered to let the property, they do not claim or desire to use it for their own residence. The plaintiff is the sole person entitled to reside there; she is entitled to reside there in the ordinary way of a person in her station of life (that is, with personal servants of her own), with such conditions as the trustees may consider necessary for keeping the premises inside and out in a proper state.

It is said that she has not the exclusive possession, but it is quite obvious that the Settled Land Acts include the case of a tenant for life who has no right actually to enter the house at all. The house may be let to a family and the tenant for life may be only entitled to the rents and profits. The mere fact that the obligation is imposed upon the trustees to keep up the house and grounds and to pay for the necessary service does not, in my opinion, serve to distinguish this case from the two to which reference has been made.

It may be that the decision would have surprised the testatrix, and is not in accordance with her intention, but the Settled Land Act overrides her intention, and I determine, therefore, that the lady has the powers of a tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts.

JACKSON v. MUMFORD. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Policy on hull and machinery of torpedo-boat destroyer—"Latent defect"—"Breakage of shafts"—"Trials."

A policy of marine insurance upon the hull and machinery of a torpedo-boat destroyer covered the following perils: "Fire in shops and on board, on stocks, trials, and all marine risks to completion and acceptance by the Admiralty . . . and all other perils, losses, or misfortunes." Attached to the policy was this clause: "This insurance is also specially to cover loss of or damage to hull or machinery through the negligence of mariners, engineers, or pilots, or through explosions, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or through any latent defect . . . with leave to go on trial trips." During a trial the connecting rod of the starboard engine broke, causing great damage.

Held, that "latent defect in machinery" did not cover a weakness in design; that the breakage of the connecting rod was not a "breakage of shafts"; and that "trials" did not denote a period during which the assured were to be insured against fire, but specified a particular peril insured against—viz., peril of trials.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

This was an action on a policy of marine insurance upon the hull and machinery of the torpedo-boat destroyer Bullfinch.

The plaintiff was the receiver and manager of Earle's Shipbuilding Co. (Limited), who had built The Bullfinch for the Admiralty, and the defendant was an underwriter at Lloyds.

The following perils were insured against by the policy: "Fire in shops and on board, on stocks, trials, and all marine risks to completion and acceptance by the Admiralty . . . (£1,660 on machinery) . . . and all other perils, losses, or misfortunes."

Attached to the policy was the following clause: "This insurance is also specially to cover loss of or damage to hull or machinery through the negligence of mariners, engineers, or pilots, or through explosions, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or through any latent defect . . . with leave to go on trial trips."

During the currency of the policy, which was a time policy, while The Bullfinch was on a trial, the connecting rod of the starboard high-pressure engine broke, causing great damage and loss of life.

The plaintiff contended that he was entitled to recover under the three following heads of the perils insured against—(1) trials, (2) breakage of shafts, (3) latent defect in the machinery; that the fracture in the connecting rod was caused by the structure of the steel; and that, if it was caused by faulty design, such would be a "latent defect in the machinery" within the meaning of the policy.

For the defendant it was contended that, according to the true meaning of the policy, the word "trials" denotes a period during which the assured was insured against fire; that weakness in design was not a latent defect; and that the loss was not a loss by the perils insured against within the meaning of the policy.

Nov. 3.—KENNEDY, J., delivered the following judgment: The question I have to decide is whether there has been a loss within the policy, and the case involves both legal and technical questions. I shall first deal with the question whether there was a latent defect within the meaning of the policy. The plaintiff contends that the fracture was due to the structure of the steel; the defendant, on the other hand, says that it was due to the weakness of the design. I cannot find that the fracture was due to the structure of the steel, but upon the evidence I have come to the conclusion that the real cause of the fracture was the weakness of the design. But the plaintiff contends that a faulty design is a "latent defect in the machinery" within the meaning of the clause in the policy. I am certainly not prepared to impute negligence to the designers because it is now shown that the design was wrong. But granting so much, I am still quite unable to regard "latent defect in the machinery" as covering a weakness of design. It is not a natural interpretation of the words, or a meaning which any man of business reading the expression in a commercial document would attach to it. The phrase "defect in machinery" in a business document means a defect of material, in respect either of its original composition or in respect of its original or its after-acquired condition. But for the purposes of to-day it is sufficient for me, without attempting to define its boundaries, to say that the phrase at all events does not in my view cover the erroneous judgment of the designer as to the effect of the strain which his machinery would have to resist—the machinery itself being faultless, the workmanship faultless, and the construction precisely that which the designer intended it to be.

As to the second contention of the plaintiff, it has been argued that the breakage of a connecting rod is so closely akin to the breakage of a shaft that, applying the ejusdem generis principle and reading the special clause with the ordinary Lloyds' perils clause, so as to incorporate with the former the general or sweeping words "all other perils, losses, and misfortunes," the breakage of a connecting rod ought to be treated as a risk which, like "breakage of shafts," is covered by the policy. On the other hand, however, a connecting rod and a shaft are always distinguished in the language of engineers. And the expert evidence, which was uncontradicted, showed that the functions really had a difference, and that, while both rod and shaft alike transmit power, the connecting rod and the crank shaft transmit it by strains which are of an essentially different character. In this state of facts I should hesitate, at any rate, to apply the ejusdem generis principle even if I could incorporate the special in the general clause. I do not think I should be justified either in treating this special clause simply as a part of the ordinary Lloyds' perils clause, which precedes it, or in adding to it from that clause the general and sweeping words. It does not appear to me to affect the question of construction that there is, in the policy, just before the ordinary Lloyds' peril clause, a reference to this special clause in the words "clauses as attached.' The one issue which remains for decision is whether the loss is a loss covered by the word "trials." Is the effect of the clause "against fire in shops and on board, on stocks, trials, and all marine risks to completion and acceptance by the Admiralty," to protect the assured in respect of the machinery—(1) against the peril of fire until The Bullfinch was afloat, (2) against the peril of trials, (3) against all marine risks until completion and acceptance by the Admiralty; or is the clause to be read as if "trials," like the preceding expressions — "in shops" and "on board on stocks" — simply denotes a period or state of things during which the assured are to be insured against fire? The latter is the construction for which the defendant contends. He also contends that, even if "trials" denote a peril insured against, the loss claimed for is not a loss by that peril, inasmuch as the machinery was running only at the contract speed, and the damage resulting inevitably from the faulty design was a consequence that must happen and not a casualty that might happen. I have come to the conclusion that upon the issue the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. The construction of the clause for which the defendant contends certainly is one which makes the clause ungrammatical; but leaving the punctuation out of sight as a possible oversight, it seems a strong thing, unless no good sense can otherwise be given to the clause, to insert, as the defendant's construction requires, some such words as "and during" before the word "trials." In the next place, the word "trials" is superfluous as a declaration of a time or state of things during which fire peril was to be insured against. By the express provisions of the policy there is leave "to go on trial trips in ballast or otherwise," and the ordinary Lloyds' perils clause covers damage or loss by fire. It was therefore quite useless to put in this clause a protection against fire during trials. On the other hand, not only is the construction of the clause in question which makes "trials" a risk insured against grammatically unobjectionable, but there would otherwise not be in this policy any protection against a risk which, in the light of the scientific evidence in this case, I should suppose that no reasonably prudent contractor for the machinery of a vessel of this sort would allow himself to be unprotected by insurance. There must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff for the total amount (as against all the underwriters) for £3,692 6s. 2d., the plaintiff to have the general costs of the action, the defendant to have the costs of the issues with regard to the quality of the steel and the sufficiency of the design of the connecting rod, execution to be stayed for ten days, and, if notice of appeal be given within that time, then until the hearing of the appeal.

Licensing law—Offence—Sale at place not authorized by licence—Unlicensed restaurant—Wine sent out for—Proprietor of restaurant part proprietor of licensed wine shop from which waiter fetched the wine—Appropriation of goods—Refreshment Houses and Wine Licenses Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 27), s. 19.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant was proprietor of a restaurant which was not licensed for the sale of wine, and part proprietor of a duly licensed wine shop a few doors off.

Held, that, although the waiter received money from the customer before he fetched a bottle of wine from the wine shop, yet, that there was some evidence upon which the magistrate was justified in finding as a fact that there was a sale by the appellant of the wine to the customer at the restaurant, and therefore the conviction of the appellant for having sold wine on unlicensed premises must stand.

Special case.

Appeal from a decision of Mr. Denman, a police magistrate sitting at Marlborough-street, who had convicted and fined the appellant, a restaurant keeper in Soho, for selling intoxicating liquors without a licence,

An information was preferred by the respondent Neale, an officer of the Inland Revenue, against the appellant, Alphonse Pasquier, for having sold a pint of wine by retail without having a proper licence in force authorizing him to do so. The magistrate convicted the appellant and fined him £3 10s., and 2s. costs.

The case found that the appellant was the proprietor of a restaurant business at 16, Gerrard-street, Soho, not licensed for the sale of wine, and that he also carried on the business of a wine dealer in partnership with one Paul Durand at 2, Dansey-yard, Soho, in respect of which premises Durand held a licence as a dealer in foreign wines under section 2 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81. On the 10th of December, Finnigan, an officer of the Inland Revenue, entered the restaurant in Gerrard-street and ordered a meal. A waiter showed him a list of wines with the prices marked against them, and from the list Finnigan selected a bottle of claret at 1s. 6d. The waiter asked Finnigan to pay for the wine, and Finnigan accordingly gave him 1s. 6d. The waiter then left the Gerrard-street premises and proceeded to 2, Dansey-yard and there purchased a bottle of claret, for which he paid, though there was no evidence of the price he paid. He then returned with the bottle of claret, which he served to Finnigan, who consumed it.

On the above facts the magistrate held that there had been a sale of the wine to Finnigan by the appellant's servant at 16, Gerrard-street, and he accordingly convicted the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether there was evidence upon which the magistrate was justified in finding that there was a sale of wine to Finnigan at 16, Gerrard-street, or whether, as was contended by the appellant, he was bound as a matter of law to hold that the sale took place at Dansey-yard.

Horace Avory, K.C. (H. B. D. Woodcock with him), for the appellant.—It is an every-day practice that has been going on for years for restaurant keepers who have no licence to send out for wine for their customers. In such cases the money is first paid by the customer to the man who is sent out to fetch the beer or wine, and the practice is based on the theory that the waiter who receives the money in advance gets the wine as agent for the customer. The moment Finnigan was asked by the waiter for the money he knew that the wine could not be supplied on the premises but was to be sent out for. The fact that the appellant was in partnership with the keeper of the wine shop from which the wine was obtained caused the magistrate to convict, but the real question upon which the conviction must stand or fall is whether in law the sale took place on the licensed or on the unlicensed premises. The appropriation of the wine was at Dansey-yard.

Therefore the sale was effected there: Pletts v. Beattie, [1896] 1 Q. B. 519, 44 W. R. Dig. 90; Pletts v. Campbell, [1895] 2 Q B. 229, 44 W. R. Dig. 90; and Stephenson v. Rogers, 63 J. P. 230, 47 W. R. Dig 101.

Sir Edward Carson, S.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the commissioners.—The facts in this case are not in dispute, and there is ample evidence upon which the magistrate could find that there was a sale at Gerrard-street and this court cannot, therefore set the conviction aside.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We do not think it necessary to hear counsel for the Crown argue the case further, because, we accept his submission that here the magistrate having drawn an inference of fact the only question that we have to consider is whether there is any evidence to justify him in finding that fact and drawing that inference. He has drawn the inference that the sale to the customer of the wine took place, not at Dansey-yard, but at the unlicensed premises in Gerrard-street. It seems to me that there is ample evidence to warrant such an inference being drawn. Where a restaurant proprietor informs his customers that he sells no wines, but that a waiter will be sent out to obtain wines or beer as agent on behalf of the customer, as is daily done in respectable restaurants, that is one thing. But this is the case of a man who is in partnership with a person who holds a licence at another place. By keeping a restaurant near at hand he promotes the sale of their wines by having agents to ask customers if they would require wine, and it appears to me nothing but a sale by the restaurant keeper of wine to his customers. If the waiter had been called, his evidence might have thrown a different light upon the evidence we have to consider, but as it stands it is impossible on the facts as stated in the case for us to say that there is no evidence that the sale was on unlicensed premises, and therefore we cannot interfere with the finding of fact of the learned magistrate.

"THE USKMOOR." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Article 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897.

Under Article 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, the duty imposed on steam vessels which are in sight of one another under way, of indicating by signals on the whistle any course which a vessel intends to take, such course being authorized or required by the rules, is not limited to the case of vessels in narrow waters, but the word "authorized" is to be widely interpreted.

On the 9th of June, 1902, at about 10.45 a.m., The Minnetonka, a steamship of 13,400 tons gross register, while on a voyage from New York to London, was proceeding up the English Channel between Beachy Head and The Sovereign lightship on a course of E ½ S. magnetic, making about fifteen knots. Those in charge of The Minnetonka alleged that they observed about two and a-half miles distant a steamship which proved to be The Uskmoor, a vessel of 3,587 tons gross, proceeding down channel. The Uskmoor was on a voyage from Blyth to Cape Town, and at the time in question was on a course of about W. ¾ S., making about eight knots. The weather was fine and clear with a light wind from the N.E. and the tide flood running from two to three knots. The Minnetonka, according to the plaintiffs' case (the plaintiffs being the owners of The Minnetonka), observing that The Uskmoor was acting under a port helm, also ported to bring the vessels port to port, but on observing that The Uskmoor was subsequently acting under a starboard helm, starboarded also. The Uskmoor was then observed to be again porting, and The Minnetonka ported her helm and blew one short blast on her whistle. The Uskmoor, however, again starboarded and came on, striking The Minnetonka on the port bow and afterwards on the port side. The defendants, the owners of The Uskmoor, alleged that when those in charge of The Uskmoor first observed The Minnetonka that vessel was about seven miles from The Uskmoor bearing about two and a-half points on her starboard bow, and that when The Royal Sovereign lightship was abeam of The Uskmoor she altered her course from W. ¾ S. to W. by N. magnetic, and that when The Minnetonka was about two miles from them she ported her helm so as to allow her to pass under the stern of the steamship Avocet, which vessel The Minnetonka had been overtaking. The Minnetonka then starboarded, and the engines of The Uskmoor were then stopped, and on The Minnetonka porting her helm the engines of The Uskmoor were put full speed astern and her helm hard a-starboard. Each vessel charged the other with neglecting, inter alia, to indicate by sound signal the course she was taking as prescribed by article 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897. That article provides "when vessels are in sight of one another a steam vessel under way in taking any course authorized or required by these rules shall indicate that course by the following signals on her whistle or siren—viz., one short blast to mean "I am directing my course to starboard"; two short blasts to mean "I am directing my course to port"; three short blasts to mean "My engines are going full speed astern."

Pickford, K.C., Aspinall, K.C., and Pritchard, for the plaintiffs.

Robson, K.C., and Dawson Miller, for the defendants.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said that he accepted the view that the collision occurred about a quarter of a mile from The Royal Sovereign lightship, and that the two vessels were approaching port to port when The Uskmoor starboarded, which it was wrong for her to do. It was clear that she had performed an extraordinary series of manœuvres in front of The Minnetonka, first porting, then starboarding, then porting, and finally starboarding back again, and that being the case it appeared to the court very important that The Minnetonka should have given The Uskmoor the clearest possible indication of the course that she herself intended to take. Now article 28 is limited in two ways: firstly, in that the vessels must be in sight of one another; and, secondly, they must be "taking any course authorized or required by these rules." The first limitation is intelligible enough, and the rule does not apply where a vessel, in conducting manœuvres in the ordinary course of navigation, quite apart from seeing any other vessel, thinks it right to port or starboard her helm, but it is not easy to put a clear interpretation upon the second limitation. The word "required" is clear enough, for there are certain things required by the rules to be done. But the word "authorized" is very much wider, and the court is of opinion that a wide interpretation ought to be given to it, and that it includes any course which, for the safety of the vessels, good seamanship requires to be taken with reference to the other vessel then in sight. It is quite true, however, that in certain cases the authorization which arises is more distinct. For instance, a vessel which is overtaking another, and is ipso facto bound to keep out of that other vessel's way, is authorized to go to port or starboard, and so also under the rule applicable to the case of one vessel crossing another, the vessel which has to keep out of the way must be considered to be authorized to do so by one of several means, according to the circumstances. The course The Minnetonka took, according to her own story, was certainly a course authorized by the rules. The obligation, therefore, of sounding a blast upon her whistle was imposed upon The Minnetonka at a time earlier than when she actually did sound it. The reason put forward by the officer in charge of her was that he did not think it was necessary to comply with the rule except when vessels met in narrow waters. This reason was one which probably reflected the mind of a good many sailors, but the court wished to emphatically say that there was no such limitation of the rule. The court thought it necessary to say this with some emphasis because experience demonstrated to it that the rule had not been complied with with the completeness which its terms demand, and if masters of vessels were to err in future it was to be hoped that they would do so on the side of sounding their whistle rather than from not sounding it. In this case, in view of the somewhat extraordinary manœuvres that The Uskmoor was performing in in front of The Minnetonka it was the clearest possible duty of The Minnetonka to give the clearest possible indication to The Uskmoor of what she (The Minnetonka) was doing, and in not doing so she failed to do her duty. If she had given The Uskmoor a very clear indication that she was porting, the inference would have been that she meant to pass port to port, and that might have prevented The Uskmoor from afterwards attempting the extraordinary manœuvres she performed. The court therefore found both vessels to blame.

Principal and agent—Fraud of agent—Sale of goods—Conduct of principal enabling agent to commit the fraud—Estoppel.

The appellants, who were timber merchants, instructed a dock company to honour transfers or delivery orders signed by their confidential clerk. The clerk by means of orders signed by him in fraud of the appellants had timber transferred into a fictitious name, and then sold and transferred the timber in this fictitious name to the respondents. In an action by the appellants against the respondents to recover damages for the conversion of the timber,

Held, that the appellants were not precluded by their conduct from setting up the unauthorized action of their agent, for no representation was made by them or on their behalf to the respondents; also, that the goods were stolen by the clerk, therefore the respondents acquired no title to the timber and were consequently liable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 49 W. R. 673, [1901] 2 K. B. 697) reversed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Vaughan Williams, L.J., Stirling, L.J., dissenting, reported 49 W. R. 673, [1901] 2 K. B. 697).

The action was brought by the appellants against the respondents to recover certain timber, or damages for its conversion.

The appellants were timber merchants, and warehoused large quantities of timber at the Surrey Commercial docks, having an office in the city of London.

The timber, when sold to a purchaser, was handed over to him by means of a delivery order signed by the appellants and addressed to the dock company.

The appellants had a confidential clerk in their employment named H. J. Capon, whose duties were to attend at the office and to direct the business in the absence of the partners, and he had a certain authority to sell timber.

In 1895 the appellants sent the following written authority, signed by them, to the directors of the dock: "We hereby authorise you to accept all transfer or delivery orders which shall be signed on our behalf by Mr. H. J. Capon, whose signature is subjoined. The dock company acting also on our signature as heretofore." With it was sent a letter to the manager of the docks informing him of the arrangements made.

For some years from 1896 Capon manipulated appellants' books and signed transfers and delivery orders whereby he perpetrated a series of frauds. He transferred timber at the docks into the name of J. T. Brown, and writing from an address in Battersea, and representing himself as an agent of Bayley, a well-known firm, sold it in his fictitious name to the respondents. The respondents acted bonâ fide in the transaction, paid him the price, and obtained delivery of the timber from the docks by means of orders signed in the name of Brown.

It appeared that the prices paid by the respondents were fair and reasonable, and the business was carried through in the ordinary course.

The learned judge (Mathew, J.) asked the jury whether the appellants so acted as to hold out Capon to the respondents as their agent to sell to the respondents, and upon a negative answer, judgment was entered for the appellants for £1,200, the agreed amount.

The Court of Appeal set this aside, and entered judgment for the respondents, upon the ground that the present appellants had by their conduct enabled their clerk to commit the fraud, and that therefore the loss must fall upon them.

Asquith, K.C., and Danckwerts, K.C. (W. Whately with them), for the appellants.—Capon was not held out to the respondents as having authority to sell the timber. There was no duty which the appellants omitted to do, and no estoppel can arise. They referred to Henderson v. Williams, 43 W. R. 274, [1895] 1 Q. B. 521, and Savage, C.J.'s, statement in Root v. French, 13 Wend. (N.Y. Supr. Ct.) 570, mentioned by the Lord Chancellor. Lawson Walton, K.C., and Cubabé, for the respondents.—The purchaser could not know the limitations of Capon's authority. The case is like Brocklesby v. Temperance Permanent Building Society, 43 W. R. 606, [1895] A. C. 173. The words there quoted by Lord Halsbury from Root v. French in Henderson v. Williams—"when one of two innocent persons must suffer from the fraud of a third, he shall suffer who by his indiscretion has enabled such third person to commit the fraud"—are applicable. There was here a disposing power—an authority to sell and transfer given to agent—and Capon was not a mere custodian of the goods. He was enabled to hold himself out as the owner of the timber, and the true owner is precluded from setting up his title: Dyer v. Pearson, 3 B. & C. 38; Vickers v. Hertz, L. Asquith, K.C., replied.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I hesitate to speak all that is in my mind out of respect to the learned judges who have taken a different view; but for that I should have said that this was a particularly plain case in which no difficulty whatever arises. I think it might be stated compendiously in two sentences: A servant has stolen his master's goods, and the question arises whether the persons who have received those goods innocently can set up a title against the master. I believe that is enough to dispose of this case.

That it was a stealing there cannot be the smallest doubt, and indeed I feel great hesitation in treating seriously the argument that it was not. What possible difference is there between what was done here by Capon and the act of taking a pocket-handkerchief out of a man's pocket by a thief in the street? The man who steals is a servant; his possession is the possession of the master. It is not denied that he had no actual authority to dispose of these goods, and because by a circuitous process he allows an innocent agent (for all the persons who acted under his directions were perfectly innocent) to remove the goods from the place where they had been stored by the master, that, forsooth, is said not to be an asportavit! Why not? Assuming always the element of fraud, the intention to commit a crime, which is not denied, what element is there wanting to make that a stealing? I confess I am puzzled at the notion than anybody could entertain the smallest doubt in the world that that was a stealing.

Well, if it was a stealing, how has the person who has received the goods acquired a right to those goods which, it is equally not denied, originally belonged to the appellants in this case? When has the property been changed, and by what circumstances? It is impossible, I think, to answer that question except in one way. There has been no property changed; the thief could give no title whatever. The circumstances of this case show conclusively that there is nothing to prevent this being a theft, and it being a theft the thief could convey no title. That disposes of the case.

But for the respect I entertain for the learned judges who have taken a different view from myself, I should leave the case there, because I think it is too plain for argument: but a great deal has been said upon the subject of the right arising from estoppel. I really do not understand what estoppel has to do with this case. The mode by which the goods were removed, and the asportavit incident to the felony accomplished, was as a matter of fact the innocent act of the dock company; but it is a mistake to talk of the relations between the dock company and the appellants here as if there was any question of estoppel. It would not be true to say, even as regards the dock company, that there was an estoppel; there was no estoppel at all. Estoppel arises where you are precluded from denying the truth of anything which you have represented as a fact, although it is not a fact; but no such question arises here. All that the dock company did they were expressly authorised to do by the appellants; there would not therefore be an estoppel as between them and the dock company at all. It would be that they had acted in pursuance of the real and direct authority of the appellants; and after the letter of authorization what they did was expressly authorized by the appellants.

If it could be argued here that the appellants had represented their clerk Capon to be invested with what, over and over again with a degree of reiteration somewhat wearisome, we heard called a "disposing power," "perfect dominion," and "control"—words which are ambiguous in themselves unless you explain what the disposing power and what the dominion and control mean—I say, if they had represented their clerk Capon to be invested with disposing power, and (note the importance of the next sentence) if anybody supposing Capon to be invested with that power had acted upon it to his own prejudice, then undoubtedly estoppel would have arisen; the person who had improperly and negligently allowed Capon to be apparently so invested with authority would be estopped from denying that Capon had authority.

So far the matter would be quite clear; but when we come to look at what the facts of this case are, what in the world has that to do with the question that arises here? Capon was unknown, the appellants were unknown; nobody dreams of suggesting that the respondents here acted upon the faith of Capon's being invested with that authority; they never heard of Capon, they never heard of the appellants; but the clerk who has committed the fraud, ingeniously availing himself of his power of signing orders for delivery, gave a delivery order to change the name in which the goods were stored in the dock company's books to the name of Brown. Professing to be Brown, and professing to act on behalf not of the appellants, but of a third person named Bayley, he procures the removal of these goods by innocent agents, as I have described them, under the authority of Brown, he having fraudulently transferred the goods in the dock company's books from the name of his master to that of Brown, a fictitious person; and Brown in his turn procures these goods to be delivered to the present respondents; and forsooth it is said that that establishes an estoppel! I am bewildered at the absurdity of such a suggestion; I really do not understand in what possible way it can arise. That, I should have thought, was quite enough to dispose of this case.

I really am not concerned to defend, if it were attacked, the language which I appear to have used in Henderson v. Williams. I adhere to every word of the judgment I then delivered. It is not a question of whether I am prepared to affirm the words which were quoted or not. I speak of it, I hope, impartially; if I thought the words were incautious I should not hesitate to correct them now; but I do not know now what it is I am supposed to have said that can have led to this misapprehension. I believe the proposition of law which I then gave is accurate, and I am prepared to adopt it; but what application has it to this case? Curiously enough, the only passage which has been assailed as giving rise to the difficulty here is not my own language at all, but the language of an American judge, though it is true I quoted it with approval. Let us see what the language is; I believe it to be accurate. I observe that a few words seem to have been omitted from the consideration of the learned judges who commented on this matter. The language of the learned judge (Chief Justice Savage) quoted by me is this: "Speaking of a bonâ fide purchaser who has purchased property from a fraudulent vendor and given value for it, he says, 'He is protected in doing so upon the principle just stated, that when one of two innocent persons must suffer from the fraud of a third he shall suffer who, by his indiscretion, has enabled such third person to commit the fraud.'" Those words "who by his indiscretion" appear not to have made much impression upon those who were commenting upon this matter. What indiscretion did the appellants here commit? They intrusted their clerk with the delivery orders. It is said that in some exceptional cases he was allowed to make a contract; but what has that to do with it? No one knew that, outside the firm themselves; and you might just as well say in the case of a shopman in a furniture broker's shop that because he is there, because he habitually delivers goods to the orders which his master receives, that gives him to all the world the power of giving a title if he steals his master's tables and chairs and delivers them to somebody else.

I confess I am a little surprised that two of the learned judges seem to be under the impression that my proposition, quoted as I have said, from an American judge, was that any person who has enabled another by any means to commit a fraud must be the person to suffer when two innocent persons are in question. Of course, it depends on the sense in which you are to understand the word "enabled." As I put it to the learned counsel yesterday, in one sense every man who sells a pistol or a dagger enables an intending murderer to commit a crime; but is he, in selling a pistol or a dagger to some person who comes to buy in his shop, acting in breach of any duty? Does he owe any duty to all the world, as is suggested here, to prevent people taking advantage of his selling pistols or daggers in his business, because he does in one sense enable a person to commit a crime? It seems to me that the moment you analyze what is intended by this argument the answer is plain; and when you analyze what is the only function which this man Capon was entitled to perform it is simply this—that he was a delivery clerk. But, say the learned counsel for the respondents, not only was he delivery clerk, but sometimes he had power and authority to make a contract. Suppose he had, what then? Was anybody misled by that? Did anybody act upon that belief? No one; therefore any notion of anybody's acting upon something that was held out and represented is entirely out of the question.

It appears to me, when one analyzes the matter it comes to this broad proposition, that because you have given authority to your clerk to deliver goods (for that is the sole thing that could be established by looking at the books either of the firm or of the dock company), therefore if any person in the employment of that master takes advantage of that for the purpose of committing a felony, thereupon that person is invested with the power to give the receiver a good title. I think the state of the law would have been perfectly clear without it, but the Sale of Goods Act has disposed of any such question, because it says, "Subject to the provisions of this Act where goods are sold by a person who is not the owner thereof, and who does not sell them under the authority or with the consent of the owner, the buyer acquires no better title to the goods than the seller had, unless the owner of the goods is by his conduct precluded from denying"—what—"the seller's authority to sell." Now, where comes in here the operation of that saving clause? What authority was there to sell? None. What representation was there of Capon's authority to sell? None. Therefore, when one analyzes this case, the two sentences with which I commenced my judgment appear to me to entirely dispose of it. This was a theft, and the thief could give no better title than he himself had—which was none. Therefore it seems to me luce clarius that the appellants are entitled to succeed, and I move your lordships to reverse the order appealed from, with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. After what has fallen from my noble and learned friend on the woolsack I am almost ashamed to trouble your lordships with any observations of my own. But the case is peculiar in one point of view. I cannot remember any case in which the wealth of learning and argument was so far beyond the value of the poor and commonplace material on which it has been expended. And, besides, the question is not unimportant; the decision under appeal, if it could be supported, would have very far-reaching and, in my opinion, very pernicious consequences.

Vaughan Williams, L.J., expresses an opinion to the effect that the case is difficult. The very learned judge who differs from him on the result agrees with him on this. Speaking for myself, in the view I take of it, I must say that I cannot imagine a plainer or simpler case than this.

Messrs. Farquharson Brothers & Co. are timber merchants in a large way of business, with a turn over exceeding £200,000 a year. They had a confidential clerk called Capon, whom they trusted implicitly. A short time ago they discovered that this man had been robbing them for years, stealing small lots of their timber from time to time, passing the timber out of their names in the docks by means of a written authority they had given him, and disposing of it for his own benefit. They trace the stolen timber to the hands of Messrs. King & Co. They demand restitution or compensation; the demand is refused, and then this action is brought.

What is the defence? Not that the goods were bought in market overt, though that would be no defence now after the conviction of the thief. Not that Messrs. Farquharson led them to believe that Capon had their authority to sell what they supposed they bought. That defence is out of the question. They never imagined that they were dealing with Messrs. Farquharson or buying Messrs. Farquharson's goods. They never even dealt with Capon to their knowledge, they never dealt with him in his own name and in his proper person. They dealt with a phantom broker—an imaginary being, created, animated, and worked by Capon for his own purposes under the plain and unpretentious name of Brown. And from this Brown, whom they never saw in the flesh, and about whom they never made a single enquiry, they supposed they bought this timber. Whether Capon, who has apparently been convicted of forgery, could have been convicted of larceny or not—though I think he could—it seems to me absurd to suppose that by this juggle of Capon's, all sham and pretence so far as he was concerned, the property in the stolen timber passed to Messrs. King & Co.

If it were permissible, it would be interesting to enquire which of the two parties to this litigation were the more blameworthy in a moral point of view. The plaintiffs trusted a man whom they had long known, and whom they believed to be honest. The defendants trusted a man they had never seen, and whom a breath of suspicion and the most ordinary enquiry would have unmasked. But we have nothing to do with this matter, though it does seem to have entered into the consideration of the Court of Appeal.

The real defence is a a singular one. It must come to this: The defendants say to the plaintiffs, "You, Messrs. Farquharson, have conducted your business in such an unbusinesslike way that you ought not to have your own goods back again. This misfortune, common to you and to us, is all your fault. By your blind and foolish confidence in Capon, and by the written authority you gave him, you 'enabled' him to commit this fraud upon us. And so Mr. Justice Ashurst's famous dictum comes in."

This defence, in my opinion, has no foundation in principle or authority. To try the principle, take a common case—a case which everybody understands. Nothing is better settled than this—that if a person buys a chattel, and it turns out that the chattel was found by the person who professed to sell it, the true owner can recover his property unless there has been a sale in market overt. The right of the true owner is not prejudiced or affected by his carelessness in losing the chattel, however gross it may have been. If I lose a valuable dog, and find it afterwards in the possession of a gentleman who got it from somebody whom he believed to be the owner, and paid for it accordingly, it is no answer to me to say that he never would have been cheated into buying the dog if I had chained it up, or put a collar on, or kept it under proper control. If a person leaves a watch, or a precious jewel, on a seat in the park, or on a table at a café, and it gets into the hands of a person who supposes that he has bought it from a rightful possessor, it is no answer to the true owner to say that it was his own carelessness that enabled the finder to pass it off as his own. If that be so, how can carelessness, however extreme, in the conduct of a man's own business, preclude him from recovering his own property which has been stolen from him?

Nor is the case without authority. In the case of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England v. Evans's Trustees, 5 H. L. Cas. 389, in this House, the trustees, who were a corporate body, called upon the Bank to replace stock which the Bank had sold under a forged power of attorney, bearing the genuine impression of the trustees' corporate seal. The defence of the bank was that the carelessness of the trustees in the custody of their seal enabled their clerk to impose on the Bank, and disentitled them from requiring the Bank to replace the stock. The judges were consulted. Their unanimous opinion, which this House adopted, was delivered by Mr. Baron Parke. He thought that the negligence, if there was negligence, in the custody of the seal was only remotely connected with the transfer which the Bank set up as good against the trustees, and then he proceeds in these words, at page 410: "If such negligence could disentitle the plaintiffs, to what extent is it to go? If a man should lose his cheque book, or neglect to lock the desk in which it is kept, and a servant or stranger should take it up, it is impossible, in our opinion, to contend that a banker paying his forged cheque would be entitled to charge his customer with that payment. Would it be contended that if he kept his goods so negligently that a servant took them and sold them, he must be considered as having concurred in the sale, and so be disentitled to sue for their conversion on a demand and refusal?"

A somewhat similar contention was raised in the more recent case of Scholfield v. Londesborough (Earl), 45 W. R. 124. It was argued (and the argument found favour with some judges) that everybody who accepts a bill of exchange owes a duty which was defined as "the duty not to be negligent as to the form of the bill." That argument was rejected in this House. But in rejecting it both the Lord Chancellor and Lord Watson made observations of much wider application. The Lord Chancellor said: "I am not aware of any principle known to the law which should attach such consequences to a written instrument when no such principle is applicable in any other region of jurisprudence where a man's own carelessness has given opportunity for the commission of a crime. A man, for instance, does not lose his right to his property if he has unnecessarily exposed his goods, or allowed his pocket handkerchief to hang out of his pocket, but could recover against a bonâ fide purchaser of any article so lost, notwithstanding the fact that his conduct had to some extent assisted the thief." And Lord Watson, in his judgment, says: "It is not consistent with the general spirit of the law to hold innocent persons responsible for not taking measures to prevent the commission of a crime which they may have no reason to anticipate."

The rules of law applicable to this case are, in my opinion, well settled. And I would venture to remind your lordships of an observation made by Lord Cairns in this House, to the effect that in cases of this sort, where your lordships have to perform the disagreeable duty of determining which of two innocent parties is to suffer by the fraud of a third, all your lordships have to do is to apply the settled and well-known rules of law, and apply them rigorously.

Lord SHAND.—In the course of the argument I felt that a difficulty arose in determining whether the principle in the Brocklesby case ought not to receive effect in favour of the respondents; for undoubtedly Capon had a general authority from the plaintiffs which gave him power to transfer in the dock company's books the timber which the respondents bought, and the limitation of that authority to certain sales of a restricted character was unknown to the purchasers of the timber. But, on the other hand, I have come to the conclusion, without difficulty, that the principle of that case does not apply, for the reasons which have been fully stated by the Lord Chancellor, and because no representation of Capon's authority was made to the respondents; indeed, the respondents were not even acquainted with the fact that they were dealing with Capon at all, but thought they were dealing with a fictitious person whom he named Brown. On that ground, therefore, I am of opinion that the argument so much pressed by the repondents fails.

But I am further of opinion with your lordships that the circumstances of the case show that this was really a theft on the part of Capon, and upon that second ground also I think that the order ought to be reversed. By putting the goods in a fictitious name Capon got them transferred to himself under that fictitious name, and thereupon he disposed of the goods. In so doing I think that that was a case of fraudulent appropriation, and really a theft of the goods, and that the property in the goods therefore never passed to Capon or to anyone who purchased from him. On these grounds I concur with the motion which has been proposed.

Lord ROBERTSON.—It seems to me that the facts of this case hopelessly shut out the respondents from the legal principles which they invoke. When it is remembered that the respondents never heard of the appellants in connection with these purchases during their whole course; that they never knew of Capon's existence; that, instead of dealing with Capon as the agent of the appellants, they dealt with Brown as the agent of Bayley; that the right they expected to acquire was the right of Bayley, and not the right of the appellants at all—it is difficult to see how the cases cited have any bearing on the question. These things have ultimately reduced the respondents to relying on the fact that they paid their money in consequence of the dock company registering a transfer in their favour executed by Capon in his character of Brown, the previous transfer having been executed in favour of Brown by Capon purporting to act in his quality of clerk of the respondents. This recognition was given by the dock company to the transfer in favour of Brown in accordance with the general request of the appellants to the dock company to honour Capon's transfers. The place occupied, therefore, by this request to the dock company is merely that it was a causa sine quâ non and not the causa causans of the respondents being involved.

I think the respondents attach inordinate importance to this fact, and that the words "disposing power" are inapplicable. The authority conferred on Capon is not contained, and does not purport to be described, in the letter addressed to the dock company. That letter was in fact and of course a great deal broader than the authority of the servant; for no public company would undertake to discriminate among orders or to supervise the exercise by a servant of his master's delegated authority. Thus the dock company were clearly bound to recognize the transfer by Capon to Brown, and yet the transfer to Brown was a fraud.

This seems to me to be exactly the case of a servant having unrestricted access to goods for his master's purposes, and using that access to steal the goods and sell them. In the one case, as in the other, the innocent purchaser parts with his money on getting the goods; and does so, misled by the fact of possession given owing to the dishonest servant having access to the goods. And, unless the master is bound to all the consequences of the servant's access, I can see no ground for the respondents' argument on "disposing power."

Mr. Lawson Walton, whose faith in the "disposing power" was less absolute, endeavoured to piece on to it the circumstance that Capon had a limited authority to sell. But here again the facts preclude the respondents from any right to rely on the circumstance, for in the matters now in question that power was never exercised and never known. It would be extravagant to hold that in these sales of Bayley's goods by their agent Brown, of Battersea-rise, we are to recognize a mere excess of Capon's authority. The existence of that limited authority had nothing whatever to do with the purchases, and did not directly or indirectly facilitate the frauds. The appellants were wholly ignorant alike of the authority and the person authorized, and consequently drew no inferences from the exercise of the authority. The learned counsel frankly avowed that he had no case of holding out; and this being so, I do not think that the limited authority actually held by Capon can do the respondents any good. The case ultimately rests on the fact that, as the appellants' servant, Capon had the means of making away with their goods if he chose to steal them, and that is an impossible ground of judgment.

Lord LINDLEY.—I also think this case is extremely plain when it is understood.

Capon sold the plaintiffs' timber without their authority, and sold it to the defendants. The defendants honestly bought the timber, and they had no notice that Capon had no right to sell it. But there was no sale in market overt, and the Factors Acts do not apply. The mere fact, therefore, that the defendants acted honestly does not confer upon them a good title as against the plaintiffs, the real owners of the timber. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover the timber or its value, unless they are precluded by their conduct from denying Capon's authority to sell —Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 21 and see s. 61. Capon sold under the name of Brown, representing himself to be an agent of some persons named Bayley, who were well known in the timber trade. The defendants bought on the faith of his being what he pretended to be. What have the plaintiffs done which precludes them from denying as against the defendants Capon's right to do what he pretended he was entitled to do? Putting the question in another form, What have the plaintiffs done to preclude them from denying as against the defendants Capon's right to sell to them? To answer these questions it is necessary to consider what the plaintiffs did.

Capon was the plaintiffs' confidential clerk; they gave him a limited power of sale to certain customers and a general written authority to sign delivery orders on their behalf, and the plaintiffs sent that written authority to the dock company which stored the plaintiffs' timber. This authority would of course protect the dock company in delivering timber as ordered by Capon, however fraudulently he might be acting, if the dock company had no notice of anything wrong. By abusing his authority Capon made timber belonging to the plaintiffs deliverable by the dock company to himself under the name of Brown. In that name he sold it and procured it to be delivered to the defendants. What is there here which precludes the plaintiffs from denying Capon's right to sell to the defendants?

What have the plaintiffs done to mislead the defendants and to induce them to trust Capon? Absolutely nothing. The question for decision ought to be narrowed in this way; for it is in my opinion clear that when section 21 of the Sale of Goods Act has to be applied to a particular case the enquiry which has to be made is not a general enquiry as to the authority to sell apart from all reference to the particular case, but an inquiry into the real or apparent authority of the seller to do that which the defendants say induced them to buy.

It was pointed out by Parke, B. (afterwards Lord Wensleydale), in Dickinson v. Valpy, 10 B. & C. 128, at p. 140, that "holding out to the wo ld" is a loose expression; the "holding out" must be to the particular individual who says he relied on it, or under such circumstances of publicity as to justify the inference that he knew of it and acted upon it The same principle must be borne in mind in dealing with cases like the present. I do not myself see upon what ground a person can be precluded from denying as against another an authority which has never been given in fact, and which the other has never supposed to exist.

It was urged that the dock company were led by the plaintiffs to obey Capon's orders and to deliver to Brown, and that the defendants were induced by the dock company to deal with Brown, or, at all events, to pay him on the faith of his being entitled to the timber; so that in fact the plaintiffs through the dock company misled the defendants. This is ingenious but unsound. Except that delivery orders were sent in the name of Brown to the defendants and were acted on by the dock company, there is no evidence connecting the dock company with the defendants in these transactions; and the answer to the contention is that the defendants were misled not by what the plaintiffs did, nor by what the plaintiffs authorized the dock company to do, but by Capon's frauds.

It is, of course, true that by employing Capon and trusting him as they did the plaintiffs enabled him to transfer the timber to any one; in other words, the plaintiffs in one sense enabled him to cheat both themselves and others. In that sense every one who has a servant enables him to steal whatever is within his reach. But if the word "enable" is used in this wide sense it is clearly untrue to say, as Mr. Justice Ashurst said in Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 63 "that whenever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of the third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it." Such a doctrine is far too wide, and the cases referred to in the argument and commented on by Vaughan Williams, L.J., show that it cannot be relied upon without considerable qualification.

Lamb v. Attenborough, which is very like this, is a good illustration of the unsoundness of the doctrine in question if taken literally. Johnson v. Crédit Lyonnais Co. is another illustration to the like effect.

So far as I know, the doctrine has never been judicially applied where nothing has been done by one of the innocent parties who has in fact misled the other: see Story on Agency, section 133.

In Vickers v. Hertz the defendant acted on the faith of a document signed by the plaintiff. So in Babcock v. Lawson.

In Brocklesby v. Temperance Building Society the bank advanced money on the faith of the document signed by the plaintiff, and the defendants who had paid off the bank were entitled to the benefit of the bank's security. In Henderson v. Williams the defendant acted on orders given by the owner of the goods; the action was defended on his behalf, and he had entrusted the goods to Fletcher, to whom the defendant had attained. Those cases do not really assist the defendants. Nor does Dyer v. Pearson.

In the present case, in my view of it, Capon simply stole the plaintiffs' goods and sold them to the defendants, and the defendants' title is not improved by the circumstances that the theft was the result of an ingenious fraud on the plaintiffs and on the defendants alike. The defendants were not in any way misled by any act of the plaintiffs on which they placed reliance; and the plaintiffs are not, therefore, precluded from denying Capon's authority to sell.

The question which the defendants pressed Mathew, J., to leave to the jury, and which the late Master of the Rolls and Vaughan Williams, L.J., thought ought to have been left to them—namely, "Did the plaintiffs by their conduct enable Capon to hold himself out as the owner of the goods or as having the power to dispose of them?" would, in my opinion, have been seriously misleading unless accompanied by explanations which would have taken out of it the element of error introduced by the word "enable." I feel very strongly the observation that if the defendants are right the Factors Acts would never have been wanted.

In my opinion Mathew, J., was quite right in leaving to the jury the question as he framed it: "Did the plaintiffs so act as to hold Capon out to defendants as their agent to sell goods to the defendants?" The verdict is unimpeachable, and it is fatal to the defendants.

The appeal ought to be allowed with costs both here and below.

HAMLYN v. HOUSTON & CO. (a.)

Principal and agent—Partnership—Liability of firm for wrongful act of partner—Scope of authority—Act done in course of business—Illegal means—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), ss. 5, 10.

The defendant firm, which consisted of two partners, H. and S., carried on business as grain merchants, the whole management being under the control of H. It was in the course of the firm's business to obtain by legitimate means information as to contracts made by competitors in business. H. bribed a clerk of the plaintiff, who carried on a competing business, to give him access to the plaintiff's books, and thereby break his contract of service with the plaintiff. In an action to recover damages from the firm for the wrongful act of H.,

Held, that the firm was liable.

Application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Kennedy, J., and a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for wrongfully inducing a clerk in the service of the plaintiff to commit a breach of his contract of service with the plaintiff.

The plaintiff carried on business as a grain merchant. The defendant firm, which consisted of two partners, Houston and Strong, also carried on business as grain merchants.

The plaintiff's cause of action was that Houston had bribed a clerk in the plaintiff's service to give Houston information, by showing him the plaintiff's books, with regard to the plaintiff's customers and his contracts with them, and that by the use of such information Houston had damaged the plaintiff's business.

Strong took no part in the management of the business of the defendant firm, which was entirely under the control of Houston, and it was admitted that Strong had not in any way authorised the acts complained of.

The jury found, in answer to questions left to them by the learned judge, (1) that Houston induced and procured the plaintiff's clerk to break his contract of service with the plaintiff by dishonestly and improperly communicating to Houston knowledge obtained by the clerk in the course of his employment in the plaintiff's office in regard to the private and confidential nature of his employer's business; (2) that it caused damage to the plaintiff; (3) that Houston so acted in order to obtain advantages in business for the defendant firm, and believed his actions to be for the interest of the defendant firm;

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(4) that it was in the course of business of the defendant firm to obtain by legitimate means information in regard to the contracts made, or tendered for with brewers and with buyers of grains by competing firms; (5) that the moneys paid by Houston to the plaintiff's clerk were paid for or in consideration of the information which the clerk obtained for him; (6) that the moneys paid to the clerk were the moneys of the defendant firm; (7) and that the defendant firm profited by what Houston did.

The jury assessed the damages at £750, and Kennedy, J., directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for that amount.

The defendants applied for judgment or a new trial.

By section 5 of the Partnership Act, 1890, "Every partner is an agent of the firm and his other partners for the purpose of the business of the partnership; and the acts of every partner who does any act for carrying on in the usual way business of the kind carried on by the firm of which he is a member, bind the firm and his partners, unless the partner so acting has in fact no authority to act for the firm in the particular matter, and the person with whom he is dealing either knows that he has no authority, or does not know or believe him to be a partner."

By section 10, "Where by any wrongful act or omission of any partner acting in the ordinary course of the business of the firm, or with the authority of his co-partners, loss or injury is caused to any person not being a partner in the firm, or any penalty is incurred, the firm is liable therefor to the same extent as the partner so acting or omitting to act."

Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Spencer Bower, for the defendants.

Ruegg, K.C., and Montague Shearman, for the plaintiff.

The following cases were cited: Poulton v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 16 W. R. 309, L. R. 2 Q. B. 534; Swift v. Jewsbury, 22 W. R. 319, L. R. 9 Q. B. 301; Dyer v. Munday, 43 W. R. 440, [1895] 1 Q. B. 742.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion the learned judge was right in entering judgment as he did on the findings of the jury. It appears that Strong was a sleeping partner in the firm which consisted of himself and Houston, and that he had given authority to Houston to act on his behalf in all matters relating to the business of the firm. The jury have found that part of that business was the obtaining by legitimate means information in regard to contracts made by competing firms. It was therefore within the scope of Houston's authority to obtain such information by legitimate means. Being armed with that authority, Houston resorted to bribing a clerk of the plaintiff, who was carrying on a competing business, to give him access to the plaintiff's business books. It is said that Houston, in doing this wrongful act, was acting so completely outside the scope of the authority conferred on him by Strong that the firm cannot be held responsible for it. It is contended that an act done by a partner which has for its object something illegal cannot be within the scope of his authority. But was the end which Houston had in view illegal? I do not think it was. One of the objects of the defendants' business, and, indeed, one of the well-known means of carrying on any such business, was to obtain information as to what competing businesses were doing. The obtaining of such information was within the scope of Houston's authority, as the jury have in effect found, and the end which he had in view—viz., the obtaining of such information, was not in itself illegal. It is now clearly established that a principal may be held liable for the fraud or other tort, and even for the crimes, of his agent, if the agent was at the time engaged on an act belonging to the class of acts which were within the scope of his authority. The mere fact that a tort or a crime has been committed does not necessarily take the act out of the scope of authority. The best test to apply is that which was applied by Kennedy, J., in the case—whether the partner was illegitimately doing that which was legitimately in the course of his business. If the thing which he is doing is legitimately in the course of his business, then he is acting within the scope of his authority, even though he seeks to effect it by illegal means, and his partner must take the consequences. That is what is enacted by section 10 of the Partnership Act. The case of Swift v. Jewsbury, which was cited in argument, was before that Act. The rule seems to me to rest not so much on the doctrine of implied authority or holding out as on this principle—that where a person chooses an agent, having an opportunity of judging his character, and intends to take the benefit of his acting successfully, it is only fair that he should also take the risk of his acting outside his authority by doing illegally something within the scope of his authority, and that he rather than the person who deals with the agent should bear the consequences. I therefore think that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

DUNN v. BUCKNALL BROTHERS.
DUNN v. DONALD CURRIE & CO. (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Liability of shipowner for delay in delivery of goods—Carriage of other goods intended for enemy—Arrest of ship—Exception of restraint of princes—Damages—Loss of market.

The plaintiffs during a time of war shipped goods on the defendants' vessel under a bill of lading containing an exception of liability for loss or damage occasioned by restraint of princes. The defendants took on board other goods which, as they knew, were intended for the Queen's enemies. The vessel was arrested by the British authorities before the goods were landed, and a suit was instituted in the Prize Court. In the result, the goods intended for the enemy were confiscated, but the ship was released. In an action brought by the plaintiffs for consequent delay in the delivery of their goods,

Held, that, even supposing that the defendants had not intended to land the goods without the consent of the proper authorities, they were not entitled to rely on the exception to excuse themselves from the consequences of a peril which their own negligence had contributed to bring about.

Held, also, that the measure of damages to which the plaintiffs were entitled was the difference between the market value of their goods at the time when they ought to have been delivered and the market value at the time when they were in fact delivered.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs were shippers of goods by the defendants' vessel, The Mashona, from New York to ports in South Africa.

The action was brought for the loss sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of delay in the delivery of the goods at their destination.

The delay was alleged by the plaintiffs to be due to the negligence of the defendants in permitting to be loaded on board The Mashona goods which were liable to confiscation, such goods consisting mainly of breadstuffs, which, it was said, were intended for the Queen's enemies in the Transvaal.

The ship sailed on the 5th of November, 1899, after war between Great Britain and the Boer Republics had been declared.

The bills of lading of the goods alleged to be intended for the enemy were dated one on the 17th of October, and the others on the 2nd of November, and they contained the following special clause: "As any cargo which may be deemed to be for the Transvaal and/or Orange Free State is liable to be detained, intercepted, confiscated, and/or otherwise restrained in the ports of Cape Colony or Natal, it is agreed by the shipper in accepting this bill of lading that the steamer, her owners, charterers, and/or agents are released from all responsibility in respect of goods so detained, intercepted, confiscated, and/or otherwise restrained."

No such clause appeared in the bills of lading issued to the plaintiffs, but they contained an exception of liability for loss or damage occasioned by restraint of princes.

The vessel arrived at Algoa Bay on the 5th of December. The bills of lading and the ship's manifest showed the character and the destination of the goods. The vessel was boarded by an officer of H.M.S. Partridge, who examined her manifest and ascertained that the goods were intended for ulterior delivery in the Transvaal. The Mashona was arrested and taken to Cape Town by order of the naval authorities. A suit was instituted in the Prize Court at Cape Town for the confiscation of the goods and the condemnation of the ship, as aiding, or attempting to aid, trading operations with the enemy; and the ship was detained, pending the proceedings, from the 5th of December till the end of the following March. By the judgment of the Prize Court certain of the goods on board were found to be intended for the enemy and were confiscated. The ship, however, was released; but it was held by the court that reasonable ground had been shown for arresting her, and the owners were ordered to pay the costs of the captors, except the cost of bringing the vessel round to Cape Town. In consequence of these proceedings great delay was occasioned in the delivery of the plaintiffs' goods.

At the trial Mathew, J., found as a fact that the agents of the ship knew the true character of the goods which were subsequently confiscated and the intention with which they were shipped and their liability to confiscation, and were guilty of negligence and breach of duty to the plaintiffs in permitting them to be put on board. With respect to the damages, he held that, as the defendants knew that the object of the plaintiffs' shipment was to supply the British troops in South Africa, and that the goods would sell at a much higher price if delivered in due course than if delivered at a later time, when a large importation of similar goods would force prices down, the true measure of damages in the case of goods delivered sound was the difference between the market rates when the goods ought to have been, and when they were in fact, delivered; and, further, that the defendants were liable for deterioration to certain of the goods caused by the delay.

Aug. 7.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment of the court: This is an appeal from the decision of Mathew, J., in favour of the plaintiffs, who claimed damages from the defendants for delay in the delivery of goods shipped by the plaintiffs on the defendants' steamship Mashona for carriage to Algoa Bay. The bills of lading under which these goods were shipped excepted liability for loss or damage occasioned by restraint of princes. The ship sailed from New York with the plaintiffs' goods on board shortly after the outbreak of war with the Transvaal. On her arrival at Algoa Bay she was arrested by H.M.S. Partridge, when it was found that she contained goods consigned, if not to the Transvaal Government, certainly to residents in the Transvaal. The ship was accordingly taken to Table Bay, and the case was brought before the Prize Court, who condemned the goods, but released the ship, ordering the owners to pay the costs of the captors save those of bringing the ship round from Algoa Bay, holding that "there was reasonable and probable cause for seizing the ship, that there was certainly carelessness in taking the cargo on board at New York, and though the intention was, perhaps, not to have landed them without the consent of the proper authorities, still the ship had the goods on board." In consequence of these proceedings the delivery of the plaintiffs' goods was delayed for several months; the learned judge has held them entitled to damages based on the difference of the market value at the time they ought to have been delivered in ordinary course and the time at which they were in fact delivered. The defendants deny liability altogether and dispute the measure of damages.

The defendants' contention on the first point is that at the time of shipment they had reasonable grounds for supposing that by arrangements existing at South African ports ships containing cargo consigned to the enemy would be allowed to proceed on giving a bond in £10,000 for the discharge of such goods into the hands of the British authorities at their ultimate port of destination within British territory, and that their intention in proceeding to Algoa Bay was to report the facts to the British authorities there and act as directed by them—an intention which was defeated by the intervention of The Partridge before they had time to carry it out; and they relied on the case of The Mercurius, Edwards's Adm. Rep. 53, in support of this contention. We are of opinion that, if such was their real intention (and the Prize Court use the word "perhaps" in referring to it in the passage above cited), it affords no defence to this action. The court have found in the passage above cited that there was carelessness at New York, and that there was reasonable and probable cause for seizing the ship. Even if the finding of the court were not conclusive on this point, in our opinion the course which the defendants took in carrying the enemies' goods without the knowledge and consent of the other shippers was a breach of duty towards them, and was in effect to court detention, even if they had a well-founded hope of being able to give such explanations to the authorities as would avoid the condemnation of the ship. They took the risk of escaping detention without consulting the plaintiffs on the matter. They are primâ facie liable to the plaintiffs for late delivery, and can only excuse themselves by the exception. But it is quite clear that they cannot rely upon an exception to excuse themselves from the consequences of a peril which their own negligence contributed to bring about. The principle is thus stated in Carver on Carriage by Sea (3rd ed.), s. 16: "A shipowner will not be exonerated from losses arising from any of these excepted causes when there has been any neglect on his part to take all reasonable steps to avoid them." See also section 77 of the same work, citing The Xantho, 36 W. R. 353, 12 App. Cas. 503, and Bowen, L.J. in Steinman v. Angier Line (Limited), 39 W. R. 392, [1891] 1 Q. B. 619. The converse case of the owner's right against the shipper is given by Lord Tenterden in his treatise on Shipping, chapter 7, as an instance of an unquestionable liability—and is quoted by Lord Campbell, C.J., in Brass v. Maitland, 4 W. R. 647, 6 E. & B. 470: "The merchant must lade no prohibited or uncustomed goods by which the ship may be subjected to detention or forfeiture"; and the liability of the shipowner under the express contract of the bill of lading is at least as clear as that implied as resting on the merchant. Here, as pointed out by Mathew, J., there can be no doubt as to the conduct of the shipowners. They had taken advice and caused a clause to be introduced into the bills of lading delivered to the shippers of goods for the Transvaal, pointing to the possibility of detention and excusing themselves from liability. Indeed, the defendants' counsel contended that, inasmuch as their conduct was deliberate, and with a view to carry such cargo to its destination only if the British authorities sanctioned it, the case came within The Mercurius, and the shipowners were excused. It certainly seems a startling contention that a liability for the consequences of an act, which would attach if the act were done negligently, would be excused if it were shown that the act was done deliberately. The question whether the conduct of the owners has been such as to justify the condemnation of the ship is quite independent of their responsibility to the shipper for detention brought about by their act, negligent or deliberate. If negligence in not taking all proper precautions to avoid the excepted perils debars them from relying on the exception, how can they better their position by showing that they deliberately encountered it, even though they had hopes more or less sanguine of avoiding serious detention? They clearly had no right to speculate on possible immunity at the risk of the plaintiffs without consulting them. In our opinion, therefore, on the undisputed facts in this case their liability is clearly established.

The only remaining question is whether the learned judge was wrong in his direction to the referee as to the measure of damages. On this part of the case The Parana, 25 W. R. 596, 2 P. D. 118, was strongly relied upon by the appellants as establishing that the plaintiffs could be entitled to nothing more than interest on the value of the goods when they ought in ordinary course to have been landed down to the date of actual delivery, and they contended broadly that damages could not be recovered for loss of market on a voyage by sea. But we do not understand The Parana as establishing any such general proposition. There can be no absolute peremptory rule taking voyages by sea out of the principles which regulate the measure of damages on breach of other contracts. It is only because the possible length of voyages and the consequent uncertainty as to the times of arrival may in many cases eliminate the supposition of any reasonable expectation as to the state of the market at the time of arrival that, as a general rule, damages for loss of market by late delivery are not recoverable from the carrier by sea. It is certainly not a rule of law; it is only an inference of fact that from the circumstances of the case no reasonable assumption as to the state of the market at the time of arrival could have been a factor in the contract between the parties. But, as the means of sea transit improve, voyages of three and four weeks' duration may be, and are now, accomplished with almost absolute certainty, and the state of the market at the reasonably calculated date of arrival may well be a vital factor present to the minds of both parties at the time of making the contract. Wherever the circumstances admit of calculations as to the time of arrival and the probable fluctuations of the market being made with the same degree of reasonable certainty in the case of a sea, as of a land, transit there can be no reason why damages for late delivery should not be calculated according to the same principles in both cases. This, indeed, if it were not self-evident, would seem to follow from the illustrations given by Mellish, L.J., himself in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in The Parana. After giving other instances, he says, 2 P. D., at p. 121: "Or if it is known to both parties that the goods will sell at a better price if they arrive at one time than if they arrive at a later time, that may be a ground for giving damages for their arriving too late and selling for a lower sum." And he adds: "But there is in this case no evidence of anything of that kind." Here the learned judge has found as a fact "that it was known to the defendants what the object of the plaintiffs' shipment was—namely, the supply of the British troops, and that the goods would sell at a much higher price if delivered in due course than at a later time when a large importation of similar goods would force prices down." The appellants, indeed, suggested that evidence was wanting to support these findings, but on the admitted facts it seems to us a case of res ipsa loquitur as to the inference which both parties must have drawn as to the purpose of the shipment and the probable effect of delay in delivery. And, as is well known to practitioners in the Commercial Court, cases are there conducted on the basis of mutual admissions which do not always appear in the formal record. We are of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the learned judge was right on all points, and that, consequently, this appeal must be dismissed.

1847, but is a supply for the purposes of a "trade, manufacture, or business" within section 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J. (reported 50 W. R. 92, [1901] 2 Ch. 813).

The plaintiffs were the urban sanitary authority for the district of Barnard Castle, in the county of Durham, and under the authority of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Acts incorporated therewith, provided a water supply for the district. Under section 56 of that Act they might charge for water a water rate assessed on the premises supplied, or might enter into agreements on other terms; by section 58 they could supply water by measure; and by section 65 they might supply water for trading purposes on such conditions as might be agreed upon between themselves and the persons supplied.

The defendants were the governors of the North-Eastern County School, Barnard Castle. This school was not carried on for purposes of profit, but was a charity administered under a scheme settled by the Charity Commissioners in 1882.

The school had accommodation for three hundred boarders and fifty day boys, and was supplied with water by the plaintiffs for drinking, washing, cooking, and other domestic purposes at the usual rate levied by them in the district for domestic purposes, and for cricket ground and steam-boiler by special agreement.

In 1896 the governors erected on their premises a swimming bath with a cubical capacity of 35,000 gallons. The plaintiffs supplied the water for this bath under a special agreement till March, 1899, when they gave the governors notice that in future the charge for water would be 6d. per thousand gallons, which was the usual price paid for water supplied in the district for trade purposes. The governors refused to agree to this, and the plaintiffs brought the present action against them for a declaration that the governors were not entitled to demand or receive from the plaintiffs a supply of water for the swimming bath as for domestic purposes within the meaning of the Waterworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1863, as incorporated by the Public Health Act, 1875, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to payment from the defendants for the bath at the rate of 6d. per 1,000 gallons, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to cut off the water till payment was made, and an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking the water except as water for purposes other than domestic purposes within the meaning of the Acts.

The prospectus of the school stated that a swimming bath was provided and that the swimming bath fee was 3s. 6d. a term, payable by every boarder. A swimming master was kept to instruct the boys, and a fee was paid by such day boys as used the bath.

Buckley, J., held that the water for the swimming bath was supplied for domestic purposes within section 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, and dismissed the action.

By section 53 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, "Every owner and occupier of any dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house within the limits of the special Act shall . . . be entitled to demand and receive from the undertakers a sufficient supply of water for his domestic purposes."

By section 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, "A supply of water for domestic purposes shall not include a supply of water for cattle, or for horses, or for washing carriages where such horses or carriages are kept for sale or hire by a common carrier, or a supply for any trade, manufacture, or business, or for watering gardens, or for fountains, or for any ornamental purpose."

Upjohn, K.C., and S. G. Lushington, for the appellants.—The supply of water for a swimming bath is not a supply for domestic purposes within section 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863. It is really a supply for the purposes of a trade—the trade of a school. The Legislature cannot have contemplated laying such a heavy burden on a water company as to enable anyone to require an unlimited supply for domestic purposes.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C., and R. C. Glen, for the respondents.—The swimming bath is merely an adjunct to the school and is not used for the purposes of the business of the school. Bathing must be considered a domestic purpose.

Upjohn, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This case is a troublesome one, and in my judgment depends entirely upon a question of fact as to which different minds may arrive at different conclusions. According to my view we have not very complete information as to what the circumstances are from which we are to draw our inferences of fact. In construing an Act of Parliament I do not think it a right course to pursue to ask, Is this particular case one which it would be right or reasonable for the Legislature to include within the enabling powers of such or such a section? and I do not think myself that it is a proper way to approach the particular case with which we have to deal here to ask whether it is likely that the Legislature in passing the Waterworks Clauses Acts of 1847 and 1863 could have intended that a supply of water for large swimming baths for schools should be included under the term "for domestic purposes." It seems to me that a great part of Mr. Upjohn's argument is based upon the suggestion that it was not likely that the Legislature intended to put a water company or a local authority who supply water in such a position that they would have to supply a large swimming bath with water. I do not think it right to deal with the Act in that way. We ought to look at the words of the statute, and unless their natural construction would lead to some absurd result we ought to give them their natural meaning. Now, section 53 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, provides that "every owner and occupier of any dwelling-house" within the district "shall be entitled to demand and receive a sufficient supply of water for his domestic purposes." We have got to say what is the meaning of the words "for his domestic purposes" when used in relation to owner and occupier of any dwelling-house. On looking at the cases which have been decided on this section it is plain that it cannot be said that the domestic purpose must be one which has to be attained inside the dwelling-house of the occupier or that it must be such as is essential to the occupation of the house, or even to the healthy occupation of the house. It is plain on the authorities that there is no such limitation of the meaning of domestic purposes. Before dealing with the authorities I wish to say a word about section 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863. [His lordship read the section.] The inference which I draw from those express statutory exceptions is that the things thus excepted would before the Act of 1863 have fallen with the meaning of domestic purposes in section 53 of the Act of 1847, and that it was necessary to have an express statutory provision to take them out of that section. A remarkable instance of what was held to be intended under the term domestic purposes before the Act of 1863 is to be found in Busby v. Chesterfield Waterworks and Gas Light Co., in which it was held that an occupier who kept a carriage and a horse for private use was entitled to call on the water company to supply him under the head of domestic purposes with water for the horse and for washing the carriage. In giving judgment Lord Campbell, C.J., said: "The horse and carriage were for private use, and were kept on the premises. That being so, the water used for them was applied to domestic use. If that be not so, I do not see how we are to distinguish between a horse so kept and a dog or cat. The horse and carriage are kept for the use of the occupier of the house for his health and enjoyment in an outhouse belonging to his premises." In that judgment Erle and Crompton, JJ., agreed. After that decision it seems to me impossible to say that water which is applied for the purpose of making a house more convenient or for increasing its amenities to the owner or occupier is not supplied for domestic purposes. That decision was approved in Bristol Waterworks Co. v. Wren, when Smith, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, said: "In our judgment water used for the mere amenities of the house such as in this case, the watering of the pleasure garden surrounding and attached to and occupied with the house, may legitimately and fairly be held to be used for domestic purposes within the meaning of the statute in question." I cannot doubt after reading these two cases that if the water is really used for the more convenient occupation of the house or for the purpose of increasing its amenities to the owner or occupier that is primâ facie a user for domestic purposes. And I do not think that you can cut down the rule by saying that the user must be one which is usual, and that it is not usual to have a swimming bath in a dwelling-house, and therefore water supplied for it is not a domestic use within the meaning of the section. I cannot agree with that view. If that were the true rule I think the courts would have been obliged to hold that a supply of water for a fixed bath was not a supply for domestic purposes, for when the Act of 1847 was passed the houses in the United Kingdom which had not a fixed bath were in a large majority, and even now in the twentieth century I think that no person could come to the conclusion that a majority of them are provided with fixed baths. I think, therefore, that the true definition of "domestic purposes" is that which I have already stated—namely, the purpose of making a house more convenient or increasing its amenities. Another limitation which has been suggested is that the user must be reasonable with reference to the capacity of the water company or the water authority to supply their district. In the present case the plaintiffs admit their capacity to supply the defendants' swimming bath, but they say they are entitled to make a special charge for so doing. Then it was said, suppose every occupier in the district insisted on having a supply of water for a swimming bath. But you must consider the Act of Parliament having regard to the real facts, and it is idle to suggest that everyone would require a supply of water for a swimming bath, which in fact could only be wanted in exceptional circumstances. Then it is said that the supply required must be reasonable as regards the subject-matter. I cannot find, either in the Act or in any of the decided cases any trace of such a limitation. As regards the exception in section 12 of the Act of 1863, that "a supply of water for domestic purposes shall not include a supply for any trade, manufacture, or business," I agree that the carrying on of a school is a business within the meaning of those words, but I also agree with Buckley, J., that the fact that a house is used for the purpose of a business does not prevent the use of water for domestic purposes within that house. The mere fact that in such a house there is a swimming bath does not make the supply of water to the bath a supply for the purposes of the business. It may still be a supply for the domestic purposes of the residents in the house. The conclusion at which Buckley, J., arrived was that this swimming bath was used in order that the occupation of the house by the boys might be more healthy. If that is a right conclusion of fact, the supply of water to the bath would be for domestic purposes within the meaning of the Act of 1847, and would not be a supply for any trade, manufacture, or business. It is said that this conclusion of fact is wrong, and that the proper conclusion to arrive at is that the bath was not erected for the healthy occupation of the school by the boys, but for the purpose of teaching swimming to the boys. I understand that both my brethren think that this is the right conclusion in fact, and I do not think I ought to differ from them, though I should have preferred to have further information upon this point. I assent, therefore, to the appeal being allowed, but I base my decision on the ground that the bath is used for the purpose of making the teaching of the school more effectual, and not for the purpose of making the occupation of the house more convenient. But I do not intend to decide that a supply of water to a swimming bath is necessarily in every case a supply for non-domestic purposes.

ROMER, L.J.—As this case gives rise to questions of great general importance I feel it right to state my view of them. It has been argued on behalf of the defendants that the only test whether a supply of water is required for domestic purposes within the meaning of the Act of 1847 is to see whether the water is used or consumed by an occupier for the private purposes only of himself, his household, and his premises. In my opinion that is too wide a proposition. Let me give one example to show that the suggested test would not be a proper one. Suppose that water supplied at high pressure (as it generally is) were used by an occupier to drive a dynamo for the purpose of lighting his house by electricity. In my opinion, it could not be said that such a user of the water would be a use for domestic purposes. Again, could an occupier, who had a very large garden attached to his house, call upon a water company to fill with water a pond which he chose to dig in his garden for the purpose of boating? I think such a use of the water would not be for domestic purposes within the meaning of the Act. In considering what is a domestic purpose regard must be had to the ordinary habits of domestic life in this country. And I think that regard should be had, in considering the question, also to what is a reasonable user, as tested by the amount of water required. I think this is shown by section 17 of the Act of 1863, which imposes a penalty on any person supplied with water who "wilfully or negligently causes or suffers any pipe . . . or other apparatus . . . to be so used or contrived as that the water supplied to him is or is likely to be wasted, misused, unduly consumed, or contaminated." In determining what is to be regarded as a domestic purpose, I think you ought to consider not only the consumer but also the obligation of the water company or authority to afford a compulsory supply to their district for domestic purposes. It is a very serious question if it is to be held that in every case in which an occupier desires to have a supply of water for his enjoyment and pleasure the water company or authority are bound to supply him without regard to the ordinary requirements of their district for the purposes of drinking, washing, and sanitation. Let me give an example to show what I mean by saying that you must take a reasonable view of what is a domestic purpose. I agree that a householder would be entitled to allow his dog or his cat to drink the water supplied for domestic purposes, and to use it for washing them. So, again, as has been decided, he might use the water for washing his horse and carriage and for watering the horse. There must, however, be some limitation. Suppose a wealthy proprietor chose to keep other tame animals—for instance, a tame elephant, would it be reasonable for him to call upon a water company to supply him with water to fill a special bath for the elephant? In my opinion that would not be a supply for domestic purposes. Again, it might be reasonable to use the water to fill a small tank for gold fish. But suppose an occupier wished to keep a private aquarium, and wanted a supply of running water to keep the specimens in it alive, I should not be disposed to hold that he could call on a water company to furnish him with such a supply. In my opinion you must approach each case with regard to its particular circumstances, and see whether the supply of water which is wanted is reasonably a supply for domestic purposes. Again, take the circumstances of the present case. I am not prepared to say that in every case a supply of water to a swimming bath erected by the owner of a house would be a supply for domestic purposes. If a person chooses to construct a swimming bath he is not, in my opinion, entitled to call on a company to supply the bath with water for his recreation or pleasure on the ground that the supply is required for domestic purposes within the meaning of the Acts. But whether that be so or not, looking at the circumstances of the present case I think the water for the bath is not required for domestic purposes. In my judgment the bath was really constructed, and is required and used, for the purposes of the business of the school, and not for the domestic purposes of the school considered as the domus or home of the boys. That being so, I think this appeal should be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—This case is one of some difficulty. The question arises upon the construction of two sections in two Acts of Parliament which have already created difficulties and will probably do so again. I wish to confine my observations as nearly as possible to what is necessary to the decision of the present case and not to deal with any general propositions of law. [His lordship read section 53 of the Act of 1847, section 12 of the Act of 1863, and continued:] It is plain from the decided cases that the words "domestic purposes" in section 53 of the Act of 1847 ought to receive a wide and not a narrow construction. That is shown by Busby v. Chesterfield Waterworks and Gas Light Co. At the same time I do not think that the words can be treated as having an unlimited meaning. Speaking for myself, I am not prepared to say that every one of the cases which are excepted by section 12 of the Act of 1863 would, but for that exception, have been included under domestic purposes in section 53. I think some of the exceptions must have been introduced merely by way of precaution. In Busby v. Chesterfield Waterworks and Gas Light Co. the decision was based on the fact that the horse and carriage was kept for private use, and I am not satisfied that the court there would have come to the same conclusion if they had been kept for purposes of trade. The question in the present case is whether a supply of water to a swimming bath at a school is a supply for domestic purposes or for the purposes of the business of the school. For myself I am not prepared to say that if the owner or occupier of a house constructed a swimming bath simply for the use of himself and his household a supply of water to it would not be a supply for domestic purposes. For the present purpose I will assume that it would. But if the occupier carried on the business of teaching swimming and used the bath for the purpose of giving lessons in swimming it is admitted that that would be a use of the water for purposes of a business within the exception contained in section 12 of the Act of 1863. The present case lies between the two cases I have put. I agree with the decision of Buckley, J., that the carrying on of the school is a business. Then comes this difficulty, in order to carry on the business of a school there must be residences for the boys. But the fact that those residences form part of and are for the purposes of a school, does not prevent their constituting the home of the boys, and I think that a supply of water to the house in which the boarders live would be a supply for domestic purposes. I am not there prepared to differ from Pidgeon v. Great Yarmouth Waterworks Co. But looking at all the circumstances of the case, I have come to the conclusion that this swimming bath is used not for the purposes of the school considered as the home or residence of the boys, but for the purposes of the business of the school. In the prospectus this swimming bath is put forward as one of the advantages of the school, and it is stated that a separate fee is to be charged for the use of it. I think the inference to be drawn is that the bath is used for one of the educational purposes of the school; in other words, it is used for the purposes of the business which is carried on at the school. Upon this question of fact, therefore, I differ with the greatest respect from the conclusion of Buckley, J., and I think that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Phillimore, J. (50 W. R. 109, [1901] 2 K. B. 919).

The plaintiffs were ten gold mining companies incorporated under the laws of and carrying on business in the late South African Republic, who by the action sought to have the defendants declared liable under a policy for loss of gold commandeered by the Executive Council of the Government of the Transvaal Republic on the eve of the war of that state with this country.

Under the policy the gold was insured against arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings, princes, and people while in transit from the companies' mines at Johannesburg to the United Kingdom. The policy contained the following exception clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of riot, civil commotions, hostilities, or warlike operations whether before or after the declaration of war."

On the 2nd of October, 1899, gold to the value of £223,750, to which the policy attached while in course of transit from the mines to the coast, was "commandeered" at Vereeninging, the last station on the Transvaal territory, by officials of the Transvaal Government, acting under the orders of the Executive Council, and on the 9th of October a further quantity of gold amounting to £11,800 was seized at a bank at Johannesburg, where it had been deposited by the plaintiffs. In addition to relying on the "free of capture and seizure" clause, the defendants pleaded the same points of defence as were raised in the case of the Driefontein Consolidated Mines (Limited) v. Janson, 49 W. R. 660, [1901] 2 K. B. 419.

Phillimore, J., held that the loss was caused by "seizure" within the meaning of the exemption in the policy and that the defendants were not liable.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Lawson Walton, K.C., J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and John Dove, for the plaintiffs.

Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., Alfred Lyttelton, K.C., and Loehnis, for the defendants.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case a large quantity of gold was consigned by a subject of the late South African Republic, or at any rate by a person living under the protection of the laws of that republic, to this country, and the gold was insured with the defendants during transit against "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people." During transit the gold was commandeered, and the defendants denied liability, contending that the loss fell within the exempting words of the policy, "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of riots, commotions, hostilities, or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war." A few days before the declaration of war the gold was arrested at Vereeninging by an official of the South African Republic, under orders of the government of that state. The commandoes had then been called out and the railway and its staff had been taken over by the government of the republic. In these circumstances the plaintiffs claimed under the policy as upon a loss caused by an "arrest, restraint, and detainment of kings, princes, and people." The defendants said the loss did not come within these words, but that if it did, it came within the exception contained in the warranty clause. The plaintiffs were placed in this difficulty: The risks insured against, within which they sought to bring the case implied an act of superior force or of paramount authority which they were not in a position to resist. To succeed they had to bring in the element of force and at the same time to attenuate that element as far as possible so as to prevent the application of the exception contained in the warranty clause. They had to get in a sufficient element of force, but not enough to bring the case within the meaning of the exception. What did they do? They attempted to get over the difficulty by saying that there was evidence upon which we might hold that there had been an acquiescence on the part of the owners of the gold to hand it over to the Government of the Republic under the law of the state, and that amounted to an "arrest" but not to a "seizure" within the meaning of the exception. That certainly is an attempt to draw a very fine line, and, speaking for myself, I think the learned counsel who attempted to argue the question failed to get out of the difficulty. What was the evidence? There had been an ultimatum at the time, which was immediately followed by the calling out of the forces of the country. That in itself was a preliminary of warlike operations, and which led to the suspension of the constitution, letting in the maxim salus populi suprema lex, a maxim of law that stands above all law. The taking possession of the gold for the benefit of the country in those circumstances brings the case, in my judgment, within the word "seizure" as it was intended by the parties to be construed in the exception. To attempt to argue that the surrender of property under such circumstances was not a yielding to a vis major, and that the taking possession was not a "seizure" seems little short of impossible. Cases have been referred to with a view to show that such an act of authority was not a "seizure." But when those cases are looked into they really support the contrary view. In Cory v. Burr, 31 W. R. 894, 8 App. Cas. 393, Lord Selborne said: "The first question which has been considered in the argument has been, What is the meaning of the words 'capture and seizure'? 'Warranted free' clearly means that the insurers are not to be liable for the things to which the warranty applies. I own I should have hesitated, even if there had been no authority, before I should have been brought to agree with the view which was thrown out in the course of the argument . . . the view, I mean, that 'capture and seizure' in such a warranty must be taken to mean primâ facie belligerent capture and seizure only. My reasons for saying so are that the word 'seizure' is used as well as the word 'capture.' I am disposed to agree that if the word 'capture' had stood alone it might have appeared to point to belligerent capture, but the addition of the word 'seizure' is only officious, as I read the warranty, by supposing that it is to exclude that narrow construction of the word 'capture' and to let in other 'seizures' such as Cotton, L.J., suggests by means of the revenue laws of a foreign state. . . ." Here the plaintiffs, by surrendering the gold to the South African officials, yielded to an act of paramount authority, and the seizure was none the less a seizure because it was justified under the laws of the republic. I do not think that the distinction attempted to be made between arrest and seizure is justified by the authorities cited, and Lord Blackburn in Cory v. Burr, where he referred to the decision in Havelock v. Hancill, 3 T. R. 277, shows that in his opinion there was no such distinction. It is clear that the seizure of the gold here was accompanied by the indicia of overwhelming force, the authority to seize the gold being based on the suspension, it might be constitutional suspension, of the ordinary law. There is another ground upon which the defendants might, if needs be, deny liability, and that is that the warranty clause excepts beside capture, seizure, and detention, "all consequences of riots, civil commotions, hostilities, or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war." We know that the commandoes had been called out, which let in the suspension of the ordinary laws of the state. It was only a supreme emergency that could warrant that being done, and it therefore let in the doctrine of salus populi. There were, therefore, warlike operations before the declaration of war, and the seizure of the gold was a consequence of those warlike operations. The case falls within more than one of the risks excepted from the policy.

For the reasons I have stated, the judgment of Phillimore, J., appears to me to be perfectly right, and this appeal fails.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., gave judgments concurring.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Nov. 13.

In re HALL.

FOSTER v. METCALFE. (a.)

Will—Contingent legacy—Appropriation.

An executor is entitled to appropriate a particular sum to meet a contingent legacy without interest in the meantime where the residuary legatee does not object to the appropriation. But a contingent legatee, not entitled to interest in the meantime, cannot insist upon an appropriation as against the residuary legatee, and can only require the residuary legatee to give security for payment of the legacy when the contingency happens.

This was a summons taken out by the surviving trustee of the testator to determine the validity of certain appropriations of stock made by the trustees to meet certain contingent legacies bequeathed by the testator.

By his will, William Hall gave to each of his godchildren (by name) who should survive him and who should attain twenty-one years or marry under that age a legacy of £1,000 free of legacy duty, but without interest in the meantime.

The testator died on the 14th of October, 1897.

Phyllis Chalmers, one of the godchildren named in the will, was, at the date of the testator's death, an infant and unmarried, but she had since attained twenty-one. Two other godchildren were still infants and unmarried.

In 1899 the trustees of the will invested three several sums of £1,000 in the purchase of trustee securities to meet the three contingent legacies, and one of the securities, being £700 Great Eastern Railway Irredeemable 4 per Cent. Stock, was appropriated by them to meet Miss Chalmers' legacy.

The stock in question depreciated in value, and when Miss Chalmers came of age she refused to accept the stock in satisfaction of her legacy.

This summons was thereupon taken out.

T. K. Crossfield, for the trustee.

J. D. Davenport, for the residuary legatee.

G. R. Northcote, for other beneficiaries under the will.

W. P. Baildon, for Miss Chalmers.—There can be no appropriation in the case of a contingent legacy where interest is not payable in the meantime: Roper on Legacies (4th ed.), vol. 1, p. 931. The ordinary practice of the court is to order the fund to be paid to the person entitled to the residue upon his giving security to the legatee for payment of the legacy when the contingency happens: Webber v. Webber, 1 Sim. & St. 311.

A. C. Clauson, for infant legatees.—It is doubtful whether section 4, sub-section 1, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, has not altered the law as to appropriation; none of the requirements of that section have been complied with by the trustees here.

He referred to In re Beverley, Watson v. Watson, 49 W. R. 343, [1901] 1 Ch. 681.

KEKEWICH, J., said that although the language of Leach, V.C., in Webber v. Webber appeared to support the contention that there could not be an appropriation in the case of a contingent legacy where no interest was payable in the meantime, yet, having regard to the question which was before the court in that case, he thought that Leach, V.C., merely meant to decide that a contingent legatee not entitled to interest in the meantime could not insist upon an appropriation as against the residuary legatee, but could only require him to give security. It did not follow that the executors were not entitled to appropriate a particular sum for such a legacy, where the residuary legatee did not object. In his lordship's opinion, Webber v. Webber did not govern the present case. With regard to section 4 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, the transaction in the present case was entirely different from that contemplated by the Act, and it was impossible that the Legislature could have intended by a remedial provision to sweep away a doctrine which had been well established for a long time. His lordship thought that the trustees had done their duty as pointed out by the authorities, and that the appropriation was good. With regard to the costs, as the litigation had been forced upon the trustee by the refusal of the legatee to accept the stock, his lordship ordered the legatee to pay the costs of all parties, upon the ground that the summons ought to be treated as a summons by the legatee.

ing from the specification of goods in respect of which a mark is registered, goods in regard to which at the time of registration there was no actual employment of such mark nor any intention to employ the same, although the person registering the trade-mark may have sold such goods under other marks.

This was a motion by the Anglo-Swiss Condensed Milk Co., having registered offices at 10, Mark-lane, London, that the register of trade-marks might be rectified by expunging a trade-mark No. 22,206 therefrom, or in the alternative by excluding condensed milk from the specification of goods in respect of which the same was registered.

The respondents were Mr. M. J. Hart, of Peninsular House, Monument-street, London, and the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks.

The trade-mark in question consisted of a geometrical quasi-floral device with the words "red rose" underneath, and was registered in the name of Mr. Jacob S. Gates on behalf of the firm of H. K. & F. B. Thurber & Co. on the 6th of October, 1880, in class 42, being substances used as food or ingredients in food.

Mr. Gates at the time that he registered this registered also the devices of the yellow rose, white rose, and tube rose, thus making a series of roses, and also a device lily of the valley.

The business of H. K. & F. B. Thurber was divided, and the English business, to which these trade-marks belonged, was carried on by Mr. Gates under the title Thurber, Gates, & Co. The latter then assigned it to a Mr. Dottridge, by whom it was subsequently assigned to a Mr. Wilson, who later assigned it to Thurbers (Limited), which latter company worked the business with that of another company known as "Thurber Whyland Co.," but in course of time failed.

The receiver, on behalf of the debenture-holders of the same, assigned the goodwill and trade-marks to Mr. Hart.

The Anglo-Swiss Condensed Milk Co., who sold condensed milk in tins, had for seventeen years used in connection with the same the device of a red or pink rose and two buds and leaves after nature.

On the 12th of September, 1901, the Anglo-Swiss Condensed Milk Co. applied to register their mark in class 42, stating the essential particulars to be the device and the word "rose," and disclaiming any right to the added matter or to the exclusive right of the word rose. The comptroller refused to register the mark without the consent of Hart on the ground of the existence on the register of mark 22,206. Hart declined to consent to the alteration, and accordingly the plaintiffs brought the action. The motion was heard as a witness action, the witnesses being cross-examined on their affidavits. Hart stated in his evidence that he bought the business from the receiver of Thurbers (Limited), largely with a view of obtaining their trade-mark, which he thought that he might use in connection with his business. And there was evidence that in 1901 he intended to put upon the market a brand of condensed milk with the trade-mark of Thurbers (Limited). He further stated that he intended in the future so to use it. It further appeared in evidence that Hart's predecessors in title had used their "rose" marks for certain goods in class 42, but not for condensed milk, and that they had never had any bonâ fide intention so to use it.

Hart's title to mark 22,206 was further attacked on the ground that he was not the original proprietor, and that there could have been no valid assignment to him of the mark except with the goodwill of the business in condensed milk. At the hearing the applicants stated that they would only ask for the exclusion of condensed milk from the articles in respect of which Hart's mark was registered.

Rowden, K.C., and Sebastian, for the applicants.—There is no evidence that the respondent ever used the mark in respect of condensed milk, or that he or his predecessors in title had any intention of so using it. The respondent's right to use the mark should be limited in respect of the articles that he does use: Edwards v. Dennis, 30 Ch. D. 454, 34 W. R. Dig. 197; Hargreaves v. Freeman, [1891] 3 Ch. 37, 40 W. R. Dig. 266; In re Batts & Co.'s Trade-Marks, [1898] 2 Ch. 432; In re Suter, Hartman, & Rahtjen's Composition Co.'s Trade-Mark, 19 Rep. Pat. Cas. 42.

Parker, for the comptroller.—There is a strong public objection to the existence of these dormant marks on the register. It is contrary to the intention and policy of the Trade-Mark Acts that such marks should be on the register which are not in actual use. On this ground the applicants are supported by Comptroller-General.

Levett, K.C., and Griffith Jones, for the respondent.—Although Hart's predecessors in title may not have used the mark for condensed milk, they have made use of it for many of the articles in class 42. On this ground the mark should not be expunged. It is a sufficient defence if the owner of the mark deals in articles in respect of which it is desired to rectify the register. The original registration was bonâ fide, and it is intended now to use the mark for condensed milk.

Rowden, K.C., replied.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—When the respondent Hart took an assignment in April, 1901, he did so, he states, with the intention of putting on the market a brand of condensed milk with the trade-mark of Thurbers (Limited). [After commenting further on the evidence, his lordship continued:] The circumstances of the present case differ from the circumstances in Edwards v. Dennis in this respect, that the business whereof the goodwill had been assigned to Hart was a business which included the sale of condensed milk, whilst in Edwards v. Dennis the business of the respondents did not include dealing in the description of goods in respect of which the applicants sought to have the register rectified. The first point for consideration is whether or not the principle applied in Edwards v. Dennis ought to be acted upon in a case where the goods of a particular description in class 42 have been sold, but never in connection with the trade-mark in question. It is, I think, clear on the facts that not only was there no user of the mark in connection with condensed milk, but that there could have been no intention so to use the mark when it was originally registered. If ever there was any vague original intention of this kind (in support of which there is no evidence) it was not acted upon and was given up, as is shown by non-user and subsequent user of other marks for the same description of goods. There is no such difference between the provisions of the Act of 1875, which was the Act considered in Edwards v. Dennis, and the provisions of the Act which is now in force, as to render that case inapplicable as an authority. It follows, therefore, that notwithstanding the fact that after five years from the date of registration such registration is conclusive evidence of right to the exclusive use of the mark, it does not preclude an application to remove if it ought not originally to have been placed there. I have not to deal with a case where there has been some de facto use of the mark in respect of the particular goods nor with a case where a mark having been used in connection with certain goods, the business has been or is about to be extended to the sale of other goods within the class for which registration has been effected, and I can see that different considerations may also well arise in varying circumstances; but confining myself to the facts of the present case, first, registration of the mark for a whole class, then user of the mark for some goods in that class, sale of other goods in that class for more than twenty years, always in connection with other marks and never in connection with the mark in question, I can only come to the conclusion that there never was at the time of registration any such intention to use the mark as to bring the case within the principle requiring de facto user or immediate intention to use the mark in connection with a particular description of goods at the time of the registration, to entitle a man to be on the register in respect of such goods. I think that the case In re Butts' Trade-Mark supports the view that I take.

This renders it unnecessary to decide the question of abandonment, and I will only say that this must be a question of intention, as was pointed out by Chitty, J., in Mouson & Co. v. Boehm, 32 W. R. 612, 26 Ch. D. 398, and I should find great difficulty in holding that where, as in the present case, the only user relied on, so far as concerns the particular goods, is that evidenced by the mark having been for five years on the register, there has been no abandonment, when for more than fifteen years, subsequent to such five years, and prior to the assignment to the respondent, there has been no user; but a sale of the description of goods with user of other and different marks. I think that the register ought to be amended by excluding condensed milk from the class of goods for which the mark stands on the register. I have not sufficient materials before me to enable me to place any greater limitation upon the class, unless the respondent for his own protection against possible subsequent applications desires it, in which case I will assist him. The respondent must pay the costs of this application and of the comptroller.

BOYCE v. MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND COUNCILLORS OF THE METROPOLITAN BOROUGH COUNCIL OF PADDINGTON AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Local government—Hoarding—Open space—Adjoining landowner—Access of light—Building—Right to sue without Attorney-General—Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 35), s. 1; 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 34), s. 5; 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 32), s. 4—Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 72), s. 3.

A local authority managing an open space under statutory authority for the benefit of the public, if it acts in contravention of its statutory duties and thereby injures the property of an adjoining landowner, as by erecting a building so as to darken his windows, may be sued by the injured party without the Attorney-General, as he is suing either in respect of a private right or in respect of a right from the interference with which he has suffered special damage.

A hoarding upon a disused churchyard managed under the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877, 1881, and 1887, and the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, erected for the purpose of preventing an adjoining landowner from acquiring by prescription a right to access of light to windows of his houses overlooking the churchyard, is not a building within the meaning of those Acts, and its erection is therefore not prohibited by them.

The plaintiff was the owner of land in the parish of Paddington, abutting on the north-east upon the parish church of St. Mary's, Paddington, and he had lately erected blocks of flats upon the ground containing numerous windows which overlooked the churchyard.

The churchyard had become a disused burial ground within the meaning of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts of 1877, 1881, and 1887, and of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884; and by virtue of those Acts, and of an indenture of April, 1892, made between the vicar of the parish (who was one of the defendants) and the Vestry of Paddington, who were the predecessors in title of the defendant borough council, and of a faculty granted by the Bishop of London in December, 1892, the defendant borough council had the control and management of the churchyard.

In January, 1901, the defendant borough council proposed to erect a hoarding or screen in the churchyard in front of the windows of the plaintiff's flats which would have the effect of darkening them. The plaintiff brought this action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting any screen, wall, or building in the churchyard so as to occasion nuisance, annoyance, or damage to the plaintiff and the tenants of the flats.

By section 1 of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1877, the Metropolitan Board of Works might acquire and hold the open space "in trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise or recreation . . ." By section 5 of the Act of 1881, the open space, &c., is to be held by the board or vestry of the parish where it is situate "in trust to allow, and with a view to the enjoyment by the public of such open space, churchyard, cemetery, or burial ground in an open condition, free from buildings, and under proper control and regulation, and for no other purpose. . . ." The Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, s. 3, enacts: "It shall not be lawful to erect any buildings upon any disused burial grounds, except for the purpose of enlarging a church, chapel, meeting-house, or other places of worship."

Astbury, K.C., and M. L. Romer, for the plaintiff.—[BUCKLEY, J.—Ought not the Attorney-General to have been a plaintiff?] It is submitted that that is not necessary. The plaintiff is suing in respect of a right peculiar to himself as adjoining owner. His windows, and not those of the public, are affected. He suffers a private injury: Lyon v. Fishmongers' Company, 25 W. R. 165, 1 App. Cas. 662. Moreover, the plaintiff suffers special damage beyond that suffered by the rest of the public from the erection of the hoarding, and thus can sue alone: Winterbottom v. Lord Derby, 16 W. R. 15, L. R. 2 Ex. 316. As regards the main question the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, s. 5, requires the churchyard to be kept in an open condition, free from buildings, for the enjoyment of the public, and the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, forbids the erection of "any buildings" upon it. The hoarding proposed to be erected would be a building: Pocock v. Gilham, 1 Cab. & Ell. 104; Foster v. Fraser, 42 W. R. 11, [1893] 3 Ch. 158; Wood v. Cooper, 43

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

W. R. 201, [1894] 3 Ch. 671. Foster v. Fraser, where a hoarding was held not a building, turned upon the words of a particular covenant. Suppose the proposed hoarding were extended all around the churchyard, could the churchyard be considered an open space kept for the enjoyment of the public.

H. Terrell, K.C., and T. A. Nash, for the defendant.—The churchyard is to be kept as an open space for the enjoyment of the public and not for the benefit of the adjoining landowners. The plaintiff has no special right of access, as was the case in Lyon v. Fishmongers' Company, he is only entitled to the open space as one of the public, and cannot sue without the Attorney-General: Stoke Parish Council v. Price, 47 W. R. 663, [1899] 2 Ch. 277. A hoarding is not a "building": Foster v. Fraser, Wilson v. Queen's Club, 40 W. R. 172, [1891] 3 Ch. 522; Vicar, &c., of St. Botolph v. Parishioners of Same, [1900] P. 69, 48 W. R. Dig. 62; Slaughter v. Mayor of Sunderland, 65 L. T. Rep. 250, 60 L. J. M. C. 91, 39 W. R. Dig. 113.

C. A. M. Barlow, for the defendant vicar.

Nov. 8.—BUCKLEY, J,—When stripped of all technicality the question to be determined in this action is whether the owners of lands circumjacent to and abutting upon other land which has become an open space within the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877, 1881, and 1887, and the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, became at once, by virtue of those Acts, or must be allowed to become, after the period of the Prescription Act, by virtue of an enjoyment which cannot be excluded by the erection of a hoarding, entitled as of right to the access of light to the windows of any buildings which they may erect contiguous to the open space. The defendants contend that they are entitled to erect a hoarding in front of these windows so as to preclude the plaintiff from prescribing for rights of light. The plaintiff says they are not so entitled, and asserts his case upon two grounds. He says, first, that he, as a member of the public, is entitled to insist that the space shall be an open space, from which it results that there will be free access of light to his windows; and, secondly, that, whether this is so or not, the defendants cannot erect a hoarding so as to prevent his becoming entitled by prescription, because they are by the relevant Acts of Parliament forbidden to erect any building, temporary or movable, except for the purpose of enlarging the church. A hoarding erected for the purpose of preventing the acquisition of a prescriptive right to light is, he says, a building.

The defendants have raised the contention that the plaintiff cannot maintain the action without the concurrence of the Attorney-General. This contention, to my mind, cannot succeed. The plaintiff is suing either in respect of an alleged right to the free access of light to his windows over the open space, or in respect of a public right to have the space maintained as open and without the erection of a hoarding, which he calls a building. In the former case he is suing upon an alleged private right; there is no public right of access of light to private property. In the latter he is suing in respect of an interference with a public right from which he personally sustains special damage. In either case he can sue without joining the Attorney-General. The public are not the owners of the lights overlooking the space, and there is no public right to access of light to any such windows. The public right is to have the open space so kept as to allow the enjoyment by the public of the space in an open condition, free from buildings. That right the plaintiff is entitled to as a member of the public, but any right of access of light to the windows of his property is not a public right. It is not a right which any member of the public enjoys in common with himself. If, therefore, he claims upon the footing that he has a right to the access of light to his windows, he is suing in respect of a private, and not a public right, and the Attorney-General is not a necessary party. Further, if he is suing in respect of his right as a member of the public to say no building shall be put on the land, and this hoarding is a building, then he would be suing in respect of a public right, and the Attorney-General would be a necessary party, but for this fact—that the plaintiff personally upon this hypothesis suffers special damage from the breach of a public right, and if he do so suffer then he can sue without joining the Attorney-General. A plaintiff can, as it seems to me, sue without joining the Attorney-General in two cases; first, where the interference with the public right is such as that some private right of his is at the same time interfered with—as e.g., where an obstruction is so placed in a highway that the owner of premises abutting upon the highway is specially affected by reason that the obstruction interferes with his private right to access from and to his premises to and from the highway; and secondly, where no private right is interfered with, but the plaintiff, in respect of his public right, suffers special damage peculiar to himself from the interference with the public right. The former proposition I think is to be deduced from Lyon v. Fishmongers' Company, and Fritz v. Hobson, 28 W. R. 459, 722, 14 Ch. D. 542, and was one which I had to consider in Chaplin v. Mayor of Westminster, 49 W. R. [1901] 2 Ch. 329; while the latter is to be found in Iveson v. Moore, 1 Ld. Raym. 486; Hart v. Bassett, 4 Viner's Abridgment, 519; Benjamin v. Storr, 22 W. R. 631, L. R. 9 C. P. 400; and Winterbottom v. Lord Derby.

I think, therefore, that the action is well constituted, and I pass on to consider whether the plaintiff has the right which he claims. At the outset it would seem to be an extraordinary proposition that, because an open space is devoted to the public enjoyment in an open condition, free from buildings, for exercise and recreation (see Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1877, s. 1; Act of 1881, s. 5), the result should be to give immediately, or by the unavoidable operation of the Prescription Act to the circumjacent owners, as matter of right, an easement of light which theretofore they had not enjoyed. I may point to one case in which such a construction certainly is not admissible. A disused burial ground which is so dealt with as to become an open space under these Acts may nevertheless be used for the purpose of enlarging a church, chapel, meeting-house, or other place of worship (see the Act of 1884, s. 3). If the plaintiff's proposition were true, the owner of the adjoining land would, after the Prescription Act had run, become (without any power on the part of the owners of the open space to prevent his becoming) entitled to rights of light over the open space which might prevent the subsequent erection of such an enlargement as that Act allows. The proposition for which the plaintiff contends is evolved from the premises that because the space is to be an open space, therefore there must be free passage of light over it to the windows of houses built on the adjacent land. This begs the question and assumes that a hoarding cannot be erected. The Acts do not contemplate the statutory creation of any such consequential rights in the neighbouring owners. The space is to be open for the public purposes for which it is to be enjoyed—that is, for exercise and recreation. It is not to be open so as to create rights in favour of adjoining landowners. The statute is not dealing with the creation of easements or the creation of any right other than a right in the public to enjoy the space as an open space for the purposes indicated in the Acts. As an adventitous advantage the owner of the adjoining land would, no doubt, in most cases in fact obtain the benefit of air and light. But he is not, I think, entitled to it as a matter of right. The rights created are public rights. There is no public right to have free access of light to windows on the land surrounding the open space, or any part of it. The plaintiff's contention really is that he has that right which would be a private right because there is another and a different public right. But then the plaintiff says, "Assume by virtue of the statute I do not immediately acquire an easement, still as a member of the public I have a right to insist that no building shall be put upon the open space, and if no building" (which he says includes a hoarding for the purpose of preventing a prescriptive right) "is put up I shall under the Prescription Act get a right in time, and the effect of the Acts is that matters must be so left as that I shall acquire that right." This argument is rested upon a contention that a hoarding put up for the purpose of preventing the plaintiff prescribing under the Prescription Act is a building. Several cases have been referred to as to whether a hoarding is a building. In Pocock v. Gilham and Wood v. Cooper it was held that a hoarding or a screen was, and in Slaughter v. Mayor of Sunderland, Wilson v. Queen's Club, and Foster v. Fraser that it was not, a building. From these cases I can derive no principle other than this—that a hoarding may or may not, according to the context, be a building. If the building spoken of be one which it is contemplated shall have a stuccoed front and a slate roof (Foster v. Fraser) or a building to be erected under a building lease (Wilson v. Queen's Club) a hoarding will not be a building. If the question arises under a lessee's covenant not to put up a building, and he does put up a hoarding which affects the adjoining occupier (Pocock v. Gilham and Wood v. Cooper) it may be a building. What I have to consider is whether such a hoarding as the defendants would put up to prevent the plaintiff from acquiring prescriptive rights would be a building within the Acts with which I have to deal. In my opinion it is not so. It would be an erection, not put up for any purpose of building, but as a necessary act to prevent the acquisition of a prescriptive right. The word in section 5 of the Act of 1881 occurs in the connection that the land is to be enjoyed "in an open condition free from buildings." I think this means such buildings as would preclude or diminish its enjoyment in an open condition for exercise and recreation (Act of 1877, s. 1). In section 3 of the Act of 1884 the erection of any buildings upon a disused burial ground is forbidden except for the purpose of enlarging a church. I think the word "buildings" there means erections which would cover some part of the ground, as the enlargement of a church would do. It does not refer to something in the nature of a fence or barrier to prevent the acquisition of prescriptive rights to light. Upon these grounds I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has not by virtue of the Acts acquired such an easement as he seeks to enjoy, and that the defendants are not by the Acts precluded from erecting such a hoarding as is necessary to prevent him from obtaining the benefit of the Prescription Act.

*Practice—Sequestration—*Chose in action—Banker—Customer—Dealings with customer's account after notice of writ of sequestration against customer.

Mere notice of a writ of sequestration does not bind a chose in action in the hands of a third party.

A defendant in an administration action was ordered to pay a sum of £136 odd into court to the credit of the action. Failing to do so, a writ of sequestration was issued against him on the 20th of May, 1902. The sequestrators attended at the defendant's bank on the same day and gave notice of the writ, and demanded payment to themselves of the amount (which consisted of £204 odd) standing to defendant's credit at that date. The bank undertook not to deal with defendant's account pending consultation with their solicitors. Notwithstanding the undertaking, the defendant was permitted to draw on his account, and on the 22nd of May his balance was reduced to £137 odd. On the 22nd of May the sequestrators gave formal notice in writing of the writ to the bank, and took out a summons asking that the bank might be ordered to pay to them the amount standing to the defendant's credit in the books of the bank on the 20th of May, 1902.

Held, that an order could not be made for the full sum of £204 standing to defendant's credit at the bank on the 20th of May, but an order was made, without costs, for the amount standing to defendant's credit at the bank on the 22nd of May, 1902.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by the plaintiffs asking that the London and County Banking Co. (Limited) might be ordered to pay to the sequestrators, acting under a sequestration order issued in the action against the defendant H. E. Pollard, the amount standing to the credit of the defendant in the books of the bank on the 20th of May, 1902.

The action was instituted against the defendant, who was a legatee and executor under the will of Mrs. Jane Pollard, to recover a sum of money due from him to the testatrix, and for administration of her estate, and the defendant was ordered to pay into court to the credit of the action the sum of £136 3s.

The defendant failed to comply with this order, and on the 20th of May, 1902, a writ of sequestration was issued against him, directing the sequestrators to collect, receive, and sequester all his goods, chattels, and personal estate whatsoever, and to detain and keep the same under sequestration until the defendant should lodge in court the sum of £136 3s., and clear his contempt.

The sequestrators, on the same day, attended on the managers of the Covent-garden branch of the London and County Banking Co. (Limited), where the defendant kept an account, and gave notice of the writ and demanded payment of the amount standing to the defendant's credit in the books of the bank. It was admitted that, on that date, there was a sum of £204 7s. 8d. standing to the defendant's credit.

The plaintiffs alleged that the bank manager undertook not to allow the defendant to deal with his account, and to communicate with the solicitors of the plaintiffs and the sequestrators when he had consulted the bank's solicitors.

It appeared that, notwithstanding the bank manager's undertaking, the bank had subsequently honoured cheques drawn by the defendant, and on the 22nd of May the defendant's balance at the bank amounted only to £137 7s. 5d.

On the 22nd of May the sequestrators served a formal written notice on the bank manager and took out the present summons asking that the bank might be ordered to pay to the sequestrators the amount standing to the defendant's credit in their books on the 20th of May, 1902.

Hughes, K.C., and G. N. Marcy, for the plaintiffs, contended that the bank was not justified in paying any more money to the defendant after receiving notice of the sequestration without giving the sequestrators a reasonable opportunity of applying for an order against them; and they referred to Wilson v. Metcalfe, 1 Beav. 263; Miller v. Huddlestone, 31 W. R. 138, 22 Ch. D. 233; Ward v. Booth, 20 W. R. 880, L. R. 14 Eq. 195; Ex parte Nelson, 28 W. R. 554, 14 Ch. D. 41.

F. H. Maugham, for the bank, was not called upon, except as regards costs.

JOYCE, J., said that he did not see his way to make an order with respect to the larger sum of £204 7s. 5d. It was stated in the text-books that mere notice of a writ of sequestration did not bind a chose in action in the hands of a third party, and his lordship thought that the authorities bore out that proposition. No case had been cited in which it had been held that mere notice of sequestration was sufficient to bind a chose in action, and certainly it did not create a charge. He was very far, however, from approving the conduct of the bank, although they might be right in law. Upon the evidence he did not think that they ought to have paid their customer without giving the sequestrators an opportunity of opposing that course of action. The order would accordingly be made for payment by the bank of the money standing to the defendant's credit on the 22nd of May only, but without costs, and without prejudice to any other action which the sequestrators might take.

Adulteration — Milk — Inspector — Sample taken by inspector at a place outside his district—Certificate given by analyst of inspector's district—Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 12, 13, 21; and 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 3.

By the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, it was necessary that there should have been a sale or a contemplated sale of the milk of which samples were taken by an inspector under the Act within his district, and he was only authorized to take samples at the place of sale.

By section 3 of the subsequent Act of 1879 an inspector was authorized "to procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser or consignee in pursuance of any contract for the sale to such purchaser or consignee of such milk."

Held, that the magistrate was right in refusing to convict the respondent of selling milk found on analysis to contain 21 per cent. of added water, on the ground that the sample had been taken compulsorily by the inspector at a place outside his district, and that in doing so he had acted beyond his powers.

Case stated by Mr. d'Eyncourt, a metropolitan magistrate, sitting at Clerkenwell.

An information was preferred by the appellant McNair, under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879, against the respondent Cave, charging the respondent with an offence under section 6 of the Act of 1875—namely, the sale of milk not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded.

On the hearing of the information the following facts were admitted or proved: The appellant was a sanitary inspector appointed for the City of Westminster, and the respondent was a farmer of Shottle Belper, Derbyshire. A contract was entered into between the respondent and Messrs. Pryce & Harris, dairymen, of Craven-yard, Westminster, whereby the respondent agreed to deliver milk to them at St. Pancras Station.

The appellant, acting on instructions given him by the Westminster City Council, and in pursuance of section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, went to the St. Pancras Station of the Midland Railway Co., where the milk was delivered, and took without payment from the churns a sample of the milk supplied by the respondent.

The analyst for Westminster, to whom one-third of the sample was sent for analysis, certified that he was of opinion that the sample contained 79 per cent. of genuine milk of the poorest quality and 21 per cent. of added water.

For the respondent the admission of the certificate as evidence was objected to, and it was contended that the inspector of the City of Westminster had no power to procure a sample at St. Pancras, outside the district for which he was appointed, and that the analyst appointed for the City of Westminster had no power to analyze the sample and give a certificate that would be evidence, and that the place of delivery being in the borough of St. Pancras, and outside the City of Westminster, the proceedings and certificate were nugatory, the inspector and analyst being appointed only to act in respect of samples taken within the City of Westminster and have power to deal only with articles sold or procured within their own district, and that an inspector for the borough of St. Pancras was the proper person to procure the sample and the analyst for the borough of St. Pancras should have analyzed it.

The learned magistrate dismissed the information on these grounds, and the inspector appealed.

Horace Avory, K.C., and D. C. Bartley, for the appellant. — The question here is whether an inspector by reason of the increased powers given him by the Act of 1879 has power to take a sample outside his own district for the purpose of having it analyzed and taking proceedings under the Act. The offence was committed at St. Pancras, and the magistrate at Clerkenwell therefore had jurisdiction to deal with the case, if, as we say, the inspector for the City of Westminster could institute the proceedings. The only material question is whether the certificate of the analyst for Westminster was evidence on which he could act under section 21 of the Act of 1875. There is no limiting proviso in that section. These proceedings were taken under section 3 of the subsequent Act of 1879, and that section, read with section 13 of the earlier Act show that an inspector who takes the sample is bound to have it analyzed by an analyst of his own district. If, therefore, the inspector had power to take the sample, the magistrate must have convicted. All the provisions in the earlier Act need not necessarily be incorporated in the later, if to do so would prevent the operation of the later statute: Rouch v. Hall, 29 W. R. 304, 6 Q. B. D. 17.

Morton Smith, for the respondent.—No proceedings can be instituted by an inspector under the Act except the offence charged was committed within his district. Harris v. Williams, 6 Times L. R., 47, shows that only an inspector can take a sample. [He cited also Reg v. Smith, 44 W. R. 492, [1896] 1 Q. B. 596.] Under the earlier Act an inspector could not have taken a sample except in his own district and section 3 of the Act of 1879 does not extend the power of either an inspector or an analyst.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion this case is not free from difficulty, but the point we really have to decide is what are the extended powers given to inspectors by section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879. We have during the argument been referred to the previous legislation, and I think what we have been told may be summarized thus: Under the Act of 1875 the analysts were intended to act locally, and the inspectors were certainly intended to act locally, because it is expressly enacted that any person authorized to act in place of a person charged with a duty under the Act was to obtain first authority from his superior so to act. In other words, all the earlier legislation points to the local action of the inspectors and analysts. When our attention was first brought to section 13 of the Act of 1875 by Mr. Horace Avory, I thought his argument was sound that the inspector might act outside his district, because such an inspector was authorized to take the sample to the analyst of the district for which he acted, but I think that that section is also required for this purpose, that he was allowed to go to another analyst if there was no analyst for that place. It is not in dispute that section 3 of the Act of 1879 materially increased the powers of these inspectors. Under the earlier Act there must have been a sale or a contemplated sale, and the samples must have been taken at the place of sale. Now, by section 3 of the Act of 1879 the inspector is allowed to "procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser or consignee in pursuance of any contract for the sale of such purchaser or consignee of such milk." These words would clearly limit any improper action on the part of inspectors. Even if the intention of the Legislature was that inspectors should act in respect of milk that was going to be sold in their own district those words would limit their power to inspect any milk whatever. In my view section 3 was necessary in the case of inspectors acting within their own districts to get over the necessity of the milk being taken at the place of sale. Accordingly, the words "at the place of delivery, in the course of delivery to the purchaser" were necessary and desirable to enable the inspector of the district to take milk at any stage. If this particular point had been brought before the notice of the Legislature—namely, that it would have been desirable to deal with the common case of milk coming up by rail, where, as in this case, delivery was made at the railway station, and then going to be used in some other part of London—it would possibly have been provided for. But I think, in view of the previous legislation and the obligation which previously existed on the inspectors to act locally, that if it had been intended to give the inspectors of one district power to take samples compulsorily in another district, different language would have been used. The mere use of the words "place of delivery" in section 3, read with the context, clearly does not give power to the inspectors to go to any place of delivery under the contract whether it is in their district or not. The conclusion I have come to is that the magistrate has come to a right decision, and that for him to have held otherwise there must have been in the Act some special language giving inspectors power to act compulsorily outside their own district. I do not think that the introduction of the words "place of delivery" is sufficient, as the object which the Legislature had for inserting those words was not to give the inspectors powers outside their own district, but for the reason I have already referred to.

Court of Appeal.

DU PASQUIER v. CADBURY, JONES, & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

County court—Practice—Costs—Action founded on tort—Detinue—Recovery of goods in specie—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.

Section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, does not apply to an action of detinue in which the goods claimed are recovered in specie.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order made by Bucknill, J., in chambers.

The action was brought by the executor of one Ferguson for the return of certain drawings which had been entrusted by Ferguson to the defendants as his agents, and for damages for their wrongful detention; and also for an account of all moneys received by the defendants as such agents for and on behalf of Ferguson, and payment of the amount found due.

The statement of claim alleged that Ferguson, who was an artist, had entrusted a number of drawings, over £100 in value, to the defendants for exhibition and sale as his agents, and that the defendants had illegally detained from the plaintiff and refused to return to him on demand the drawings, and that they had further refused to account to him for any sums of money received by them in respect of any sales of the drawings.

In the statement of defence the defendants admitted that they had received the drawings and had sold certain of them to the total amount of £33, but they denied the wrongful detention. Paragraph 3 of the defence was as follows: "The defendants have always been and still are ready and willing to return the remainder of the said drawings, and hereby offer to return the same forthwith on obtaining a proper receipt therefor." The defendants further alleged that they had a set-off or counterclaim against the claim of the plaintiff to the amount of £14 4s. 6d. for mounts and frames supplied by them for the drawings at the request of Ferguson, and they brought into court the sum of £18 15s. 6d. as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

In his reply the plaintiff said that he was willing to accept the sum of £33 in part satisfaction of the cause of action, and he accepted the sum of £18 15s. 6d. in part discharge thereof, but he denied the set-off or counterclaim for the sum of £14 4s. 6d.; and he accepted the offer of the defendants as set out in paragraph 3 of the defence to return the remainder of the drawings in satisfaction of the remainder of the cause of action.

The drawings were accordingly handed over to the plaintiff before the action came on for trial.

At the trial the defendants abandoned the set-off and counterclaim, and judgment was given for the plaintiff for £33 upon the claim with costs, and for the plaintiff upon the counterclaim with costs.

Upon taxation the master, holding that the action was "founded on tort" within section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, taxed the plaintiff's costs on the High Court scale, the value of the pictures being considerably over £20.

Upon appeal, Bucknill, J., in chambers, held that the action which was tried, and in which judgment was given, was an action founded on contract, and he referred the taxation back to the master to tax the plaintiff's costs on the county court scale.

Macoun, for the plaintiff. — This is an action "founded on tort" within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, in which the plaintiff recovered a sum exceeding £20. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to have his costs taxed on the High Court scale. The action as launched was an action of detinue—that is, an action founded on tort: Bryant v. Herbert, 26 W. R. 898, 3 C. P. D. 389; Turner v. Stallibrass, 46 W. R. 81, [1898] 1 Q. B. 56; Sachs v. Henderson, 50 W. R. 418, [1902] 1 K. B. 612. Secondly, the action does not come within section 116 at all, because the value of the drawings recovered and the £33 exceeded £50.

He referred to Solomon v. Mulliner, 49 W. R. 364, [1901] 1 K. B. 76. [COLLINS, M.R., referred to Keates v. Woodward, 50 W. R. 258, [1902] 1 K. B. 532.]

E. W. Hansell, for the defendants.—In order to see whether an action comes, as regards amount, within section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the time when the amount is adjudicated upon by the court is the material time to look at: Solomon v. Mulliner, 49 W.R., at p. 365, [1901] 1 Q. B., at p. 83. In the present case the plaintiff only recovered judgment for £33 on a claim for money had and received—that is, a claim founded on contract. The claim in detinue had been disposed of long before the trial, and formed no part of the judgment. Further, if the claim in detinue could be looked at for this purpose, the nature of the detinue must be considered. It is not every detinue which gives rise to an action of tort. In Corbett v. Packington, 6 B & C. 268, a count stated that the plaintiff had delivered certain animals to the defendant to be taken care of by him for reward, and in consideration thereof the defendant undertook and agreed to take care of them and to re-deliver them to the plaintiff on request, and that the defendant, though requested to do so, did not re-deliver them to the plaintiff. The court held that the count stated a promise to do something beyond the common law duty—namely, a promise to re-deliver them to the plaintiff, and that therefore it was a count in assumpsit, and could not be joined with a count in tort. In the present case the statement of the cause of action is very similar, alleging a refusal to return the drawings on demand. It is not an action founded on tort, but on a promise to return the drawings on demand. The order of the learned judge was therefore right.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal must be allowed. Upon either of two views the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. In the first place the plaintiff sued in tort to recover more than £20. The action was "founded on tort," because the plaintiff claimed the return of certain drawings which had been entrusted by a Mr. Ferguson, whose executor the plaintiff is, to the defendants as his agents, and for damages for their wrongful detention. That was clearly an action founded on tort, though no doubt the plaintiff went on to claim an account of all moneys received as such agents for Ferguson, and payment of the amount found due. To those claims the defendants pleaded, and in their statement of defence they offered to return the drawings, an offer which the plaintiff in his reply accepted. It seems to me that the plaintiff has, by the exigency of the action, recovered the drawings as effectively as if he had obtained judgment for their return. It is conceded that the value of the drawings exceed £20. Upon that ground I am of opinion that the plaintiff is right. It is not competent for the defendants to say that if the action had gone on to trial they could have proved a special contract by them to return the drawings, and that the plaintiff is suing for breach of that contract and not upon the common law duty of the defendants. The plaintiff, as appears by the writ and the statement of claim, was clearly suing in respect of a tort—namely, the wrongful detention of the drawings.

There is also another ground upon which the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. That ground is based upon the decision of this court in Keates v. Woodward. The plaintiff has by the exigency of the action recovered the drawings, and he would no doubt have been entitled as well to nominal damages for their detention. In Keates v. Woodward the action was for damages for trespass to land and for an injunction, and the plaintiff recovered nominal damages and obtained an injunction. We held that, as the injunction was the main part of the relief sought, the action was not of that class which came within section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. In that case we approved and followed a decision in Ireland—Bradley v. Archibald, [1899] 2 Ir. R. 108—which decided that, for the purposes of an order of the Supreme Court in Ireland relating to costs somewhat similar to section 116 of the Act of 1888, in an action of detinue, where the goods claimed are recovered in specie, though the damages for their detention may be nominal, the order as to costs does not apply. In that case the action was brought in detinue to recover certain promissory notes and damages for their detention. At the trial the defendants handed over the notes to the plaintiff, and the jury assessed the damages at £4, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff for £4 with costs. The court stated that the plaintiff had substantially recovered the notes in the action, and that they must judge the question of costs as if there had been judgment for the plaintiff for the recovery of the notes, or a nominal sum for their value—there being no finding of the jury as to their value—with £4 damages for their detention. They held that the rule as to costs had no application to such a case. That case is exactly in point. If I am right in saying that the drawings in the present case were recovered by the exigency of the action, the case does not come within section 116 at all. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

READ v. FRIENDLY SOCIETY OF OPERATIVE STONEMASONS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Trade union — Inducing breach of contract — Illegal means—Bona fides.

By an indenture of apprenticeship a firm of stonemasons contracted to teach the plaintiff, who was twenty-five years of age, the trade of a mason. By becoming parties to the rules of the defendant trade union the firm had contracted not to take apprentices over sixteen years of age. In order to compel the firm to comply with this latter contract the defendants threatened to withdraw the workmen employed by the firm if the plaintiff was taught the trade of a mason; and in consequence of this the firm broke their contract with the plaintiff.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action against the defendants, for the defendants had knowingly and for their own ends procured the commission of an actionable wrong, and had procured it by the use of illegal means, and it was immaterial that they seemed to have acted in good faith and in the best interests of their society.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (50 W. R. 619, [1902] 2 K. B. 88) varied.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.) on the hearing of an appeal from a judgment of the judge of the Ipswich County Court: 50 W. R. 619, [1902] 2 K. B. 88.

The action was brought for wrongfully and maliciously procuring to be broken an indenture of apprenticeship made between the plaintiff of the one part and the firm of Wigg & Wright, stonemasons, of the other part, and for maliciously conspiring to procure the indenture to be broken. The plaintiff claimed damages and an injunction.

The deed of apprenticeship was entered into on the 11th of August, 1900, at which date the plaintiff, who was the son of a mason, was twenty-five years of age, and by it he covenanted to serve Wigg & Wright as an apprentice for three years at 15*s* a week, which were ordinary labourer's wages, and they covenanted to teach him the trade of a stonemason.

The plaintiff had previously been employed by Wigg & Wright as a labourer.

The defendant society was a trade union, of which all the masons employed by Wigg & Wright were members. The plaintiff, however, was not a member of the society. The other defendants were certain officers of the society.

Wigg & Wright were parties to the working rules of the trade union, and had signed them.

Rule 6 of the working rules was as follows: "Apprentices.—That boys entering the trade shall not work more than three months without being legally bound apprentice, and in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons. Employers to have one apprentice to every four masons on an average."

The plaintiff, in pursuance of the terms of the indenture, commenced to serve Wigg & Wright as an apprentice. They were employing four masons, and had one apprentice besides the plaintiff.

At a meeting of the defendant society on the 13th of August, 1900, it was resolved that, if the plaintiff started work for Wigg & Wright as a mason, one of their employees was to report the fact in two hours. Owing to the action of the defendant society from the 13th of August, 1900, to the 20th of May, 1901, Wigg & Wright did not employ the plaintiff as a stonemason or teach him the trade, but he continued to do labourer's work.

On the 20th of May, 1901, the following letter was written by Wigg & Wright to the secretary of the defendant society: "Dear Sir,—As it appears we have inadvertently taken an apprentice contrary to the rules of your society (for which we are very sorry) we should be glad to give an explanation of how it occurred, as we had no intention whatever of infringing the rules. We had taken an apprentice before on the same condition, with the exception of age, and note the rule says, 'And in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons.' Now this seems to us to entirely do away with limit of age providing they are masons' sons. What else can it mean? The fact seems to be this rule wants revising and making plainer, so that there could be no mistakes in future. When Mr. Read spoke to me about taking his son as an apprentice I told him we were not entitled to take another apprentice, but he said, 'Oh, yes, you can take him, being a mason's son.' Now, this coming from a member of the society, we took it to be the meaning of the rule, and we never heard a word to the contrary. If we had, we should certainly not have taken this one. Well, now he has been bound just a year. We don't know if we are legally bound to keep him, being over age, and we should not be at all sorry to get rid of him, although we should wish to behave honourably in the matter, and it seems to us the best way out of the difficulty would be to let him finish his time out, and we hope you will be able to view the matter in the same light, as we should be exceedingly sorry that there should be any unpleasantness between us and the society."

On the 22nd of May, the secretary of the defendant society wrote the following reply to Wigg & Wright: "Dear Sirs,—Your letter of the 20th was laid before the members of my society on that date, and I am instructed to inform you that you have misunderstood the meaning of the rule. It admits of a mason's son learning the trade without being bound apprentice; but we cannot understand a man twenty-five or twenty-six years of age claiming that right, nor an employer who would take him without first consulting us. Had you done so, we should have expressed our intention in the matter at once plainly. As the matter stands, we regret your firm has placed itself in a difficult position; but my members consider your action a direct infringement of the rule; and if the man in question starts working at the trade, we are bound to protest against you for introducing an individual not of the trade; and in accordance with our general rule we have empowered our members working for your firm to take prompt action in the matter. We regret the thing has occurred, but we feel that the blame does not rest with us in any way."

Certain interrogatories were administered on behalf of the plaintiff for the examination of the defendants, which were answered by the defendants' secretary. The answers to interrogatories 4 and 8 were as follows: "(4) (a) At a meeting held on the 21st of May, 1900, summoned for ordinary quarterly business, it was reported to the meeting that there was a man working at Messrs. Wigg & Wright's, named Mr. Read, bringing a mallet and tools, stating that he was going to be an apprentice, but he was still working as a labourer; but if he should start at the banker (it was noted on the minutes that) Brother Turner had a right to report the same. (b) At an ordinary fortnightly meeting held on the 13th of August, 1900, it was reported that Mr. Read had been made an apprentice, but he had not started masonry. It was resolved that if he started work two hours' notice should be given to Messrs. Wigg & Wright by members working there. (c) At an ordinary quarterly meeting held on the 20th of May, 1901, it was resolved that the secretary write to Messrs. Wigg & Wright respecting L. Read entering the trade, his age being twenty-five years. (d) The fortnightly meeting held on the 29th of July, 1901, was specially summoned in consequence of J. Read" (the father of the plaintiff) "writing his intention of visiting the meeting. Resolutions were passed as follows: 'That J. Read be admitted to the lodge on his consenting to be duly read in as a member. That J. Read be allowed fifteen minutes to state his case of complaint re his son. That after hearing the explanation and arguments of Brother Read this society does not see any reason to recede from the position taken up by the society in the letter, dated the 22nd of May, sent to Messrs. Wigg & Wright.' Carried, all present voted for, except J. Read. The meetings were held at the Friar's Head Inn, Ipswich; but I am unable to specify the names of all those who were present." "(8) The prompt action referred to in my letter, referred to in paragraph 2, was that the masons in Messrs. Wigg & Wright's employ should give two hours' notice and leave Messrs. Wigg & Wright's employ if they thought fit."

In consequence of the action taken by the defendants the plaintiff was never taught the trade of a mason.

The county court judge held that the facts as proved or admitted before him fell short of giving any ground of action against the defendants; that the defendants seemed to have acted bonâ fide in the interest of the Society of Masons, and were not in any way actuated by improper motives; that the defendants gave a certain interpretation to rule 6 and acted upon it; and though their interpretation might or might not be correct, yet, as it was honestly held, he did not consider they had acted improperly in their method of enforcing it. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants. On the appeal of the plaintiff the Divisional Court reversed the decision of the county court judge, and ordered a new trial, Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., being of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. The defendants appealed, and the plaintiff brought a cross-appeal, asking that judgment might be entered for him

Cohen, K.C., and Chester Jones, for the defendants.

F. Low, K.C., and Henlé, for the plaintiff.

Nov. 4.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal by the defendants from the decision of the Divisional Court ordering a new trial of a case decided by a county court judge in favour of the defendants. There is a cross-appeal by the plaintiff asking that this court should give judgment for the plaintiff with damages. The court below, while agreed that the decision was unsatisfactory, were divided as to the relief, Darling and Channell, JJ., holding that there ought to be a new trial, while the Lord Chief Justice was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. The parties agreed before them and before us that if judgment were given for the plaintiff the court should assess the damages.

The facts are stated in the judgments as reported below, and I need do no more than summarize them for the purpose of this judgment. The claim was for £50 damages for wrongfully and maliciously inducing Messrs. Wigg & Wright to break their contract of apprenticeship with the plaintiff. The evidence for the plaintiff was that he had become bound by an indenture of apprenticeship to Messrs. Wigg & Wright, stonemasons, of Ipswich, whereby they undertook to teach him the trade of a mason, paying him wages of 15s. a week during a period of three years. Messrs. Wigg & Wright had in their capacity as masters agreed to certain working rules with the defendant society, one of which (6) was as follows: "That boys entering the trade shall not work more than three months without being legally bound apprentice, and in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons. Employers to have one apprentice to every four masons on an average." The plaintiff's father was a mason. The plaintiff was not a member of the society, and was twenty-five years of age when he entered into the indenture of apprenticeship. The defendant society in concert with the other defendants, on becoming aware that the plaintiff had been taken as an apprentice by Messrs. Wigg & Wright, took steps to enforce compliance by them with rule 6 as interpreted by the defendants by threatening in the language of their letter of the 22nd of May: "If the man in question (the plaintiff) starts working at the trade, we are bound to protest against you for introducing an individual not of the trade, and in accordance with our general rule we have empowered our members working for your firm to take prompt action in the matter. We regret the thing has occurred, but we feel that the blame does not rest on us in any way." This was in effect a threat that they would call out the workmen in Messrs. Wigg & Wright's employ, all of whom were members of the defendant society, and, as was explained by counsel, if so empowered, would be supported while off work out of the funds of the society. Messrs. Wigg & Wright disputed the construction placed by the defendants on rule 6, contending, and as I think rightly, that it did not extend to masons' son. Feeling, however, that they could not resist the coercion brought to bear on them, they dismissed the plaintiff. It was not suggested before us that the acts complained of were not all done by the defendants in concert. The plaintiff has therefore lost the opportunity, which he was lawfully entitled to, of emerging from the position of a labourer at 15s. a week to that of a mason who may earn up to 35s., and he has brought his action accordingly. No evidence was called for the defendants, and no proof given of assent by Messrs. Wigg & Wright to any rules other than those put in, of which rule 6 is one.

On these facts the learned county court judge held as follows: "I hold that the facts as proved and admitted before me fall short of giving any ground of action against the defendants. The defendants seem to me to have acted bonâ fide in the best interests of the Society of Masons, and not to have been in any way actuated by any improper motives. They gave a certain interpretation to rule 6 and acted upon it, and though their interpretation may or may not be correct, yet, as it was honestly held, I do not consider they have acted improperly in their method of enforcing it."

On these facts the case seems to me to be clear. The plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the contract which he had made, and that benefit he would have continued to enjoy but for the intervention of the defendants. The object of the defendants' intervention was to deprive him of that benefit. The facts leave no room for doubt as to that. He was not a member of their society, and was under no obligation, legal or moral, to conform to their rules. In these circumstances they conspired to enforce by threats of a formidable character, which they had the means of carrying into effect, a breach by his employers and instructors of the contract which the latter had made with him; and the only justification they can suggest for this conduct is that Messrs. Wigg & Wright had come under an obligation to them, not perhaps legally enforceable, if not illegal, not to make such a contract as they had made with the plaintiff. But the justification to be of any avail must cover their whole conduct, the means they used as well as the end they had in view. As against Messrs. Wigg & Wright they had whatever rights within the law the rules assented to by Messrs. Wigg & Wright afforded them. But to combine to coerce them, by threats of the character I have described, to break their contract with the plaintiff was in my judgment an illegal act carried out by illegal means. They cannot be in a better position if the rules are unenforceable than they would have been had a breach of them given them a legal cause of action. But in such case how can they possibly justify taking the law into their own hands and compelling the opposing litigant by coercion to give effect to their view of a disputed obligation by breaking his contract with the plaintiff? Further, does not such conduct demonstrate that their object was to defeat the plaintiff's purpose of becoming a mason? Belief, however honest, that in what they did they were acting in the best interest of the Society of Masons could be no excuse for conspiring to deprive the plaintiff of the advantages of his contract. Persuasion by an individual for the purpose of depriving another person of the benefit of a contract, if it is effectual in bringing about a breach of the contract to the damage of the person, gives a cause of action (Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 E. & B. 216); and a strong belief on the part of the persuader that he is acting for his own interests does not seem to me improve his position in any respect. Still less can it do so when he does not confine himself to persuasion, but joins with others to enforce their common interests at the plaintiff's expense by coercion. "That a conspiracy to injure—an oppressive combination—differs widely from an invasion of civil rights by a single individual cannot be doubted": see per Lord Macnaghten in Quinn v. Leathem, 50 W. R. 139, [1901] A. C. 495; see also per Lord Brampton, in the same case. It seems to me, therefore, that this case stands wholly outside the debatable ground traversed in the discussion of Allen v. Flood, 46 W. R. 258, [1898] A. C. 1. The action of the defendants was as clearly malicious, or, if the phrase be preferred, "without just cause or excuse," as in Lumley v. Gye which as well as Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 565, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, has been finally established in Quinn v. Leathem to be a binding authority. "There are," says Lord Watson in Allen v. Flood, "in my opinion, two grounds only on which a person who procures the act of another can be made legally responsible for its consequences. In the first place, he will incur liability if he knowingly and for his own ends induces the other person to commit an actionable wrong. In the second place, when the act induced is within the right of the immediate actor, and is therefore not wrong as far as he is concerned, it may yet be to the detriment of a third party; and in that case, according to the law laid down by the majority in Lumley v. Gye, the inducer may be held liable if he can be shown to have procured his object by the use of illegal means." This passage is approved by Lord Macnaghten and cited by him as embodying the opinion of the majority in that case. The present case inevitably falls under one or other of those propositions, and I think within both. The defendants did knowingly and for their own ends induce the commission of an actionable wrong, and they employed illegal means to bring it about. Such conduct would be actionable in an individual and incapable of justification, a fortiori where the defendants acted in concert. These considerations seem to me to exclude from discussion in this case the illustrations given in argument of what might in given circumstances be "just cause," or, in other words, suffice to negative malice. There was no relation between the defendants and either of the parties in this case at all analogous to those existing in the instances put of father and child or doctor and patient, which I leave for solution when the case arises. The defendants have no higher immunity from legal obligations than any other members of the community, and if they have legal rights they can enforce them by legal means only. It is not at all necessary in this case to embark upon the question whether "without just cause" is a complete equivalent for what was meant in the common law by malice. I am inclined to think that, though in many cases adequate as a description, it is not co-extensive with it, nor do I think that in civil actions any more than in criminal it will be possible to eliminate motives from the discussion: see the weighty observations of Lord Brampton on this point in Quinn v. Leathem. It is, however, very desirable to guard against the notion that if the act done be illegal "just cause" may still be averred to purge the wrong. For instance, where illegal means have been used to bring about the breach of a contract to the detriment of a party thereto, "just cause" cannot come into the discussion at all. The use of illegal means evidenced malice, and in this connection malice was not equivalent to "without just cause." The cause of intervention might be just, but the means used to enforce it might be illegal. The common law action threw the burden of proof on the plaintiff. It was not enough for him to show that the defendant had brought about the breach of a contract between a third party and the plaintiff. He had to show that it was done maliciously, and the burden of proving malice lay upon him. It was not a case of a primâ facie cause of action based on the fact that a breach of contract had been brought about to the detriment of the plaintiff, party thereto, by a stranger to the contract. The common law did not lightly extend rights arising out of contracts to and against persons not parties thereto, owing to the absence of privity: see the cases collected in the notes to Pasley v. Freeman, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 64. Some nexus had to be established between the plaintiff and the stranger, and this was found in malice. Unless the plaintiff could show this, he failed to bring the stranger into such relations with him as to ground a cause of action, and therefore the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove a cause of action, not upon the defendant to justify. I think some confusion has crept into the discussions on this matter through want of sufficient regard to these elementary points. I think the materials before us are sufficient to enable us to enter judgment, and I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that the defendants' appeal should be dismissed and the plaintiff's cross-appeal allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £50.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: The evidence in this case establishes, in my opinion, that the defendants knowingly procured Messrs. Wigg & Wright to violate a contract which they had entered into with the plaintiff. In so doing the defendants acted without any improper motives; but I take the law to be as stated by Lord Macnaghten—"A violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and . . . it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognised by law, if there be no sufficient justification for the interference": Quinn v. Leathem. This proposition was not seriously questioned in argument, but it was contended on behalf of the defendants that there was a sufficient justification for their interference, because Messrs. Wigg & Wright had, previously to the contract with the plaintiff, entered into a contract with them, the defendants, which is said to be inconsistent with the contract between Messrs. Wigg & Wright and the plaintiff. Some difficulty appears to have arisen in the Divisional Court as to what the terms of this contract were; but at the hearing before us counsel on both sides agreed and invited us to decide the case on the footing that the terms of this contract are contained in a printed document put in evidence which purports to be "working rules agreed to and signed by the employers and the operative stonemasons of Ipswich and district," and to have been signed by (amongst others) Wigg & Wright, as employers, and the president and other officers of the defendant society. It was contended in argument that this agreement was illegal as being in restraint of trade. As at present advised, I am not satisfied that this is so; but in the view which I take it is unnecessary to decide the point, and I shall assume for the purpose of the present judgment that the agreement between Wigg & Wright and the defendants was in all respects valid and binding. The particular clause relied on is rule 6: "That boys entering the trade shall not work more than three months without being legally bound apprentice, and in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons." This I refer to as the first part of the rule. It proceeds: "Employers to have one apprentice to every four masons on an average." This I refer to as the second part of the rule. It is contended on behalf of the defendants that the first part of the rule prohibits employers from taking apprentices over sixteen years of age; and if this were the true construction of the rule, and it were applicable to persons in the position of the plaintiff, there would be, to say the least, a serious question whether the justification set up by the defendants was not made out. But whatever the true construction of this part of the rule may be, it does not, in my opinion, apply to the plaintiff. He was a mason's son, and by the terms of this part of the rule mason's sons are exempted from the operation of this part of it. As regards the second part, it is not well expressed; but it may be read as prohibiting employers from having more than one apprentice to every four masons. If this be the true meaning, Wigg & Wright violated it. It is not every violation of these rules which would justify the defendants in what they did. It appears to be plain from the letter, the 22nd of May, 1901, that the defendants' ground of complaint against Wigg & Wright was not that they had two apprentices when they ought to have had only one, but that they had taken the plaintiff as an apprentice when his age was between twenty-five and twenty-six. The objection that Messrs. Wigg & Wright had more than the proper number of apprentices might have been got over if they had entered into some arrangement by which the services of the other apprentice were transferred to another master. But the letter shows plainly that the defendants would not have been satisfied so long as the plaintiff was allowed to work at the trade. I think that the object of the defendants, as shown by that letter, was to prevent Messrs. Wigg & Wright from giving the plaintiff the benefit of his contract with them, and I find nothing in the rules which entitled them to insist on that. It was said, however, that the defendants acted in good faith and honestly believed that the true construction of the rules was different from that which it appears to me to be. But, in the absence of fraud, good faith is not of itself a sufficient defence to an action founded on tort, though it may in some cases be an essential element of such a defence. If an action is brought for a trespass to land and the defendant justifies under an alleged right of way, judgment must go against him if he fails to establish the right, however honest he may have believed in its existence. If an action is brought for the publication of defamatory matter and the defendant sets up that it was published on a privileged occasion, he will fail in his defence unless the privilege is established, however clear his good faith may be. I do not think that the present defendants occupy a better position than a defendant setting up privilege in an action for libel or slander, and as they fail to establish the existence of the contract on which they rely, I think that they fail in their defence. I desire to express no opinion on the important question whether, if the contract had been such as they believed it to be, they would have been justified in point of law in doing what they did. For these reasons, which appear to agree in substance with those given by the Lord Chief Justice in the Divisional Court, I think that the decision of that court should be varied and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., said: I agree. The judgment of the Master of the Rolls, which I have carefully read and considered, so completely expresses my own views that I do not desire to add a word.

Bankruptcy—Notice—Judgment creditor—Security given to satisfaction of creditor—Right to issue second bankruptcy notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).

A creditor having obtained a judgment against a debtor issued a bankruptcy notice on it but subsequently entered into an agreement with the debtor by which the latter gave certain property by way of security, part of which property he was to be at liberty for a year from the date of the agreement, to repurchase. Six months after the agreement the creditor issued a second bankruptcy notice in respect of the debt against the debtor, on which a receiving order was made.

Held, that the creditor had no right to issue the second notice while the option to repurchase existed.

These were appeals (1) from a receiving order made by the registrar and (2) from his refusal to rescind it on an application made for that purpose.

The facts were as follows:

A creditor, in January, 1902, obtained a final judgment against a debtor in the King's Bench Division, and issued a bankruptcy notice against the debtor in respect of the judgment debt. The debtor was arrested under the process of the court, and thereupon an agreement in writing was entered into between the creditor and debtor, the terms of which were as follows: The debtor was to be released from custody on paying to the creditor £75 in cash, handing over a specified bill of exchange for £400, and transferring 4,000 £1 shares in a certain bank, with liberty to him to repurchase them on or before the 28th of January, 1903. The debtor also assigned his interests in the estates of two specified bankrupts. The assignment was expressed in the agreement to be by way of security and in part payment. The debtor wished to insert in the agreement a clause providing that all further proceedings should be stayed, but the creditor refused to agree to this, and the agreement in fact provided that the judgment was still to be in full force.

The bankruptcy notice was thereupon set aside by the court on the 29th of January, 1902.

In July, 1902, the creditor issued a second bankruptcy notice against the debtor in respect of part of the judgment debt, and this not having been complied with, a receiving order was made against the debtor, which the registrar refused to rescind.

The debtor appealed.

Mellor, for the appellant.—The second bankruptcy notice was wrongly issued. The debtor had complied with the first notice by giving security to the satisfaction of the creditor, and thereafter the creditor was not in a position to issue a fresh notice in respect of the debt while the debtor still had the option to repurchase the shares.

He referred to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4 (1) (g).

Muir Mackenzie and J. G. Joseph, for the creditor.—After the agreement the creditor was a duly secured creditor, and could exercise all his rights. [STIRLING, L.J.—Can you issue a bankruptcy notice after taking security?] The personal remedy remains. It is the same in principle as issuing a fi. fa. There was no stay within the meaning of the section; by the agreement the judgment was to remain in full force. The agreement clearly never meant that the security was to be security within the meaning of the section, it was merely security given in consideration of forbearances and did not take away the creditor's right to issue execution. Our refusing to insert the clause as to staying proceedings shows that this was the intention.

A reply was not called for.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Construing the agreement in the creditor's favour, and assuming all the facts in his favour, I still think he had no right to issue the second notice. [His lordship read section 4 (1) (g).] It must be admitted that such security was given after the first notice as made it impossible to take bankruptcy proceedings on it, because the security was given to the satisfaction of the creditor; but it is said that he could nevertheless issue a fresh bankruptcy notice the next day, and that this was the intention of the parties to the agreement. It is said that it was only intended that he should forbear to proceed with the first notice. I think that when one comes to look at the agreement it is clear that the intention of all parties was that there should be no proceedings by way of execution or of notice while the option to repurchase the shares remained, and that under these circumstances it was impossible for the creditor to issue a fresh bankruptcy notice till the debtor had made default in giving security or the option had expired, which it was not to do till the 28th of January, 1903. This seems to me the plain meaning of the agreement. Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Joseph urge against this view that the judgment was to be in full force; but this only means that the judgment was not to be merged or extinguished, so that if the security did not realize the amount of the debt the creditor could then put it in force. As to the clause which the creditor refused to insert with regard to his staying proceedings, its omission does not affect my opinion. The creditor had no power to issue the second notice, and the appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The creditor had recovered judgment against the debtor and properly issued a bankruptcy notice upon it. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] Then came the agreement, under which it is clear that the property was to be realized and not taken in specie in satisfaction of the debt; but the shares could not be realized till the expiry of the option to repurchase them. The giving of the security was a complete compliance with the first bankruptcy notice, and it was not within the power of the creditor, nor was it the intention of the parties, that a fresh notice should be issued while the security could not be realized.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., concurred.

[The court allowed the appeal from the receiving order with costs, but gave no costs of the appeal from the registrar's refusal to rescind it, on the ground that that application should not have been made. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was refused.]

Appeal allowed.

"THE SWINDON." (a.)

Ship—Loading coal—Trimming charges—Self-trimmer—Jurisdiction of Trimming Committee.

Held, that the Trimming Committee at Cardiff had jurisdiction to decide that a ship was a self-trimmer, and that their decision was final.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court of Admiralty dismissing an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Cardiff County Court, who had held that the defendants, the Swindon Steamship Co. (Limited) were liable to pay to the plaintiffs, Miller & Cory's Cape Verde Island (Limited), a sum of £66 7s. 1d., the expense of trimming a cargo of coal in the steamship Swindon at Cardiff, in April, 1900.

The Swindon was chartered by her owners, the defendants, to the plaintiffs, to load a cargo of coal for St. Vincent (C.V.) at a freight which was to be in full of trimming, and was to be trimmed by men appointed by the charterers at "the tariff rate of the port." The vessel was loaded with 5,791 tons of coal at Cardiff, and about 1,250 tons were trimmed. The case for the plaintiffs, who paid for the trimming, was that they were entitled to recover from the defendants the sum of £66 7s. 1d., the tariff rate of the port at 2¾d. a ton. The defendants' contention was that the vessel had been held by the trimming committee or board at Cardiff to be what is termed a self-trimmer, and that all they were bound to pay was £30 3s. 3d., which was at the rate of 1¼d. per ton as fixed by the board.

The county court judge held that on the evidence before him the vessel was not a self-trimmer and that the trimming committee had no jurisdiction to hold that she was. In his opinion somebody else must determine whether a vessel was a self-trimmer or not before the trimming committee could determine the rate to be paid.

The Divisional Court (Sir F. Jeune and Barnes, J.) on appeal upheld the view of the county court judge, and dismissed the appeal. "Whatever," they said, "might have been the result if such evidence (viz., as to construction) had been given we are of opinion that upon the evidence which was before the court in the present case the vessel has not been brought within that part of the tariff which relates to self-trimmers and that the ordinary rate contended for by the plaintiffs must be paid."

The defendants' appealed, contending that the trimming committee or conciliation board were competent to decide that the vessel was a self-trimmer, and that their decision was final.

Abel Thomas, K.C., and Montague Lush, K.C., for the appellants.

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Bailhache, for the respondents.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question arises from a dispute as to what rate should be paid to the trimmers of a certain vessel under the terms of a charter-party which provided that the cargo was to be trimmed at the tariff rate applicable to the port of Cardiff. Now it seems to me that that depends—and it is admitted to be the only question in this case—on whether what has been called the conciliation board in the port of Cardiff had jurisdiction to decide the question which they did decide. They did decide in respect of this vessel that a certain rate is applicable to it. The learned county court judge has come to the conclusion, and the Divisional Court has upheld his view, that the conciliation board has no jurisdiction to decide that question, and therefore it is sought to apply a scale other than that which the conciliation board had decided.

The question depends on what is the true construction of certain rules which have been adopted by agreement in the port of Cardiff, and what is the true construction of the agreement itself. They are all published in a little book which begins in this way:—"To Shipbrokers, Masters and Owners of Vessels. On and after the 15th day of December, 1890, the charges for trimming coal and coke on board sailing and steam vessels in the port of Cardiff will be in accordance with the following scales." Then follow a series of charges—first of all, as to the side bunkers; then, "cargoes tipped into the hold of 1-decked steamers," so many hatches, so much a ton; and then 1½-decked steamers, 2-decked steamers and so on, fixing the rate according to the hatchways in each case. Then comes the coke tariff, and afterwards a number of other provisions—vessels partly loaded, leaving off work, and finally on p. 7, "all work to recommence at 6 a.m. on Mondays," and special arrangement must be made for anything not provided for in the tariff. Well, apparently, in the first instance the tariff stopped there. Then comes another paragraph which is more material in this case. "It is hereby agreed by and between the undersigned representatives of the coal shippers, and of the Cardiff, Penarth, and Barry Coal Trimmers' Union that, supplemental to the terms of the tariff arranged and bearing date the 15th of December, 1890, in respect of steamers denominated 'self-trimmers,' the rates shown on attached schedule, being those now paid, shall apply to steamers already known as frequenting the port, and that such steamers shall be classified according to the rates paid into groups, and any new steamers or boats not included in this list, but which may be of the same type as regards the work involved in trimming shall be included in the corresponding group." Up to that point there is a provision that rests exactly on the same foundation as the earlier provisions as to decks and hatchways, and so on—a provision dealing with steamers denominated self-trimmers, contemplating that there are certain vessels of that class which have been recognized as frequenting the port, and providing for their being classified, and following up with a list of them. But there is also a provision for new steamers which are not known as frequenting the port as self-trimmers, but as to which questions may arise afterwards. "Any new steamers or boats not included in this list, but which may be of the same type as regards the work involved in trimming." These are very large words, leaving a good deal of latitude for experts to decide whether, having regard to their mechanism and so on, and the work involved in trimming, they do or do not come within what can be fairly described as self-trimmers, and these are the steamers that are being included in the corresponding group. It seems obvious it is a matter that must necessarily involve some discussion, and it may be some difference of opinion, as to what the particular group ought to be, what the class ought to be, and what the tariff ought to be applicable to such steamers. As you would expect, they then go on to provide in the first paragraph: "In the event of any question arising as to the proper classification of such steamer, or any other question as respects the application of the tariff generally, the same shall be referred for settlement to a committee consisting of two shipowners, two coal shippers, to be nominated by the undersigned representatives of the coal shippers, and two trimmers to be nominated by the Trimmers' Union, whose decision shall be final upon all such questions." Then comes a list of the steamers already known, with the sums payable by them, and blank spaces are left for the introduction of other steamers when they require to have their classification ascertained and the amount they have to pay, and at the end of all comes this: "The charges for any self-trimmers not in this list must be fixed by the disputes committee." Now on the words I have read, was it or was it not intended to except out of the jurisdiction of this committee, which is appointed for the purpose of settling disputes—certainly some disputes, that is not denied—was it intended to cut out from its jurisdiction that which on the face of the very provision letting in their jurisdiction is the most probable dispute of all that is likely to arise? Having regard to the words they use in describing the class of vessel that they want to introduce—namely, a vessel that may be "of the same type as regards the work involved in trimming," they are absolutely formulating a definition which I might say almost necessarily involves a doubt and a difficulty in applying it to a particular case. In the clause in which they introduce that somewhat difficult definition, they are also supplying a means for settling disputes, and yet it has to be contended that they have deliberately excepted out of the jurisdiction of this conciliation tribunal that which in the very forefront of their mandate bears the characteristics of a possible difference? It seems to me that would be a very strange and narrow view to take of a clause which has for its object the settling of disputes by practical men conversant with this particular class of business and conversant with the particular class of steamers in question. That being in my view the primâ facie difficulty in limiting this charter-party, what justification is there for saying that any such special intention to limit can be got out of these words? It appears on the face of the language used that this agreement is supplemental to an already existing tariff. What words could you well introduce for letting in under the jurisdiction of this rule all questions arising out of this tariff other than the words that are used? "In the event of any question arising as to the proper classification of such steamer." That steamer cannot be properly classified unless a decision is arrived at as to whether it does or does not come in as a self-trimmer. If it does not come in, it is said it must come under some of the earlier classes mentioned. "Or any other question as respects the application of the tariff generally." That must embrace the application of the tariff to this steamer? Has any question arisen as to the application of the tariff to this steamer? Of course it has. One side says this steamer is a self-trimmer. The other says it is not, and it must go under some other scale in the tariff. Then it seems to me the question does arise, and in most distinct terms, as to the application of the tariff to this steamer. If it is so, it seems to me to be in the jurisdiction of the committee. A point was vaguely suggested by Mr. Bankes that for other reasons the committee itself was not properly constituted, and has therefore never had legitimate jurisdiction. In my judgment that point was certainly not open for Mr. Bankes. Under these circumstances it seems to me the finding of the Divisional Court is wrong, and that the appeal ought to be allowed.

In re WOOLFE'S PATENT.
WOOLFE v. AUTOMATIC PICTURE GALLERY (LIMITED). (a.)

Patent — Amendment of specification — Petition for revocation presented during proceedings for amendment —Jurisdiction of comptroller—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 18 (10), 19—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 5.

A patentee applied under section 18 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, for leave to amend his specification by way of disclaimer. After the application had been made, but before the comptroller had given his decision, the defendants in this action presented a petition for revocation of the patent. The comptroller subsequently granted the patentee leave to amend. The patentee brought this action to restrain the defendants from infringing his patent as amended. The defendants pleaded that the patent had not been duly amended, on the ground that the presentation of their petition had ousted the comptroller's jurisdiction to hear and determine by virtue of section 18 (10) of the Act of 1883, as amended by section 5 of the Act of 1888, unless leave was first obtained from the court under section 19 of the Act of 1883.

Held, that the application to amend having, in the first place, been properly made at a time when no action for infringement or proceeding for revocation was pending, could be proceeded with and adjudicated upon by the comptroller without leave of the court, notwithstanding that a petition for revocation had been presented before final adjudication, and that liberty to amend the specification of the patent had been duly given.

Point of law.

On the 1st of April, 1901, the plaintiff, who was the owner of letters patent No. 12,160 of 1898, for improvements in apparatus for receiving coin and displaying stereoscopic pictures in exchange, applied to the Patent Office under section 18 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, for leave to amend his patent by way of disclaimer.

On the 3rd of July, 1901, before any decision on the application had been given, the defendants presented a petition for revocation of the plaintiff's patent.

On the 9th of August, 1901, the plaintiff's application came on for hearing before the comptroller, when the defendants contended that the presentation of their petition had deprived the comptroller of jurisdiction to hear and decide the application by reason of section 18 (10) of the Act of 1883, unless leave were first given to the plaintiffs by the court under section 19 of the same Act.

On the 14th of August the comptroller granted leave to amend the specification in the manner desired.

On the 26th of September, 1901, the plaintiff issued the writ in this action for infringement of his patent on the amended specification, and the defendants by their defence pleaded that the application and the leave to amend were ultra vires and of no effect.

Section 18 of the Act of 1883 provides (in effect) that a patentee may seek leave to amend his specification by way of disclaimer, correction, or explanation, and prescribes the formalities requisite prior to and upon such application, and the effect of leave given, and sub-section 10 is as follows: "The foregoing provisions of this section do not apply when and so long as any action for infringement or other legal proceeding in relation to a patent is pending."

Section 19 provides that "In an action for infringement of a patent or in a proceeding for revocation of a patent the court or a judge may (in effect) order that the patentee shall be at liberty to apply for leave amend his specification by way of disclaimer, but gives no power to grant liberty to apply when amendment is sought by way of correction or explanation.

The plaintiff took out this summons to determine (amongst others) the following questions of law: (1) Was the decision of the comptroller on the 14th of August effectual to authorize and enable the plaintiff to amend his specification? and (2) did the presentation of the petition on the 3rd of July render the plaintiff unable during the pendency thereof to make any application at the Patent Office having for its object to obtain leave to amend his specification, save only such application as the court or a judge should, under section 19 of the Act of 1883, order that the plaintiff should be at liberty to make and did it, save in respect of such an application so ordered, deprive the comptroller of jurisdiction to hear and determine the application of the plaintiff?

Terrell, K.C., and A. J. Walter, for the plaintiff.—The word "pending" in section 18 (10) means "pending" at the time the application is made: see the remarks of Fry, L.J., in Singer v. Stassen & Son, 1 Rep. Pat. Cas. 121, at p. 126. The defendants say we ought to have got leave under section 19, being a proviso to section 18 (10), but it is not a proviso, for it deals only with the case of "disclaimer" and not with the cases of "correction" or "explanation."

J. Fletcher Moulton, K.C., and J. W. Gordon, for the defendants.—The statement relied on in Singer v. Stassen is merely a dictum and no authority whatever; In re Deeley's Patent is a distinct authority in our favour. Application for leave to amend is not contained merely in one document; it is a continued process involving a series of steps and acts, and the series is suspended so soon as a petition is presented.

They also referred to Farbenfabriken, &c. v. Bayer and Andrew & Co. v. Crossley Bros.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, said that unless he could find authority the other way, he thought there was no reasonable doubt as to the construction of the sections in question. [His lordship read sections 18 and 19 of the Act of 1883, and section 5 of the Act of 1888.] Though as a general principle it was not safe to construe Acts of Parliament by a priori considerations, it was yet necessary to look at the intention of the Legislature in framing a given statute. Here it was obvious that the Legislature recognized that it would be a fair right to confer on a patentee to allow him to make, those amendments in his specification which through carelessness or ignorance or otherwise had been omitted—to allow him to come and say that after all he did not claim something or all he had originally claimed, or that he had made a slip which needed correction, or that he had not properly explained something which required proper explanation. But this was recognized as fair only provided no other person was injured by it; it would be obviously unfair to allow a patentee to do this when some rival inventor or claimant had presented a petition to revoke the grant originally made to the patentee. But if there was no harm done, no reason could be urged why honest alterations should not fairly be made. The Act went even further, for by section 19, even when proceedings against the patent had commenced, the court might still in its discretion give a patentee leave to apply for amendment by way of disclaimer though not by way of correction or explanation. Such being the scheme of the Act, why should an application properly made in the first instance be suspended by proceedings begun at a later date? If the defendants were right in their contention, then the very day before the comptroller gave his decision upon the application for amendment, after all the preliminary notices and advertisements had been given and made with regard to the application, it would still be possible by presenting a petition for revocation to stop all further proceedings at the last moment and to nullify all that had gone before. That would be a monstrous construction to put upon the Act, and he should decline to put it unless forced thereto by authority. If no legal proceeding was pending the application might be made, and there was nowhere to be found any provision that an application, having been once duly made, should not be proceeded with. Nor was he forced by the authorities to construe the Act in any other way. In Singer v. Stassen, Fry, L.J., was of the same opinion as his lordship, but as the remarks of Fry, L.J., in that case were obiter dicta, he should not rely upon them as an authority, although they were entitled to great weight. In In re Deeley's Patent, it was true, Chitty, J., said that proceedings before the comptroller under section 18 were suspended by the subsequent presentation of a petition for revocation, and gave leave to proceed under section 19, but the point was not argued before Chitty, J., so as to elicit a definite opinion from him, and he merely gave leave upon the hypothesis, and there was nothing to show that the mind of the learned judge was so brought to bear upon the point as to constitute his remarks a judicial decision thereon.

His lordship therefore held that the application could properly go on and be adjudicated upon, and that the comptroller's jurisdiction was not ousted by the presentation of the petition.

CORPORATION OF BRADFORD AND OTHERS v. FERRAND AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Water—Underground water—Unknown but ascertainable channel.

The Morton Beck, a river in Yorkshire, derived some of its water from the Sweet Well Spring. Defendants sank wells or shafts on their land in close proximity to the Sweet Well Spring, and by this means some of the water from the spring was alleged to be diverted. Plaintiffs were riparian proprietors on the banks of the Morton Beck.

Held, that plaintiffs had no right of action for the abstraction of the said water, as even assuming the existence of a defined channel, along which the underground water flowed to the well, such channel was not known and could not be ascertained except by excavation of the soil.

Ewart v. Belfast Poor Law Guardians, 9 L. R. Ir. 172, approved.

The plaintiffs were the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of Bradford and other persons interested in mills erected on the Morton Beck in Yorkshire. They were the owners and occupiers of mills situate close to the junction of the Bradup Beck and Fenny Shaw Beck. These two becks unite to form the Morton Beck, which flows into the River Aire in Yorkshire. The defendant, William Ferrand, was the owner and occupier of an allotment of moorland, part of Morton Moor, and upon this allotment a spring known as the Sweet Well Spring rises and flows by means of a natural stream known as the Sweet Well Dyke into the Sunnydale Reservoir on the Bradup Beck.

The plaintiffs alleged that before issuing to the surface, the water that issued at Sweet Well Spring flowed in a well-defined and ascertained channel under the surface of the ground, and that from time immemorial the spring has been, and up to the beginning of 1901 was, one of the main feeders of Morton Beck, and had been in dry seasons the principal feeder. About the year 1900 the Shipley Urban District Council, one of the defendants in the action, entered into an arrangement with William Ferrand whereby Ferrand granted the council permission to sink certain shafts or wells on his land.

The plaintiffs claimed an injunction restraining defendants from intercepting, diverting, or obstructing the water flowing in a defined channel to and feeding the Sweet Well Spring so as to diminish the quantity of the said water flowing from the Sweet Well to the Sunnydale reservoir, and directing them to remove all shafts, drains, and works constructed by them whereby the flow of water from the said spring into the Sunnydale reservoir was or might be wholly or partially diverted or obstructed.

The defendants denied that the water which issued at Sweet Well Spring before issuing to the surface flowed in a well-defined or in an ascertained channel under the surface of the ground or in any defined or any ascertained channel, and they further pleaded that if such water before issuing to the surface did flow in a well-defined channel under the surface of the ground, such channel was not an ascertained or known channel.

On the 25th of April, 1902, the court was moved by plaintiffs asking for leave to make the necessary excavations, experiments, and observations upon the land for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the waters which previously issued at Sweet Well Spring before so issuing flowed in a definite underground channel.

No order was made in the motion.

The plaintiffs appealed, and on the appeal being heard on the 14th of May, 1902, it was agreed that the defence should be amended by raising a direct issue between the parties on the point of law, and that an application should be made to Farwell, J., to decide that point before the trial.

Accordingly, the defendants amended their defence, and raised the point of law as follows: "Assuming that underground water flows or flowed to the said Sweet Well Spring in a defined channel, but that the existence and course of that defined channel is not and cannot be ascertained or known except by excavation of the soil, the plaintiffs have no right of action for the abstraction of such underground water, and are not entitled to maintain this action."

Butcher, K.C., and A. P. Longstaffe, for the defendants, argued that there could be no right to the water flowing in an underground channel unless the channel were known. The notoriety of the flow of these natural streams was of the utmost importance: Ewart v. Belfast Poor Law Guardians, 9 L. R. Ir. 172; Black v. Ballymena Township Commissioners, 17 L. R. Ir. 459, 35 W. R. Dig. 216; Angel on Watercourses (6th ed.), p. 157. It was decided in Chasemore v. Richards, 7 W. R. 685, 7 H. L. Cas. 349, that every owner has a right to dig in his own soil and take water subject to the rights of other people as to the quantity of water. No other person has such right in an unknown underground stream.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the plaintiffs.

Butcher, K.C., replied.

FARWELL, J.—The rights in relation to water flowing in a defined and known channel on or under the surface of the earth are now well settled; every riparian proprietor has an equal right to the ordinary use of the water which flows in the stream adjacent to his lands as it has been wont to run: Miner v. Gilmour, 7 W. R. 328, 12 Moore P. C. 131. This right is an incident to the property in the land through which it passes, Embrey v. Owen, 6 Exch. 352, and does not depend upon a supposed grant, but is jure naturæ: Shury v. Piggott, 3 Bulst. 339. But the right does not extend to water percolating through the strata in no known channel (Chasemore v. Richards) or to common surface water rising out of springy or boggy ground and flowing in no definite channel: Rawstron v. Taylor, 11 Exch. 369, 4 W. R. Dig. 166. No English authority has yet dealt with the rights to water flowing underground in a defined but unknown channel, and although there is the express authority of the Court of Appeal in Ireland I feel bound to form my own opinion on the point, as that decision does not bind me. After the manner in which the case of Chasemore v. Richards was argued and decided in the House of Lords, I cannot treat the right to the flow of the stream as founded on a rule of positive law, the origin of which is lost by the progress of time, as suggested by Tindal, C.J., in Acton v. Blundell, 12 M. & W. 324 but I feel bound to try to find the principle on which the right rests. The foundation of the right, as stated throughout all the cases, is jus naturæ. What, then, is the meaning of jus naturæ? It cannot be that it means merely that the water is an incident or accessory to the land by the gift of nature, for this would not be a sufficient foundation for the right claimed. The mere statement that water, light, or air is a gift of nature does not necessarily involve the general conclusion that there can be no interference with their enjoyment. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that jus naturæ is used in these cases as expressing that principle in English law which is akin to, if not derived from, the jus naturale of Roman law. English law is of course quite independent of Roman law, but the conception of aequum et bonum and the rights flowing therefrom which are included in jus naturale underlie a great part of English common law, although it is not usual to find the law of nature or natural law referred to in so many words in English cases. [His lordship then referred to the decisions in Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005. at p. 1012; Freeman v. Jeffries, L. R. 4 Ex. 189, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 87; Master v. Miller, 4 T. R. 320, and an article on the Law of Nature by Sir F. Pollock in the Journal of Comparative Legislation for 1901, and continued:] I am not, therefore, introducing any novel principle if I regard jus naturale, on which the right to running water rests, as meaning that which is aequum et bonum between the upper and lower proprietors. This appears to me to be the view expressed by Dodderidge, J., in Shury v. Piggott, when he gives a second reason "drawn from the nature of water, the which will naturally descend, and will make a way for its passage if stopped." He is evidently considering the relative positions of the upper and lower owners. Each has his right jus naturæ If the upper owner dams the stream, the lower loses the passage of the water. If the lower owner dams the stream, he floods the higher owner's lands. What, then, is fair and reasonable between the parties? Aqua currit—i.e., it is obvious to all that the water in the known and definite channel runs down toward the lower ground, therefore debet currere ut currere solebat; it is aequum et bonum that neither owner should interfere with this, and thereby each avoids injuring the other and escapes injury himself.

This, too, is the only explanation of the continued reference to knowledge of the existence of the stream which occurs in the cases. But I fail to see how ignorance or knowledge on the part of a defendant can affect the right of the plaintiff in a civil action to enforce his legal right except on the footing that the existence of such right depends on the consideration of what is aequum et bonum between the two parties.

In the present case there is a spring issuing from the defendant's land. It is fed ex hypothesi by a subterranean stream flowing in a defined channel from the higher ground. This ground may extend to a large number of acres, and may belong to many different owners. No one can tell where or in whose land this hypothetical stream runs. If the plaintiffs are right, no proprietor of land above the spring can sink a well or make excavations on his own ground without the risk of incurring liability, possibly to a very large amount, to the plaintiffs for interfering with the spring, and this is a much larger liability than that unsuccessfully sought to be established in Chasemore v. Richards, for a defined stream may flow for miles, whereas the gathering ground of water penetrating by percolation is of comparatively small extent. I apply Lord Chelmsford's question in Chasemore v. Richards: "Are the most distant landowners as well as the adjacent ones to be bound at their peril to take care to use their lands so as not to interrupt the oozing of the water through the soil to a greater extent than shall be necessary for their own actual wants?" and Lord Wensleydale's observation in the same case: "In the second place, as the great interests of society require that the cultivation of every man's land should be encouraged, and its natural advantages made fully available, the owner must be permitted to dig in his own soil, and in so doing he can very rarely avoid interfering with the subterraneous waters flowing or percolating in his neighbour's land." I desire respectfully to adopt Palles, C.B.'s, statement in Ewart v. Belfast Poor Law Guardians, when he says: "If the view which has been contended for by the plaintiffs in this case is correct, we would have the startling doctrine that an action at law would lie against a man without any limit to the damages that could be recovered, for doing an act which as far as he knows, or as far as can be known by reasonable inquiry, is a lawful act, and the unlawfulness of which would depend upon the fact that, by some newly-discovered method of examination being resorted to, it was ascertained that the water flowed in a defined channel, a fact which, but for that method being resorted to, would have remained for all ages unknown. That would be a monstrous doctrine." [His lordship also read the remarks of Fitzgibbon, L.J., to the same effect, and continued:] There is nothing inconsistent with this view in cases like the River Mole, where a river disappears into the ground and what is apparently the same river appears on lower ground. In such cases there is a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem, and the owners of land between the two can fairly be presumed to know of the existence and course of the stream. As Pollock, C.B., says in Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co., 7 Ex. Ch. 282, at pp. 300, 301: "If the course of a subterranean stream were well known as is the case with many, which sink underground, pursue for a short space a subterraneous course, and then emerge again, it never could be contended that the owner of the soil under which the stream flowed could not maintain an action for the diversion of it if it took place under such circumstances as would have enabled him to recover if the stream had been wholly above ground." That passage was cited with approval by Lord Chelmsford in Chasemore v. Richards. At any rate, cases of that class rest on the knowledge, actual or possessed, of the existence of an underground stream. Finally, regarding the case as one to be decided on the general consideration of aequum et bonum, it is not immaterial to remember that three eminent judges of appeal in Ireland have decided that the lower owner has no right to prevent the obstruction of a subterranean stream flowing in a defined but unknown course, and that such view also accords with American decisions. "The defined watercourses spoken of in Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Penn. St. Rep. 528, which a man may not divert to the hurt of an inferior proprietor are not the hidden streams of which the owner of the soil through which they pass can have no knowledge until they have been discovered by excavations made in the exercise of rights of property": Angell on Watercourses (7th ed.), p. 156. I am at any rate confirmed in my view of what is aequum et bonum by finding that I share it with such eminent persons, although their opinions are not authorities behind which I can take shelter.

There will be a declaration that there is no right in underground water where the course of its channel is unknown; and the plaintiffs will pay the costs of this application.

In re BOWLES.

AMEDROZ v. BOWLES. (a.)

Perpetuity — Appointment — Personal estate — Remoteness — "Possibility on a possibility."

The old rule against "a possibility on a possibility," though applicable to legal limitations of real estate—namely, that although an estate may be limited to an unborn person for his life, yet a remainder cannot be limited to the children of that unborn person, as purchasers—does not apply to personal estate; as regards limitations of personal estate the ordinary rule against perpetuities is the only rule applicable.

This was a summons to determine whether an appointment made under a marriage settlement was void for remoteness. By a settlement dated the 6th of October, 1818, made upon the marriage of the Rev. George Downing Bowles and Anne his wife, certain stocks and funds were transferred to trustees upon trust after the death of the survivor of the husband and wife for the child or children of the said marriage, "or such one or more exclusively of the other or others of them, or any issue born in the lifetime of the said G. D. Bowles and Anne Stillingfleet or the survivor of them, of any such child or children, with such provision for their respective maintenance, education and advancement, and at such age or time or respective ages or times not being after twenty-one years to be computed from the decease of the survivor of the said G. D. Bowles and Anne Stillingfleet, and if more than one in such shares and proportions and with such limitations over for the benefit of some or one of the said children or issue as to part of the funds as the said Anne Stillingfleet alone during her life, and as to the other part of the said funds as the said G. D. Bowles and Anne Stillingfleet jointly during their joint lives should by deed appoint."

In a subsequent deed dated the 28th of February, 1849, made between the said G. D. Bowles and Anne his wife and their children, all the trust funds were duly appointed, subject to the life interests of the said G. D. Bowles and Anne Bowles, in equal third shares in trust for each of the three children of the marriage for their respective lives, and after the death of each of them in trust for his or her children born in the lifetime of the said G. D. Bowles and Anne Bowles, who should live to attain the age of twenty-one years.

FARWELL, J.—I think it is reasonably plain that, whatever the doctrine of "a possibility on a possibility" may have originally meant, at present it exists only to the extent stated in the head-note to Whitley v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 337, 44 Ch. D. 85: "The old rule against 'a possibility on a possibility,' applicable to legal limitations of real estates—namely, that although an estate may be limited to an unborn person for his life, yet a remainder cannot be limited to the children of that unborn person, as purchasers, is still existing, and has not been abrogated by the more modern rule against perpetuities." It is obvious that the rule cannot apply to personal estate, because there is no such thing as a remainder in personal estate, nor do I see any reason why a similar rule should now, for the first time, be applied to limitations of personal estate, having regard to the fact that personal estate is already sufficiently protected from any undue restriction on alienation by the ordinary rule against perpetuities. The rule against "a possibility on a possibility" came into existence in the case of real estate before the ordinary rule against perpetuities was formulated, and just because of the non-existence of any such ordinary rule; and it continued to exist partly because the new rule against perpetuities was said not to apply to remainders, and partly because it was never formally abrogated. So far as touches the present question there is no express decision on the point. Certainly, however, the opinion of Sir Richard Pepper Arden, M.R., is very clearly stated in Routledge v. Dorril, 2 Ves., jun., 356, to the effect that, so long as you make it clear that the rule against perpetuities has not been transgressed you may appoint to an unborn child for life, with remainder to unborn children: ibid, at p. 362. This, therefore, although it is not a decision, is an expression of the opinion of Sir R. P. Arden more than one hundred years ago; and I think that it is a perfectly correct statement of the law on the subject. I therefore declare that the trust now in question is not void for remoteness.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ASHBORNE RECREATION GROUND CO (LIMITED). (a)

Injunction — Jurisdiction — Attorney-General — Public right—New statutory offence—Special statutory remedy —Bye-laws —Penalties—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 157, 183, 251.

The Attorney-General is entitled to an injunction, as an ancillary remedy, to restrain the breach of a public right in the same way as a private person is so entitled in respect of a breach of his private rights; and this is so in a case where the public right has been created by a statute which also provides a special remedy for its breach, as, for instance, the recovery of a penalty in a summary way.

An urban district council having, by its bye-laws, prescribed (amongst other things) the width of new streets under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and imposed penalties for offences against the bye-laws under section 183, which penalties were, by section 251, to be recovered before a court of summary jurisdiction, the Attorney-General at the relation of the council brought an action in the High Court against the defendant, who had contravened the bye-laws, for an injunction.

Held, that the action lay, and that the injunction should be granted.

This was an action by his Majesty's Attorney-General (at the relation of the Ashborne Urban District Council) and the council, as plaintiffs, against the defendant company and one Smith, their contractor, asking for a declaration that the defendants were laying out, or had laid out, a new street in contravention of the bye-laws of the council, and for an injunction to restrain them from doing so. The action had originally been brought by the plaintiff council alone, but after the decision of Joyce, J., in Mayor of Devonport v. Tozer, [1902] 2 Ch. 182, 50 W. R. Dig. 97, the Attorney-General was added as a plaintiff to the action.

The street in question was one proposed to be made at Ashborne over the property of the defendant company. It had originally been shown in a certain plan, B, submitted (as alleged by the plaintiffs) for their approval, as extending from a certain road called Station-road on the west to Compton-street on the east, and the part next to Compton-street, part of which was between already existing buildings, was shown as less in width than thirty-six feet, which was the width required by the bye-laws of the plaintiff council. Subsequently a plan, C, was submitted to the plaintiff council showing the proposed street as not extending along the narrow part near Compton-street. The plaintiffs alleged that the road was being laid out according to plan B. The defendants denied that the plan B was submitted with their authority, or that they were laying out the street according to it, and they submitted that the proposed street as shown by plan C was in conformity with the bye-laws. They also submitted as a preliminary objection that the only remedies open to the plaintiffs were those prescribed in section 158 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and in the plaintiffs' bye-laws, and that consequently this action did not lie.

The bye-laws of the plaintiff council upon the matter were as follows:

"4. Every person who shall lay out a new street which shall be intended for use as a carriage-road, shall so lay out such street that the width thereof shall be thirty-six feet at the least."

"8. Every person who shall construct a new street shall provide, at one end at least of such street, an entrance of a width equal to the width of such street, and open from the ground upwards."

"98. Every person who shall offend against any of the foregoing bye-laws shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty of five pounds, and in the case of a continuing offence to a further penalty of forty shillings for each day after written notice of the offence from the sanitary authority."

The court first heard the preliminary objections.

Macaskie, K.C., and A. F. Peterson, for the defendant council.—The alleged acts complained of in this action are a new offence created by the Public Health Act, 1875, and by the bye-laws of the plaintiff council thereunder. The Act (section 251) provides a special remedy for this offence—namely, by the enforcement of penalties before a court of summary jurisdiction or by pulling down or removing the road after notice of disapproval (section 158). That being so, no other proceeding can be taken: Reg. v. Hall, [1891] 1 Q. B. 747, 39 W. R. Dig. 67; Barraclough v. Brown, [1897] A. C. 615, 46 W. R. Dig. 64. It is clear that the plaintiff council cannot sue without the Attorney-General being a party: Mayor of Devonport v. Tozer, [1902] 2 Ch. 182, 50 W. R. Dig. 97. Nor can the action be maintained when he is joined, for the act complained of is a criminal offence, and consequently an injunction cannot be granted in respect of it: Mellor v. Denham, 5 Q. B. D. 467, 28 W. R. Dig. 163. Moreover, an injunction will not in any case be granted to restrain an act which is not an interference with property: Emperor of Austria v. Day, 9 W. R. 712, at pp. 717, 718 3 De G. F. & J 217 at p. 253; Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, 16 W. R. 1138, L. R. 6 Eq. 551.

Macmorran, K.C., and Hextall, for the plaintiffs.—The courts have granted injunctions in many cases similar to this, as in Attorney-General v. Hatch, [1893] 3 Ch. 36, 41 W. R. Dig. 124, Attorney-General v. Rufford & Co. (Limited), 47 W. R. 405, [1899] 1 Ch. 537. The Act contains a provision (section 341) that the powers of the Act are to be in addition to any other powers conferred by law or custom. This section was considered in Attorney-General v. Tod-Heatley, 45 W R. 394, [1897] 1 Ch. 560, where an injunction was granted. [BUCKLEY, J.—That section only refers to such powers as existed before the Act.] There is no need to show any injury to the public. The Attorney-General may sue for any breach of public duty: per Fry, J., in Attorney-General v. Shrewsbury Bridge Co., 30 W. R. 716, 21 Ch. D 752, at p. 756, Attorney-General v. London and North-Western Railway Co., [1900] 1 Q. B. 78, 48 W. R. Dig. 160. The principle of all these cases is that where illegal acts affect the public rights the Attorney-General may have them restrained by injunction. It is true that the penalty for the offence is imposed by the bye-laws, but that is equivalent to being imposed by the Act by which the bye-laws are authorized. And these bye-laws when made are binding upon the local authority, and cannot be waived (Yabbicom v. King, 47 W. R 318, [1899] 1 Q. B. 444, and per Wright, J., in In re McIntosh and Pontypridd Improvements Co., 61 L. J. Q. B. 164, at p. 167, 40 W. R. Dig. 128), but the Attorney-General may consider whether he will join in bringing the action if he thinks the case trivial: see observations of Halsbury, L.C., in London County Council v. Attorney-General, 50 W. R. 497, [1902] A. C. 165, at p. 168.

BUCKLEY, J.—A preliminary objection has been taken by the defendants. They say that even although the Attorney-General is a party the action cannot be maintained. The urban district council is a body which has powers under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, of making bye-laws. They have made such bye-laws, which among other things prescribe the width of new streets. They say that the defendant company have acted in breach of those bye-laws, and for the present purpose I will assume that to be the case. The defendants say that the Public Health Act, 1875, has created a new offence and has imposed penalties for its breach. That is not correct. Section 183 gives to the local authority power to make bye-laws by which penalties may be imposed for the breach of the bye-laws, and the plaintiff council have imposed a penalty by their bye-laws for this offence. There might be a case where there were no bye-laws imposing any penalty. And the question would then arise what remedy was there then for offences against the Act. But the argument is that as the local authority have made these bye-laws the only remedy for offences against them must be under section 251 of the Act to recover them before a court of summary jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and that there is no jurisdiction in this court to grant an injunction. In Wolverhampton New Waterworks Co. v. Hawkesford, 7 W. R. 464, 6 C. B. N. S., 336, at p. 356, Willes, J., said: "There are three classes of cases in which a liability may be established founded upon a statute. One is where there is a liability existing at common law, and that liability is affirmed by a statute which gives a special and peculiar form of remedy different from the remedy which existed at common law, there, unless the statute contains words which expressly or by necessary implication include the common law remedy, the party suing has his election to pursue either that or the statutory remedy." This case is not within that class because there was not before the statute any remedy at common law; the obligation was created by the statute. He continues: "The second class of cases is where the statute gives the right to sue merely, but provides no particular form of remedy; there the parties can only proceed by action at common law." In a sense this case does fall within that class, because if no bye-laws had been made no remedy would have been provided. But I pass by that. The learned judge continues: "But there is a third class, where a liability not existing at common law is created by a statute which at the same time gives a special and particular remedy for enforcing it. The present case falls within this latter class, if any liability at all exists. The remedy provided by the statute must be followed, and it is competent to the party to pursue the course applicable to the cases of the second class. The form given by the statute must be adopted and adhered to. The company are bound to follow the form of remedy provided by the statute which gives them the right to sue." This case comes within that third class. I start, then, with this, that as a general proposition the remedy provided by the statute must be followed. But there is at least one exception to this rule, for there may co-exist with the statutory remedy a remedy by injunction to protect the right created by the statute. It cannot be disputed after Cooper v. Whittingham, 28 W. R 720, 15 Ch. D. 501, that if a plaintiff is suing in respect of a right personal to himself which has been infringed by the commission of a statutory offence, he is not precluded from bringing his action for an injunction. In that case Jessel, M.R., said, referring to the Copyright Act of 1842: "It is said that the seventeenth section of the Act created a new offence of importation and enacted a particular penalty, and it was argued that where a new offence and a penalty for it had been created by statute, a person proceeding under the statute was confined to the recovery of the penalty, and that nothing else could be asked for. That is true as a general rule of law. But there are two exceptions. The first of these exceptions is the ancillary remedy in equity by injunction to protect a right"—a remedy which he granted in that case. He then says that the second exception is that created by section 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, but after North London Railway Co. v. Great Northern Railway Co., 31 W. R. 490, 11 Q. B. D. 30, this exception cannot, I think, be relied on. He goes on, in reference to the first exception, to say "That is a mode of preventing that being done which, if done, would be an offence. Whenever an act is illegal, and is threatened, the court will interfere and prevent the act being done—and, as regards the mode of granting an injunction, the court will grant it either when the illegal act is threatened, but has not been actually done, or when it has been done, and seemingly is intended to be repeated." But it is said that without disputing that case the plaintiffs cannot have an injunction, because the act complained of was not an interference with any right of property, but only with public rights. Is that a good ground of objection? I think not. I think that the Attorney-General, acting on behalf of the public, must have in respect of public rights at least as large a remedy as a private person has in respect of his private rights. I find that judges of first instance, and also the Court of Appeal, have in cases of this kind assumed that as a matter of course the Attorney-General could sue, although it is true that the objection now taken was not raised before them. Such cases were Attorney-General v. Hatch, Attorney-General v. Rufford & Co., and Attorney-General v. London and North-Western Railway Co. In the last case the offence restrained by injunction was an indictable one and not subject to special jurisdiction, but I do not think the case differs in principle. That being so, it is not for me as a judge of first instance to say that these decisions were erroneous. But apart from their authority, I am of opinion that there is nothing to prevent the Attorney-General suing.

Other considerations assist me in coming to this conclusion. If there were no remedy for offences against the bye-laws other than that conferred by the statute, the local authority would in many cases become impotent. Not only may a penalty be imposed by the bye-laws, but under section 158 a person may be ordered to pull down and remove buildings erected contrary to the bye-laws. But this can only be done after the local authority has signified its disapproval within one month of the delivery of the plan. And, consequently, if they are inert the only remedy would be to recover the penalty. Again, there are many things which may be required by the bye-laws for the breach of which pulling down or removing the building would be an inappropriate remedy. Thus water-closets may be required to be sufficiently flushed with water, and rooms properly ventilated, but it is quite inadequate to say that the local authorities may pull down the house if details of this kind are not carried out. That cannot have been the intention of the Act. The object of the Public Health Acts is to secure the observance of the rules necessary for public health, and the Attorney-General ought to be able to have them enforced.

Objection overruled.

The case was then heard, and his lordship having come to the conclusion that the defendants and others had intended to make the new street into Compton-street of a width less than that required, granted an injunction as claimed.

WILLIAMS (Appellant) v. BLAKEWAY (Respondent). (a.)

Election law — Registration — Municipal franchise — Occupation list — Objection — Qualifying premises acquired during the qualifying period—"Promotion to an office"—Appointment of Wesleyan minister by the conference of the connexion—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 33 (1).

The appellant, a Wesleyan minister, was, in August, 1901, appointed by the Wesleyan Conference to the ministry of the Gloucester circuit in succession to a previous Wesleyan minister, and the appellant in August, 1901, entered as such minister into the occupation of the manse, in the city of Gloucester, vacated by the outgoing minister. The manse, which was vested in trustees, was occupied by each successive minister, rent free, but the minister in occupation was personally liable for the rates. The appellant's name was entered in Division III. of the occupiers' list of voters of the city of Gloucester in respect of the said manse as a dwelling-house, and was objected to, on the ground that the appellant had not in fact occupied the qualifying premises during the whole of the qualifying period. The appellant contended that he had succeeded to the qualifying property by "promotion to an office"—namely, the ministry of the Gloucester circuit, and that the occupancy and rating of the preceding minister was equivalent to the occupancy and rating of himself within section 33, sub-section 1, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. Save as aforesaid, no evidence was produced at the revision court of the terms of the deed of trust under which the qualifying property (the manse) was held. The revising barrister on the authority of Foster v. Mulhall held that the appointment to the ministry of the Gloucester circuit was not "promotion to an office" within the section, and accordingly allowed the objection and expunged the appellant's name. The appellant duly appealed, and the revising barrister, in stating a case, appended to the case as an exhibit the deed of trust under which the qualifying property was held, and added a note that this document was not produced in evidence at the revision court.

Held that the court could not regard anything which was not in evidence before the revising barrister at the revision court; and that upon the evidence before him there was nothing to show that he had come to a wrong conclusion, and consequently that his decision must be affirmed.

Foster v. Mulhall (10 Ir. C. L. Rep. 532) discussed and explained.

This was an appeal by the Rev. John Williams, a minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion, from the decision of the revising barrister for the city of Gloucester.

The case stated that at a court held by the revising barrister on the 17th of September, 1902, for revising the lists of Parliamentary voters and burgesses for the city of Gloucester the name of the appellant appeared in Division III. of the occupiers' list in respect of the occupation of a dwelling-house, 6, Falkner-street, in the city of Gloucester, and that the entry of the appellant's name had been duly objected to on the ground that he had not occupied the dwelling-house in respect of which his name was entered for twelve months immediately preceding the 15th of July, 1902.

The appellant is a minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion. Prior to August, 1901, he was a minister of the Teignmouth Circuit, and resided at Teignmouth, Devon. His appointment as a minister of that circuit expired by effluxion of time at the end of August, 1901, on the expiration of three years from the date of his appointment thereto.

The appointment of Wesleyan minister is made nominally for one year, but in practice it is renewed from year to year so as to extend to three years and no longer. The appointments are made by the conference of the connexion at their annual meeting in August.

On or about the 5th of August, 1901, the appellant was appointed by the conference to the Gloucester Circuit in succession to the Rev. E. H. Simpson, whose appointment on the Gloucester Circuit expired by effluxion of time at the end of that month.

On or about the last day of August, 1901, the appellant entered upon the occupation of the qualifying premises in Gloucester, which is the manse provided by the connexion for the accommodation of one of the ministers of that circuit.

The Rev. E. H. Simpson left the house about three days before the appellant's arrival, but this was as a matter of convenience. He was entitled to remain until the appellant's arrival.

The manse, which is vested in trustees, is occupied by the minister, rent free, and is partially furnished by the circuit. The minister, as occupier, is liable for the rates. He is entitled on appointment to a fixed stipend from the circuit, which may be supplemented by further allowances varying according to circumstances.

It was contended before the revising barrister, on behalf of the appellant, that he had succeeded to the qualifying property by "promotion to an office"—namely, the ministry of the Gloucester Circuit; and that the occupancy and rating of his predecessor, Simpson, was equivalent to the occupation and rating of himself under section 33 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict c. 50).

The revising barrister held that the appointment to the ministry of the Gloucester Circuit was not "promotion to an office" within the section: see Foster v. Mulhall, 10 Irish Com. Law Rep. 532, cited in Rogers on Elections (16th ed.), vol. 1, p. 12, and accordingly allowed the objection and expunged the entry of the appellant's name in the list.

The appellant gave due notice of appeal, and as the objector declined to be made respondent to the appeal, the revising barrister named the town clerk as respondent.

Appended to the case as an exhibit was a print of the Wesleyan Methodist chapel model deed under the trusts of which the qualifying premises, No. 6, Falkner-street, Gloucester, were now held by the appellant, with a note by the revising barrister that this document was not produced at the registration court, although he expressly desired to be informed of the terms of the trusts under which the manse was held. He could not say, therefore, how far this and other documents which the appellant intended to produce on the appeal might have affected his decision.

Roskill, for the appellant.—The sole question raised by the case is whether the appellant can claim by right of succession to his predecessor in the "office" of Wesleyan minister, under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, section 33 (1) of which provides that "where a person succeeds to qualifying property by . . . promotion to a benefice or office, then for the purpose of qualification the occupancy of the property by a predecessor in title and the rating of the predecessor in respect thereof shall be equivalent to the occupancy and rating of the successor." There is no case bearing at all on the question but that of Foster v. Mulhall, 10 Ir. C L. Rep. 532, and in that case the court expressly said it offered no opinion on the question whether the position held by a Wesleyan minister was "an office" within the meaning of the section, and all it decided was that on the facts the appellant had not proved that the qualifying property there had come to him by virtue of his appointment as minister. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We all agree that Foster v. Mulhall does not establish the proposition that an appointment of a Wesleyan minister is not a promotion to an office within the statute; and you may take it that the qualifying premises in the present case came to the appellant by virtue of his appointment to the ministry of the Gloucester circuit; but can you cite us any authority as to the meaning of the word "office" in the section?] I am unable to do so. It would seem from some text-books, however, that the office must be a freehold one; but that is certainly not the case, and if it were, then I could not contend for a moment that this is an appointment to a freehold office. I desire to argue that, having regard to the deed under which the manse here is held by a minister of the connexion and having regard to the Wesleyan chapel model deed—which evidence was not before the revising barrister—this court would be entitled to hold that the appointment by the conference is a promotion to an office, which would by the statute enable the minister to claim occupancy for the previous part of the twelve months by reason of his succession. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We cannot decide that point here. All we can do is to decide whether on the evidence before the revising barrister he was right in holding as he did. If you desire to rely on evidence not before him, you must raise the point again in another case.]

The respondent was not represented.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The question raised is of importance, as we are told it affects a very great number of Wesleyan ministers all over the country, who hitherto have lost their vote for the year because the appointments on the circuit take place in August, so that they are unable to claim residence for twelve months preceding the 15th of July, on which date the lists are made up. I do not wish to be thought to decide any question that is not really raised by the facts before us. The sole question here is simply, Was the revising barrister right in this instance on the evidence before him in holding that the appellant had not proved that the appointment of Wesleyan minister was a "promotion to an office" within the meaning of the statute? Certainly, even if the appointment was a "promotion," it must be established on other evidence than had been offered, that the position of Wesleyan minister was "an office" within the meaning of the statute. If a man made his claim without having the proper materials to support it, he could not, on appeal, ask the court to weigh fresh evidence which he did not bring forward before the revising barrister. There is nothing in the evidence that was offered to the revising barrister that would enable us to say that the revising barrister was wrong, and that the appellant's name should not have been removed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &c., OF BOURNEMOUTH. (a.)

Tramway—"Substantial commencement" of works—Notice in London Gazette*—"Conclusive evidence"—Tramways Act,* 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 18.

A notice purporting to be published by the Board of Trade in the London Gazette to the effect that the works of a tramway have not been substantially commenced, though made conclusive evidence of such non-commencement by section 18 of the Tramways Act, 1870, is not the only admissible evidence of such non-commencement.

"Substantial commencement" in the same section means the execution of physical works. Such preliminary steps as the buying of land for the erection of buildings and the entering into contracts for the supply of machinery and cars do not amount to a substantial commencement within the section.

In re Dudley and Kingswinford Tramways, 42 W. R. 126, disapproved.

Decision of Swinfen Eady, J., reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J.

The facts were as follows:

On the 6th of August, 1900, two Acts of Parliament were passed relating to tramways within and near the borough of Bournemouth. The one Act confirmed a provisional order empowering the corporation of Bournemouth to construct (among others) a tramway called Number 6, and the other Act empowered the Poole and District Electric Traction Co. to construct a tramway on the same site. The company's Act, however, provided that the company should not commence to construct its tramway till the 1st of August, 1902, and should not construct it at all if the corporation had in the meantime constructed their tramway. The corporation's provisional order incorporated the Tramways Act, 1870, section 18 of which is as follows: "If the promoters empowered by any provisional order under this Act to make a tramway do not, within two years from the date of the same or within any shorter period prescribed therein, complete the tramway and open it for public traffic, or if within one year from the date of the provisional order, or within such shorter time as is prescribed in the same, the works are not substantially commenced; or if the works having been commenced are suspended without a reason sufficient in the opinion of the Board of Trade to warrant such suspension; the powers given by the provisional order to the promoters for constructing such tramway, executing such works, or otherwise in relation thereto shall cease to be exercised, except as to so much of the same as is then completed, unless the time be prolonged by the special direction of the Board of Trade . . . A notice purporting to be published by the Board of Trade in the London Gazette to the effect that a tramway has not been completed and opened for public traffic, or that the works have not been substantially commenced, or that they have been suspended without sufficient reason, shall be conclusive evidence for the purposes of this section of such non-completion, non-commencement, or suspension." There had in this case been no prolongation of the time for commencement by the Board of Trade, though after the commencement of these proceedings the corporation had applied for a prolongation of the time for completion and opening, which the board had granted without prejudice to the litigation. The corporation's provisional order also contained a provision that the tramway should not be opened for public traffic till it had been inspected and certified by the Board of Trade.

These proceedings were an information by the Attorney-General on the relation of the company, and an action by the company claiming an injunction to restrain the corporation from proceeding with the construction of their tramway on the ground that their powers had expired, since they had not substantially commenced the tramway within one year. The corporation claimed that they had substantially commenced the tramway within that period. It was admitted that no works had been commenced on the actual line of tramway, and no roads had been broken up for the purpose, nor had any buildings in connection with the tramway been commenced, but the corporation, in particulars delivered by them, adduced as acts amounting to a "substantial commencement" certain steps towards the construction of the tramway taken by them within the year. These were, the purchase of a leasehold piece of ground as a site for a generating station and other buildings; two contracts for the supply of dynamos and machinery and tramcars, into which the corporation had entered with substantial firms on the 18th of April and the 16th of May, 1901, which contracts provided that the firms should put the work in hand at once, and making of plans of buildings, and the taking steps to procure a loan. It was also contended on behalf of the corporation that the notice of the board in the Gazette was not only conclusive evidence, but the only admissible evidence, of non-commencement.

On this point Swinfen Eady, J., said he should have followed the decision to that effect of Kekewich, J., in In re Dudley and Kingswinford Tramways, 42 W. R. 126, and he further held that the works had been substantially commenced by reason of the above-mentioned steps taken by the corporation.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Warmington, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the appellants.—"Works" means works of a tramway; actual physical work is necessary. Here the roads were not broken up nor the lines laid, and the Board of Trade notice in the Gazette is not made the only admissible evidence by the Act.

They referred to the Tramways Act, 1870, ss. 6 (2) and 18, and Schedule B., Part II., and to the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 2.

Vernon Smith, K.C., and Church, for the respondents.—The intention of the Act was to make the Board of Trade arbiter in regard to matter under section 18, and the jurisdiction of the High Court is excluded. [They referred to sections 8, 16, 20, 41, 42, and 33 of the Tramways Act, 1870.] As to the second point, the works authorized were substantially begun. Actual physical and manual work is not necessary. The Act cannot mean that we must take up the roads months before it is necessary. It is most in the public interest and convenience to break up the roads last. The Act says "substantially" commenced, not "actually."

R. J. Parker in reply.—If the dynamos, &c., were "works," they ought to have been obtained within the year, which they were not. But they are quite subsidiary matters.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am sorry to deliver this judgment, and would use any means of escape from it which I could discover, for the actual result does not, I think, accord with the true needs of the case; but I cannot see my way to construe the Act in any other way. The ground on which it is sought to restrain the corporation from proceeding with their tramway is based on section 18 of the Tramways Act, 1870. [His lordship read it, and continued:] It is said that the works authorized by the provisional order were not substantially commenced within the year, which time it is admitted, was not extended by the Board of Trade, and that it is therefore ultra vires of the corporation to continue the works. The first answer made to this is, that the only way of proving the non-commencement of the works is by the production of a notice published by the Board of Trade in the London Gazette to the effect that they have not substantially been commenced, and there has been no such notice. It is said that the words "conclusive evidence" in section 18 mean that the notice is to be the only evidence. I cannot agree in this. On this point Swinfen Eady, J., has not given any judgment upon his own reasoning, but says he would have followed the decision of Kekewich, J., in In re Dudley and Kingswinford Tramways, to the effect that the notice in the Gazette was the only evidence which the court would receive. We have, however, to determine the question, and I think it is not right to construe "conclusive evidence" as meaning the only evidence. It is said that if you look at the alternatives at the beginning of section 18 you will find that the board is to determine whether the events have occurred, and that therefore the evidence of their determination must be the only evidence. But in fact the board is only made arbiter, if at all, in the third case, that of suspension without some reason that satisfies the board; there is no such provision as to the other alternatives, and I think the decision of Kekewich, J., cannot be supported.

We have, therefore, to decide the other question, whether the works were substantially commenced within one year after the provisional order. Swinfen Eady, J., has held that they were, by reason of the meaning he places on the word "works" in the Act, which word he thinks is used in such sense as to include not only physical works actually executed, but the taking of any substantial step towards carrying out the undertaking—e.g., by giving orders for the execution of certain parts of the work and the buying of land for a generating station. I cannot agree to this. I think "substantial commencement" means the execution of physical works. Here no actual evidence was given, but particulars of the "substantial commencement" were asked for by the plaintiffs, among which are mentioned the contract of the 18th of April for the supply of dynamos, and that of the 16th of May for the supply of electric cars. It is admitted that no works were actually executed, nothing actually done as part of the works before the year had run out, but it is said that the giving of the orders in these two contracts amounts to a commencement. I cannot persuade myself that this is so. Giving an order is, after all, only an attempt to get something done by someone else; it is no more than evidence of an intention to execute works, and it would be doing violence to language to say that it is an actual and substantial commencement. Therefore the second alternative in section 18 comes into operation, and from that time the powers of the provisional order ceased, and the time was not prolonged by the board. There has since been made to the board an application to extend the time for completion, but this is based on the hypothesis that the time for commencement has been observed, and if Swinfen Eady, J., was wrong, the order for extension, made without prejudice to this litigation, goes for nothing, and subsequent completion cannot alter the case. Therefore there is nothing for it but to reverse the decision of Swinfen Eady, J., on the plain ground that there has been no substantial commencement within the year. I should have been glad if the Board of Trade could have put the matter right, and rectified what seems a mere slip, and it is said that the corporation, which probably knows best the wants of the town, cannot carry out works on which it has probably incurred considerable liabilities. Without, however, actually deciding the point, I cannot see how the board can help the corporation. The appeal must be allowed, with costs, and the order for an injunction must go, with the necessary declaration.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. It is said that the allowing of the appeal will inflict great hardship on the respondents, but we cannot allow this to affect our judgment, and, indeed, provisions like those of section 18 ought to be strictly enforced in the public interest. The short question is, Have the corporation substantially begun works within one year? They say, in the first place, that section 18 deals with the powers of promoters ceasing in three cases, and that with reference to these three cases the notice by the Board of Trade in the Gazette is made conclusive evidence, and that this, on the construction of the whole Act, means that it is the only admissible evidence. In other words, it is said that in determining whether the powers of the promoters have ceased the opinion of the board alone is to be looked at, and the High Court has no jurisdiction to consider the question. I think this contention is wrong. If Parliament had so intended it could have said this in clear language, and there is nothing in the Act providing for a determination of the question by the board. In the absence of express provision you can only infer it if it is a necessary inference from the rest of the Act, and I think it is not so here. It is certainly not to be inferred from the fact that in other parts of the Act special matters are confided to the decision of the board alone; on the contrary, the fact that such express provisions are made is an argument for the view that the board's decision was not intended to be final in other cases. But apart from this, the argument amounts to the insertion of the words "in the opinion of the board" in the first two alternatives of section 18 as well as in the third. But it is an almost inevitable inference that Parliament did not intend to imply those words in the first two alternatives, because they are really in contrast to the third. The first alternative also refers to the completion of the tramway, but the section goes on "and opened for public traffic." Here the provisional order said that the tramway was not to be opened for public traffic till inspected and certified fit by the Board of Trade; and this duty was thus thrown on the board by a special Act. As to the second question, the provision that the works must be substantially commenced within the year follows immediately after the provision as to completion and opening, and secures another provision in the public interest against delay on the part of promoters. Light is also thrown on the meaning of "works" by the following provision, that the power to construct or execute the works shall cease—which I think refers to works substantially commenced. The words must have their ordinary meaning given to them, and point to physical acts of the corporation or its agents. This interpretation is also supported by the definition of "works" in section 2 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, as works authorized to be executed. All these considerations point to the words being used in their popular and natural sense. The corporation say they have substantially commenced the works by buying some leasehold land on which they have done nothing. This cannot be a commencement. Besides this there are only the two contracts for the delivery of chattels or perhaps for the construction of works. Nothing has been done under these contracts, they have merely been entered into. The corporation have not even given a written order to the contractors to commence the work. Their contention wholly fails, and the appeal must be allowed, however hard it may be on them.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have little to add. I think to satisfy section 18 some substantial portion of the works must physically be set about. Here there were only negotiations, plans, estimates, contracts, and the purchase of leaseholds, and these are not enough. And it must be observed, as to the possibility of remedial action by the Board of Trade, that the time for making applications is fixed by the board's own rules made under the Act, which have the force of an Act.

Byrne, J. }

WALTER v. ASHTON. (a.)

Misrepresentation—Unauthorized use of name of another—Untrue representation that another person is connected in business with person making representation—Consequent liability of person about whom representation is made—Probability of injury—Interim injunction.

An injunction will be granted to restrain a person untruly representing that another is his principal, or partner, or connected with him in business when there is reasonable probability of injury arising to that other from the misrepresentation.

The defendant, by circulars, advertisements, and the general conduct of his business as a dealer in cycles, was held by the court to have intended the public to believe that the proprietors of a newspaper were either his principals or responsibly connected with him in the sale of his cycles. There was a reasonable probability of the proprietors of the newspaper being exposed to litigation, and perhaps made responsible, if they had not taken steps to disconnect themselves from the defendant.

Held, that the proprietors were entitled to an interim injunction to restrain the defendant until the trial or further order from holding himself out in this manner.

Motion.

This was a motion in an action brought on behalf of the proprietors of the Times newspaper against H. A. Ashton, for an injunction to restrain the defendant, his manager, servants, and agents, "from publishing advertisements, and issuing or distributing advertisements, circulars, or letters containing statements asserting or suggesting that cycles offered by him for sale are in fact offered for sale by the proprietors of the Times newspaper, or representing that he is carrying on business as a department of, or in connection with the Times newspaper, or in any way holding out the Times newspaper, or the proprietors thereof, to be the owners of his business"; and the present application was for an interim injunction to the same effect.

The facts relied on were as follows:

Some time previously the Times newspaper had published an edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, the Century Dictionary, and other works, and had sent out circulars with regard to their sale on thin paper printed in violet ink.

These circulars were headed "The Times Reprint of the Encyclopædia Britannica," and showed a system of deferred payments for the purchase of the work; and the words "The Times" were in the same old English type as that of the heading of the Times newspaper.

With these circulars were sent out green envelopes for replies, addressed, "The Manager, The Times, Printing House-square, London, E.C."

The defendant Ashton had, as it appeared, before the action devised a scheme for selling bicycles by instalments in a similar way to that in which the Times sold the Encyclopædia Britannica.

Subsequently he proposed to sell a fresh kind of cycle, by the name of "Times" bicycles, having upon them a clock face similar to that which appears in the Times newspaper over its theatrical advertisements. It was also brought to the knowledge of the manager of the Times newspaper that circulars with return envelopes similar in colour and appearance to those used by the Times newspaper had been issued. They were headed "59 and 60, Chancery-lane, W.C.," and stated that cheques were to be made in favour of "The Manager," and the statements in the circular were signed "The Manager." The name of the vendor was not given. The defendant also advertised his cycles in various newspapers as "The Times" cycles, and had upon the windows of his office at Chancery-lane the words "The Times" and underneath the word "Cycles." He had also at his business a man in uniform with the word "Times" on his cap. There was, however, no direct evidence of anyone having been actually deceived into thinking that the cycles advertised were those of the Times newspaper. Two persons, however, wrote to the Times newspaper office to inquire about the matter; and from the defendant's evidence it appeared that two or three persons had made similar inquiries at his office. The defendant also gave callers at his office documents with the "Times cycle" and the royal arms upon them, and speaking of "The Times" system of monthly payments.

The defendant denied that he had any intention of holding out to the public that he was connected in the cycle business with the Times newspaper.

Levett, K.C., and MacSwinney, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff does not claim the exclusive use of the name "Times" in connection with the sale of cycles, or with any particular method of payment for articles sold, but he is entitled to prevent the defendant holding the Times newspaper out as being connected with his business: Burchell v. Wilde, 48 W. R. 491, [1900] 1 Ch. 551.

Norton, K.C., and Edward Ford, for the defendant.—The defendant has a right to use the name "Times" in his business. He has not held himself out as a partner with the Times newspaper, and the plaintiffs have not shown that they are in any way injured by what he has done. In the case of Burchell v. Wilde the court refused the injunction asked for, and what the plaintiffs rely on in that case are observations in March 20.—BYRNE, J.—It is no part of the general business of a newspaper to carry on a cycle business, and this is not a question arising between rivals in trade. It appears to me that to entitle the proprietors of the Times to an interlocutory injunction they have to establish, first, that the defendant has represented the proprietors as his principals or partners, or, at least, as responsibly connected with his venture, and, secondly, that there is tangible probability of injury to their property in consequence of such representations. Mere annoyance is not enough, nor libel, not being trade libel; nor is a shadowy possibility of actions being brought enough. The case has to be considered apart from those cases turning on trade competition, infringement of trade rights, trade names, trade-mark, or the ordinary passing off equity. The plaintiff has, I think, founded his notice of motion on the only ground upon which, if at all, he is entitled to succeed upon the present application. [His lordship then stated the facts, and continued:] Taking all these matters together, having regard to the circulars, the advertisements, and the general conduct of the business carried on by the defendant in reference to these cycles, I have come to the conclusion on the present materials that he has intended to induce people to think that the proprietors of the Times newspaper are either the vendors, for whom the person in Chancery-lane, whoever he may be, is the manager of the department, or that they are partners, or in some way pecuniarily and with responsibility connected with the sale of these articles. Now how do the authorities stand with reference to this matter? In Routh v. Webster, 10 Beav. 561, where the defendants had published the name of the plaintiff as a director of the company without his authority, Lord Langdale says, at p. 562: "The name of Mr. Routh, who desired to have nothing to do with this concern, has been published to the world as a trustee; his name was also used at the bankers; and though he may not be subjected to the duties of trustee, yet it is plain that he is exposed to some risk by the unauthorized act of the defendants in using his name. . . . I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction." That case was referred to with approval by Lord Cairns in the Prudential Assurance Co. v. Knott, 23 W. R. 249, at p. 250, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 142, at p. 146. The case of Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112, when the court declined to restrain the sale of a quack medicine under the name of "Dr. Clark's Consumption Pills" has been frequently observed upon by judges, as by Lord Cairns in Maxwell v. Hogg, 15 W. R. 467, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 307, at p. 311, and by Lord Selborne who says In re Riviere's Trade-Mark, 32 W. R. 390, 26 Ch. D. 48, at p. 53, that Clark v. Freeman has seldom been cited but to be disapproved of; and Kekewich, J., in a recent case refused to follow it. I will refer to one other case which was cited to me in argument, Burchell v. Wilde. In that case the plaintiff and defendant had been in partnership and there was a dispute as to the right to use the old firm name; and Lord Lindley, 48 W. R, at p. 493, [1900] 1 Ch., at p. 563, says: "Apart from some express stipulation, a man has no right to hold out his late partner, or, indeed, anyone else, as his partner in business, and, if it could be shown that the defendants were holding out the plaintiffs as their partners, I should think (subject to what the defendants, whom we have not heard, might say) that the plaintiffs would be entitled to an injunction." And again: "As to the goodwill of the business and the use of the firm name, apart from any liability to which they may be exposing the plaintiffs, the defendants are in the right, and to my mind that liability is so shadowy that the appeal might to be dismissed." So that, in considering what kind of liability will justify interference, I think the court will be careful to see that the suggested liability was not something merely visionary or shadowy. The Partnership Act of 1890, s. 14 (1), provides: "Every one who by words spoken or written or by conduct represents himself, or who knowingly suffers himself to be represented, as a partner in a particular firm is liable as a partner to any one who has on the faith of any such representation given credit to the firm, whether the representation has or has not been made or communicated to the person so giving credit by or with the knowledge of the apparent partner making the representation, or suffering it to be made" This really is only a carrying out of a branch of the law really turning upon estoppel by conduct. If a man allows his name to be held out to the public as being the person responsible for the transaction in question, he may be held liable in consequence of such holding out, or in consequence of his conduct, because he has not taken steps which he should take to stop the unauthorized use of his name. I apprehend that would apply as well in the case of allowing a name to be held out by a man representing himself as agent or as principal in a particular transaction, all forming part, as I have said, of the general principle of estoppel by acts. Now in the present case the defence is chiefly founded on this. "I," said the defendant, "have done nothing that the law has not entitled me to do"; and, taking the single acts and matters complained of, he says, to begin with: "I am entitled to call my cycle 'Times Cycle' or 'The Times Cycle.' I am entitled to adopt for a mark upon it a similar clock to the clock used by the Times newspaper. I am entitled to have the hands of the clock pointing to the same hour." And he is perfectly right in what he says. Again, he says: "I am perfectly entitled to advertise my cycles as 'The Times Cycles' if that is the proper name of the cycle. I am entitled to advertise that payment is according to the Times system (meaning the Times newspaper system), the system inaugurated by the proprietors of the Times." So he is, and, thus taking each item one by one, he says: "I am entitled to do this, that, and the other." But the real question I have to consider is whether by what he has done he has in fact held out the proprietors of the Times as either being principals, or responsibly connected with him, or partners with him in the sale of these cycles. I have come to the conclusion that he has made such representation, and I have further come to the conclusion that there is such reasonable probability of the Times being exposed to litigation, and possibly, or even probably (though not so probably), being made responsible had they not taken the steps to disconnect their names from the advertisements and circulars that are issued by the defendant, that, although I have hesitated for some time as to whether I ought to do this upon an interlocutory motion, now that the action will come on so quickly for trial, when the matter might finally be disposed of upon further evidence still, I think that it is so clear upon the documents and the facts that I have mentioned that this case really falls within the line of authorities commencing with that which I cited before Lord Langdale, that I propose to grant an injunction.

I may make one other observation. Since the writ was issued the defendant has put out another advertisement in the Daily Mail in which he does state fairly conspicuously, though not so conspicuously as I should have wished, that it had no connection with any newspaper whatever. That will not do. The injunction I propose to grant is as follows: To restrain the defendant, his managers, servants, and agents, until the trial or further order, from representing that the cycles offered by him for sale are in fact offered for sale by the proprietors of the Times newspaper, or representing that he is carrying on business as a department of, or in connection with, the Times newspaper, or in any way holding out the Times newspaper, or the proprietors thereof, to be the owners of his business. The costs will be costs in the action.

Company—Special resolution—Amendment thereof—Validity—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 51.

Notice was given to the shareholders of a company convening an extraordinary general meeting at which a special resolution, of which a copy was given, was to be considered. At the meeting an amendment to the special resolution was proposed and carried. The amendment did not affect the form, but made a slight difference in the terms of the original resolution.

Held, that the alteration occasioned by the amendment did not invalidate the resolution.

This was an action brought by a shareholder in the Northern Nigeria Exploration Syndicate (Limited) to impeach the validity of a special resolution passed by the company, and to restrain the said defendant company from holding a meeting to confirm such resolution, and from giving effect to the same.

The company was incorporated on the 18th of October, 1901.

Article 79 of the articles of association provided that "The directors shall be paid out of the funds of the company by way of annual remuneration such a sum as shall be fixed by the five subscribers hereto in the memorandum which they shall sign appointing the first directors."

On the 24th of February, 1902, notice was given to the shareholders convening an extraordinary general meeting on the 4th of March for the purpose of considering and, if thought fit, passing the following resolution, that the articles of association be altered by substituting the following article for article 79: "Remuneration of directors.—After the shareholders shall have received dividends amounting in the aggregate to 100 per cent., there shall be paid to the directors, as remuneration for their services, a sum equal to 40 per cent. of all further profits of the syndicate, whether such profits arise from the sale of properties and assets of the syndicate or otherwise, and such 40 per cent. of the profits shall be divided amongst the directors in the proportion of 20 per cent. thereof to George Macdonald as managing director and the balance thereof between the remaining directors in such proportion as they may decide."

Previous to this meeting two new directors had been appointed.

At the meeting on the 4th of March, 1902, an amendment to the resolution was proposed and adopted, substituting 30 per cent. for 40 per cent. and 15 per cent. for 20 per cent., and the resolution as so amended was duly passed, the plaintiff being the only shareholder who voted against it.

A notice was subsequently issued convening a general meeting for the 20th of March, 1902, to confirm the special resolution which, as amended, was set forth fully in such notice.

On the 17th of March the plaintiff started this action.

Martelli, for the plaintiff.—The resolution is bad on two grounds: it does not disclose to the shareholders that the payment to the managing director was a voluntary payment, and the notice of the 24th of February did not give notice of the resolution actually passed. It is not competent to propose an amendment to a special resolution by section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862.

Counsel referred to the cases of Kaye v. Croydon Tramways Co., 46 W. R. 405, [1898] 1 Ch. 358; Tiessen v. Henderson, 47 W. R. 459, [1899] 1 Ch. 861.

Eve, K.C., and Coldridge, for defendants.

Martelli, in reply, referred to In re Trench Tubeless Tyre Co., Bethell v. Trench Tubeless Tyre Co., 48 W. R. 310, [1900] 1 Ch. 408.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—In my opinion the original notice was sufficient under the Act. The case differs wholly from Kaye v. Croydon Tramways Co., where there were in reality two proposals, one for the sale of the undertaking, and the other for the payment of a substantial sum to the directors as compensation for loss of office, and the latter was undisclosed. In the present case full notice was given of what was intended to be done. It is contended, however, that owing to the amendment no notice has been given of the resolution actually passed and that it is therefore invalid as a special resolution. This contention is not well founded. The resolution confirmed at the second meeting must no doubt be in the same form as that passed at the first meeting. In other words, the second meeting can only say aye or no to the resolution passed at the first meeting. But it is not necessary that the resolution passed at the first meeting should be in the identical terms of the resolution specified in the notice. Section 51 requires a special resolution to be passed "at any general meeting of which notice specifying the intention to propose such resolution has been duly given." If, therefore, proper and sufficient notice of the intention to propose the resolution is given, nothing more is required, and the resolution is not invalidated if, owing to an amendment at the first meeting, the resolution passed is not identical with that of the notice.

In the present case full notice was given of the intention to fix the directors' remuneration; and the only difference between the resolutions notified and passed is that the remuneration is reduced from 40 to 30 per cent., the proportion allocated to the general manager being unaltered.

I hold that the alteration did not invalidate the resolution, and I therefore dismiss the action with costs.

Appeal from county court.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the decision of his Honour Judge Martineau at the Brighton County Court.

The plaintiff was the owner of a house, No. 25, Brunswick-terrace, Brighton, which he let furnished to the defendant for the period of one year.

The letting of the house was by a memorandum not under seal in which the words used were "the lessor agrees to let." It did not contain the word "demise" or "grant," and there was no express covenant for quiet enjoyment.

It appeared from the evidence that under a private Act applying to Brunswick-terrace the owners were bound to paint the outsides of the houses on certain years. In default the commissioners under the Act were empowered to enter and paint them. The year of the defendant's tenancy was one of those on which the houses were to be painted. This fact, the county court judge found, was forgotten by the plaintiff at the time she let the house to the defendant.

After the defendant had gone into possession of the house, notices were served there, addressed to the plaintiff, requiring the exterior of the house to be painted in accordance with the provisions of the private Act. On these being brought to plaintiff's attention she brought pressure to bear upon the defendant, with the effect that the latter consented to the painting. In consequence of the smell of the paint the defendant was obliged to leave the house for a period of about a fortnight.

At the expiration of his tenancy the plaintiff sued the defendant for dilapidations. The defendant filed a counterclaim for damages for breach by the plaintiff of an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant that a covenant or promise for quiet enjoyment arose out of the relation of landlord and tenant, and that there was no need that any technical words should be used in the agreement in order to imply it. For the plaintiff it was contended that a covenant for quiet enjoyment was implied only when the word "demise" was used.

The learned county court judge, after reviewing the authorities, was of opinion that he was bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons, 44 W. R. 328, [1895] 2 Q. B. 610, and that as the agreement for tenancy did not contain the word "demise," a covenant for quiet enjoyment could not be implied; and further, that there had therefore been no breach of such a covenant. If, however, the defendant were entitled to recover then he assessed the damages at £15.

The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim and counterclaim.

The defendant now appealed on the ground that the learned judge was wrong in law in holding that there was no implied covenant for quiet enjoyment in the agreement made between the parties, and on which the defendant counterclaimed, and that, upon the evidence, the learned judge should have held that there had been a breach of such implied covenant by the plaintiff and should have entered judgment for the amount at which he provisionally assessed the damages.

E. E. Humphrys, for the appellant.—A covenant or contract for quiet enjoyment is implied from the mere fact of the relationship of landlord and tenant. It is not necessary to employ any particular word in the lease to establish such covenant, Bandy v. Cartwright, 1 W. R. 415, 8 Exch. 913; Hall v. City of London Brewery Co., 2 B. & S. 737, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 86. The word "let" in a lease not under seal implies a contract for quiet enjoyment against the lessor and all that come in under him by title: see Shep. Touchstone, 165, 167, and per Parke, B., in Hart v. Windsor, 12 M. & W. 68, at p. 85; Mostyn v. West Mostyn Coal and Iron Co., 24 W. R. 401, 1 C. P. D. 145, at p. 152; Robinson v. Kilvert, 37 W. R. 545, 41 Ch. D. 88, at p. 96; Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons, 44 W. R. 328, [1895] 1 Q. B. 820, at pp. 825, 826 It is true that in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons Kay, L.J., expressed the opinion that a covenant for quiet enjoyment can only be implied when the word "demise" is used in the lease, but the authorities (passages from Sheppard's Touchstone and from Bacon's and Viner's Abridgments, and Nokes's case, 4 Rep. 80b) cited by that learned judge in support of that view do not really support such proposition. Further, as a matter of fact there has been a breach of this implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, for the learned county court judge has found that owing to the smell arising from the painting of the house the defendant was obliged to leave it for a fortnight, and therefore his quiet enjoyment of the premises was interfered with: see per Fry, L.J., in Sanderson v. Berwick-upon-Tweed Corporation, 33 W. R. 67, 13 Q. B. D. 547; per Lindley, L.J., in Robinson v. Kilvert.

H. Jacobs, for the respondent.—Bandy v. Cartwright is not an authority on the point now raised. That case merely decided that where a covenant will be implied in a deed it will be implied in an agreement not under seal. Hall v. City of London Brewery Co. merely followed that case. Those two cases, together with Hart v. Windsor and Mostyn v. West Mostyn Coal and Iron Co., were dealt with by the Court of Appeal in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons, where it was held that the word "demise" is necessary to establish an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, and that the mere relation of landlord and tenant or the use of the words "agree to let" are not sufficient for that purpose: see also Messent v. Reynolds 3 C. B. 194, and Platt on Covenants, p. 46. Further, even if a covenant for quiet enjoyment can be implied here there has been no breach thereof. In order to constitute a breach of such a covenant, which is a covenant for title, there must be an actual dispossession adverse to the tenant. That is not shown here. The tenant in this case could have remained in the house while the painting was being done: Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I cannot say that this case is free from difficulty. The difficulty is, which of the principles put forward by the one side or the other should decide the matter. In many cases, no doubt, the law attributes a certain effect to certain terms, and to produce that effect those terms and no others must be used. It is contended for the plaintiff in this case that the common law has given a particular effect and meaning to the word "demise," and to that word only. On the other hand it is said that the covenant or contract for quiet enjoyment does not result from the use of any special word in the agreement of letting, but from the relation of landlord and tenant itself. Considering the question apart from authority, it seems common sense that when one person agrees to give another possession of his house for a time that ought to imply that the landlord and anyone claiming under him will not during that time dispossess the tenant. This, I say, seems good sense, and, unless driven to do so by authority, I should hesitate to draw any distinction between the contract to be implied from the use of the word "demise" and that to be implied from the use of the words "agrees to let." It is true that in Baynes & Co v. Lloyd & Sons Kay, L.J., did say: "The weight of authority is in favour of the view that a covenant in law is not implied from the mere relation of landlord and tenant, but only from certain words used in creating the lease." Speaking for myself, I should certainly not have come to that conclusion, although it cannot be said that the authorities do not differ on the point. In Line v. Stephenson, 5 Bing. N. C. 183, it was held that a covenant for quiet enjoyment was implied by the use of the word "demise," but I do not think that Lord Denman intended that his judgment should be based solely on the use of that word. Then there is the case of Bandy v. Cartwright. Apart from the criticism of Kay, L.J., that the court had assumed that the word "demise" had been used in the letting, I think that the judgment proceeded on the principle that it was the relationship of landlord and tenant which created the covenant or contract for quiet enjoyment. Pollock, C.B., said: "In this case the plaintiff sued upon what he described in his declaration to be a covenant for quiet enjoyment and for good title. It appeared that the defendant had demised the land in question to the plaintiff at a given rent by parol, but there was no actual covenant, and therefore there was only that covenant which the law would imply. We are of opinion that that is not a covenant for good title, but for quiet enjoyment during the term." It may be that the word "demise" was used in the parol agreement, and that it was to this that Pollock, C.B. referred, but there is nothing to this effect in the report. The decision was not understood in this sense in Hall v. City of London Brewery Co., because there Cockburn, C. J., said: "We cannot overrule Bandy v. Cartwright, and it is inconsistent with common sense that, when a man is let into possession for a year, a promise by the lessor for quiet enjoyment against himself and all that claim by title under him should not be implied." With these expressions before me, I must come to the conclusion that the Lord Chief Justice's judgment did not turn on the use of the word "demise," but that it was based on the principle that the condition for quiet enjoyment arose out of the relation of landlord and tenant. In this case, too, all the authorities were cited and considered. Further, he said in giving judgment: "Bandy v. Cartwright is a direct authority that a contract for quiet enjoyment is implied in a contract of demise, and I think that case is good law." Of course the expression "contract of demise" is much wider than the phrase "a contract in which the word 'demise' is used."

The principle laid down in Hart v. Windsor is to the same effect. In Mostyn v. West Mostyn Coal and Iron Co. Lord Esher (then Brett, J.) says: "I think the case of Line v. Stephenson is an authority to show that where an indenture of lease contains the word 'demise,' then if there be no express covenant for title or quiet enjoyment, there is an implied covenant that the lessor has a good title and that the lessee shall have quiet enjoyment. . . . Hart v. Windsor is an authority that the word 'let' has the same effect in this respect as the word 'demise' and that any other equivalent word would have the same effect." Again, in Robinson v. Kilvert Lindley, L.J., says that Bandy v. Cartwright shows that under a demise by parol there is an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment. As against these authorities there is the dictum of Kay, L.J., in the case of Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons that the weight of authority is in favour of the proposition that a covenant for quiet enjoyment is only implied from the use of the word "demise" I am not of opinion that we are bound to treat the case of Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons as an authority binding upon us on this point, as the county court judge has done. It seems to me that there are authorities to the contrary of the view expressed by Kay, L.J., and I myself come to the conclusion that, where there is a letting, a covenant or contract for quiet enjoyment arises out of the relationship of landlord and tenant, and does not depend on the use in the letting of the word "demise." That, I think, is the true basis on which this case is to be decided.

As to the other point—namely, whether or not there has been any breach of the implied covenant—I entertain some doubt. The finding of the county court judge is that the plaintiff, being under a statutory obligation to paint the house subject to the right of the commissioners under the private Act to do so if she made default, insisted on doing the painting herself, and thus by her act rendered it necessary for the defendant and her family to leave the house for a fortnight. I think this must be taken as a finding that the act of the plaintiff deprived the defendant of the possession of the house for that term. That being so, I am of opinion that the statutory duty which was in existence before the plaintiff let her house is no defence to the counterclaim. The plaintiff when letting could have made it a condition that she was to be permitted to do the painting during the tenancy. I think, therefore, that the defendant is entitled to judgment for the £15 at which the county court judge assessed the damages. I think I should add, as to the first point, that it is clear that the learned judge would have decided it as we are doing had he not felt himself bound by the opinion of the Court of Appeal as expressed in the judgment of Kay, L.J., in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that the use of the word "demise" in a lease implies a covenant for quiet enjoyment, but I think the authorities enable us to hold that the use of any other word equivalent to "demise" has the same effect. It seems not to be questioned that, apart from 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, a similar covenant would be implied by the use of the word "grant." The use either of "let" or "grant," it is expressly stated in Shep. Touchstone, implied a covenant for quiet enjoyment. It is clear that nothing more passes under a lease using the word "demise" or "grant" than would pass under one using the words "agree to let"; but it is contended that, while either of the former would imply a covenant for quiet enjoyment, the latter would not. No reason is given for the distinction, but there is said to be authority for it, and the words of Kay, L.J., in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons are relied upon. I do not think that the authorities the Lord Justice refers to in support of his observations really prove his proposition or are inconsistent with the view that the covenant may be implied from the mere relationship of landlord and tenant. He says: "At pp. 271, 272 of the Touchstone it is said that the most usual and proper words for making a lease are 'demise, grant, and to ferme let,' but that other words—'whatsoever word will amount to a grant'—such as 'give, betake, or the like,' will make the lease; but it is not said that there is any implication of a covenant from any of those other words." But the question of covenants was not being dealt with there; implication of covenants is treated of in quite another place. The passage to which Kay, L.J., is here referring occurs in chapter 14 of the Touchstone—at p. 272—and is as follows: "Albeit the most usual and proper making of a lease is by the words 'demise,' 'grant,' and 'to ferme let' "—which I take to mean to securely let—"and with an habendum for life or years, yet a lease may be made by other words; for whatsoever word will amount to a grant will amount to a lease. And therefore a lease may be made by the word 'give,' 'betake,' or the like. The word 'locavit' also is a good word. And the use in the Exchequer is to make leases by the word 'committimus,' which is a good word to make a lease. And if A. do let, grant, and covenant with B. that B. shall enjoy such a piece of land for twenty years; this is a good lease for twenty years. So if A. promise to B. to suffer him to enjoy such a piece of land for twenty years; this is a good lease for twenty years. So if A. license B. to enjoy such a piece of land for twenty years; this is a good lease for twenty years. And therefore it is the common course, if a man make a feoffment in fee, or other estate, upon condition, that if such a thing be, or be not, done at such a time, that the feoffer, &c., shall re-enter, to the end that in this case the feoffer, &c., may have the land and continue in possession until that time, to make a covenant that he shall hold and take the profits of the land until that time; and this covenant in this case will make a good lease for that time, if the uncertainty of the time (whereunto care must be had) do not make it void." Now, nothing here is said about the implication of covenants, but at the same time nothing is said about any distinction in the operation or effect of leases made in these different ways. The discussion of the implication of covenants occurs before, in chapter 7, where at p. 165 it is said that a covenant for quiet enjoyment is implied by the use of the word "demise" or "grant." But the author nowhere says that the use of the word "let" does not imply such a covenant, while he does say that the word "let" is equally proper to create a lease as the word "demise" or "grant" in the passage which I have just read. So far as the words of the Touchstone go, they are in no way inconsistent with the view that the covenant for quiet enjoyment may be implied from any words establishing the relation of landlord and tenant. Another citation relied upon by Kay, L.J., is from Viner's Abridgment, Covenant F: "Action of covenant lies upon the words 'demise' and 'grant' in an indenture of lease, though there are no words comprehending a warranty in them." This, however, is far from saying that no other words than "demise" or "grant" will imply the covenant. The Lord Justice then cites a passage from Bacon's Abridgment, Covenant B, where it is said that a covenant is implied without other words in the lease by the words "concessi" and "demisi." But it is not said that no other words will have that effect. It seems to me, therefore, that the dictum of Kay, L.J., in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons is not established by the authorities cited in its support, while it is contrary to the decisions in Bandy v. Cartwright and Hall v. City of London Brewery Co., which are direct authorities on the point, and for these reasons I think we should not follow it. Upon the second point I agree, and have nothing to add.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I must confess that, until I read the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons, I always thought it was settled law that from the mere fact of letting there arose some undertaking on the part of the landlord that he should not disturb the tenant's enjoyment. The only possible question was, I thought, as to the extent of the undertaking, which was, I thought, limited to the duration of the lessor's interest.

If limited in this way, the undertaking would seem, as was pointed out by Cockburn, C.J., in Hall v. City of London Brewery Co., to be nothing more than that which common sense would import into the act of agreeing to give possession of land for a certain time. Surely if a man lets a house for a year he must be held to undertake that he himself will not interfere with the possession of his tenant during that time, and it seems only reasonable that his undertaking should be held to extend to those claiming under him.

If you attempt to extend that undertaking so as to make the landlord responsible for the acts of a person having a legal right to interfere with the tenant's possession—then you introduce something which is certainly not necessarily implied by the relationship of landlord and tenant. This I understood was settled law as shown by the decisions in Bandy v. Cartwright and Hall v. City of London Brewery Co. Then we come to the case of Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons. All that case decides is that the covenant, if any, which arose from the letting there would determine on the expiration of the lessor's interest, and that consequently ejectment of the tenant by a person claiming by title paramount would be no breach of it. But while that case is no decision on the present point, yet there is an expression of opinion by Kay, L.J., to the effect that a covenant for quiet enjoyment does not arise out of the mere relationship of landlord and tenant. This opinion is certainly opposed to that held by all writers of text-books up to that time, and also to the decisions in Bandy v. Cartwright and Hall v. City of London Brewery Co. Under the circumstances I think we are entitled to decide the matter for ourselves on our own view of the law. I am not surprised that the county court judge felt himself bound by the dicta of Kay, L.J., in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Baynes & Co v. Lloyd & Sons, but we are not so bound, and we can, I think, follow our own judgment.

On the second point in the case I entertain considerable doubt. It is not at all clear to me that there was such an interference by the plaintiff with the possession of the defendant as to amount to a breach of the undertaking for quiet enjoyment. In all cases, however, this is a question of fact, and in this case I think that in substance the county court judge has found that, if there was an implied undertaking for quiet enjoyment, there was a breach of that undertaking. Therefore, although the question is, I think, a doubtful one, I agree that it is concluded by the finding of the county court judge.

Criminal law—Conspiracy—Joint indictment of three persons—Plea of "Guilty" by one—Verdict of "Not guilty" in respect of the others—Withdrawal of plea before sentence—Jurisdiction to allow withdrawal—Crown Cases Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 78), s. 1.

The appellant and two other persons were jointly charged on an indictment which contained five counts for obtaining money by false pretences, and a sixth count for conspiring to defraud the Thames Conservators. The sixth count did not allege that there were any other or unknown parties to the conspiracy. All three defendants were indicted in one arraignment. All pleaded "Not guilty" to the first five counts. The appellant pleaded "Guilty" to the sixth count; the other defendants pleaded "Not guilty" to the sixth count as well as to the first five counts. The jury returned a verdict of "Not guilty" in favour of the appellant on the first five counts, and the trial of the other defendants proceeded, and the appellant was called as a witness on behalf of the prosecution. The jury found the two defendants "Not guilty" on all the six counts. The appellant thereupon requested to be allowed to withdraw his plea of "Guilty" on the sixth count. The court of quarter sessions held they had no jurisdiction to allow the withdrawal, and convicted him.

Held, on appeal, that the judgment passed against the appellant was bad, and could not stand.

Held, further, that the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction to allow the appellant to withdraw the plea of "Guilty" and plead "Not guilty" before passing sentence upon him.

Held, further, that a question arising on a plea of "Guilty" is a question arising "on the trial," within the meaning of section 1 of the Crown Cases Act, 1848, and that, therefore, the Court for Crown Cases had power under section 2 of that Act to entertain a case reserving that question, and in the exercise of such power to make such order as justice may require.

Case stated for the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved by the chairman of the Berkshire Quarter Sessions.

At the Easter quarter sessions held in and for the county of Berks on the 7th of April, 1902, William Fenton, Robert Edwin Plummer, and Charles Wheeler were indicted for obtaining money by false pretences, and for conspiring to defraud the Thames Conservators.

Counts 1 to 5 of the indictment referred to false pretences, and are not material to the present case.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The sixth count was one for conspiring, and the following is a copy of it:

"And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that the said Robert Edwin Plummer, Charles Wheeler and William Fenton on the 1st day of April in the year of our Lord 1893 and on divers days between that day and the 1st day of February, 1902, unlawfully, fraudulently, and deceitfully did amongst themselves conspire, combine, confederate and agree together by divers false pretences and unlawful and subtle ways, means, stratagems and devices to obtain and acquire to themselves of and from the Conservators of the River Thames divers large sums of money of the said Conservators of the River Thames and to cheat and defraud them thereof to the evil example of all others in like manner offending and against the peace of our said Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity."

At the trial the present appellant (Plummer) pleaded guilty to the conspiracy count above set out, and a verdict of not guilty was returned in his favour upon the other counts in the indictment. He was subsequently called as a witness for the prosecution against the prisoners William Fenton and Charles Wheeler.

The other two prisoners, William Fenton and Charles Wheeler, were, by the jury, found not guilty upon the whole indictment.

Immediately after the verdict of not guilty was recorded in favour of the prisoners William Fenton and Charles Wheeler, counsel for the prisoner Robert Edwin Plummer submitted to the court that the prisoner Robert Edwin Plummer could not be convicted and punished, and that no further step could be taken upon the indictment, and claimed that he should be acquitted.

The chairman considered the contention in the last paragraph untenable and so intimated, whereupon counsel for the said Robert Edwin Plummer asked for leave to withdraw the plea of guilty which had already been entered for him and in place thereof to enter a plea of not guilty.

This the chairman considered he had no power to do and refused to grant the application.

On application by counsel for the prisoner Robert Edwin Plummer, the chairman consented to state a case for the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved as to whether, after the verdict returned in favour of the prisoners William Fenton and Charles Wheeler, any conviction could be established and recorded on the sixth count of the indictment against the prisoner Robert Edwin Plummer, and as to whether the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction to allow the prisoner Robert Edwin Plummer to withdraw his plea and enter a plea of not guilty. After hearing the said arguments and giving his decision thereon the chairman proceeded to pass sentences upon the said Robert Edwin Plummer, but respited this and admitted the said prisoner to bail pending the hearing of this case.

The points for the consideration of the court were: First, whether in the aforesaid circumstances a conviction could be recorded and judgment passed upon the prisoner Robert Edwin Plummer.

Secondly, whether the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction to permit the prisoner Robert Edwin Plummer to withdraw his plea and enter a plea of "not guilty."

Thirdly, if the court of quarter sessions was wrong in giving judgment and passing sentence, then what course ought to have been taken.

Dickens, K.C. (A. J. David with him), for the appellant.—The ruling of the chairman of quarter sessions was wrong, and judgment ought not to have been passed upon the appellant. Where several persons are tried on a joint indictment for conspiracy, one being convicted and the others acquitted, the conviction of the one is bad and judgment should not be passed upon him: Harrison v. Errington, Popham 302; Rex v Sudbury, 12 Mod. 262; 2 Hawk. P. C. (8th ed.), c. 47, pp. 621, 622; Reg. v. Manning, 32 W. R. 720, 12 Q. B. D. 241; Chitty's Criminal Law, vol. 3, 1141. It is true that where several persons are jointly indicted for conspiracy and one of them is tried alone and convicted sentence may be passed upon him (Rex v. Cooke, 5 B. & C. 538; Reg. v. Ahearne, 6 Cox Cr. Cas. 6), but if the others be subsequently tried and acquitted such acquittal avoids the conviction of the first. The result must be the same if the first one instead of being found guilty pleads guilty. It is immaterial whether the conviction follows from a verdict of guilty or a plea of guilty. At the time when the appellant was sentenced it appeared upon the record that the other prisoners had been acquitted, and there was therefore inconsistency on the records upon which the judgment proceeded. The chairman was wrong in holding that he had no jurisdiction to allow the appellant to withdraw his plea of guilty: Reg. v. Sell, 9 C. & P. 346; Reg. v. Clouter and Heath, 8 Cox Cr. Cas. 237. For these reasons the conviction ought to be quashed.

Counsel also referred to Reg. v. Brown, 38 W. R. 95, 24 Q. B. D. 357, as distinguishing Reg. v. Clark, 15 W. R. 48, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 54; also Rex v. Waddington, 1 East 143.

Frampton (Biron with him), appeared for the prosecution, but were not instructed to argue.

June 14.—WRIGHT, J., delivered the following written judgment: The appellant and two other persons were indicted together upon an indictment which contained five counts, charging the obtaining of money by false pretences, and also a sixth count alleging a conspiracy between the three defendants to defraud the prosecutors. The sixth count did not allege that there was any other or unknown party to the conspiracy. All three defendants were included in one arraignment. All pleaded not guilty to the five counts; the appellant pleaded guilty to the sixth count, the other defendants pleading not guilty. Thereupon it is stated in the case a verdict of not guilty was returned in favour of the appellant on the first five counts, and the trial of the other defendants proceeded, and the appellant was called as a witness against them. The court must infer that the appellant was given in charge to the jury upon the five counts in order that the jury might find a verdict in his favour upon them. The jury acquitted the other defendants upon all the six counts. Counsel for the appellant thereupon claimed that no judgment could be passed upon the appellant in respect of his plea of guilty to the count for conspiracy, inasmuch as the jury by their verdict in favour of the only other alleged parties to the conspiracy had negatived any conspiracy.

So far as we have been able to discover there is no reported precedent which on the facts is exactly in point. There is much authority to the effect that, if the appellant had pleaded not guilty to the charge of conspiracy, and the trial of all three defendants together had proceeded on that charge and had resulted in the conviction of the appellant and the acquittal of the only alleged co-conspirators, no judgment could have been passed on the appellant, because the verdict must have been regarded as repugnant in finding that there was a criminal agreement between the appellant and the others and none between them and him: see Harrison v. Errington, where upon an indictment of three for riot, two were found not guilty, and one guilty, and upon error brought it was held a void verdict. So in Rex v. Sudbury, where only two out of three were found guilty of riot the judgment was arrested. So in Chitty's Criminal Law, vol. 3, p. 1141, on the authority of these cases it is stated: "And it is holden, that if all the defendants mentioned in the indictment, except one, are acquitted, and it is not stated as a conspiracy with certain persons unknown, the conviction of the single defendant will be invalid and no judgment can be passed upon him." So in Reg v. Thompson, 16 Q. B. 832, at p. 844, Lord Campbell, L.C.J.: "Where the indictment is that three defendants conspired, the acquittal of two involves the acquittal of the third." In Reg. v. Manning this doctrine was perhaps somewhat extended. There two persons were put on their trial together at nisi prius for a conspiracy, no other parties being alleged. The jury convicted one with sanction of the judge, although they were unable to agree and were discharged as to the other, and upon a rule moved for a new trial it was held by Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., and Mathew and Stephen, JJ., that there had been a misdirection. The issue, Mathew, J., said, was whether both were guilty, and the jury had not agreed on that issue. It is true that the judgments in Reg. v. Manning purport to be based mainly on an opinion of the judges in O'Connell and Others v. Reg., 11 Cl. & F. 155, which does not seem to us to affect the present question, but the decision itself is in accordance with the previous authorities, which appear to establish that the mere possibility of the one defendant having been acquitted by reason of evidence not being forthcoming or admissible against him, which was forthcoming or admissible against the other who has been tried with him, is not enough to cure the inconsistency apparent on the record. It is equally clear, on the other hand, that if the appellant had been arraigned and tried alone for the conspiracy, and had been convicted, his conviction would have been good at the time, and judgment could have been pronounced against him, although the other persons included in the indictment had not appeared, or were dead, or the trial of them had been postponed: see Rex v. Nichols, 13 East 412*n*; Rex v. Scott, 3 Burr. 1262; Rex v. Cooke; and Reg. v. Ahearne, in which case, however, it is difficult to see how this question really arose at all since the indictment was not for a mere conspiracy to murder, but for an actual murder, though laid with an averment of conspiracy, as appears from the sentence of death as reported in 2 Ir. C. L. Rep. 381. It is, however, not clearly settled whether in such a case of separate trials a subsequent acquittal of the other would not make void the previous conviction of the appellant. So if in the present case the appellant had been sentenced—as he might have been—immediately upon his pleading guilty to the charge of conspiracy, the sentence would have been right when passed; but it is not certain whether upon the acquittal of the other defendants the sentence upon him must not have been vacated or treated as erroneous, just as judgment against an accessory passed during the attainder of the principal was good during the attainder, but was ipso facto avoided when the attainder was removed: 1 Hale P. C. 625; Lord Sanchar's case, 9 Rep. 114*a*. In Rex v. Cooke Littledale, J., suggested that a similar consequence might follow from the acquittal of the alleged co-conspirator at his own separate trial, and the same suggestion is made in the head-note to Reg. v. Ahearne, though not so distinctly in the judgments. This suggestion is questioned by Mr. Greaves in Russell on Crimes (4th ed.), vol. 3, p. 146, but on grounds which would be to a large extent applicable to the case of a joint trial, and are therefore insufficient upon the authorities which have been cited. The present case may be regarded as an intermediate between the case of a wholly joint trial and the case of separate trials of the alleged co-conspirators. The appellant and his co-defendants were jointly indicted, they were arraigned together, they all pleaded not guilty to the five principal counts, there was only one venire, they were all apparently given in charge, as I have pointed out, to the same jury. If error had been brought one record would have been made up, as in Lord Sanchar's case, where the plea of guilty by one prisoner and the verdict of the jury as to the other are set out, and the same record would have shown the inconsistent plea and verdict.

We think that under these circumstances the trial ought to be regarded as in substance joint, and that the plea of guilty ought not to be followed by judgment. There is an authority to this effect which, although not a decision, cannot be disregarded; the very case is put in Robinson v. Robinson, 1 Sw. & Tr. 362, where Cockburn, L.C.J., says: "The case of an indictment against two persons for conspiracy suggested an apparent analogy, and as in such a case a plea of guilty by the one, if followed by the acquittal of the other, would not have supported a judgment of guilty against the delinquent confessing and pleading guilty. . . ." This passage is treated by one of the judges in Reg. v. Manning as a mere dictum, but in truth it was this very analogy which the court in Robinson v. Robinson had to consider and reject or adopt, and it forms part of a considered judgment of Cockburn, L.C.J., Wightman, J., and Sir C. Cresswell, no mean authorities on criminal law. It seems also to be supported by the language of Lee, C.J., in Rex v. Nichols, who said: ". . . One being acquitted on record the conviction of his companion on the same record must be directly repugnant and contradictory to the other"; and there is nothing in the context to exclude the application of this language to a conviction on a plea of guilty. Even apart from the conclusion of strict law at which we have arrived we think that the unfettered power which the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78 (the Crown Cases Reserved Act) confers upon this court to make such order as justice may require might in this case be exercised in favour of the appellant, who has been acquitted of the more serious charges alleged in the indictment, and who in pleading guilty to the minor charge may have done so under misapprehensions of various kinds, and who certainly did not plead guilty to any separate offence. And so, before the statute, in Rex. v. Waddington, it was said that, even where a convicted prisoner waived his motion in arrest of judgment, the court would not pass sentence if they could see that no crime was shown.

A second point raised in the case is whether the court had power to allow the defendant to withdraw his plea of guilty. There cannot be any doubt that the court had such power at any time before, though not after, judgment, see Reg. v. Clouter and Heath and Reg. v. Sell, and as we infer that but for the erroneous opinion that there was no such power the withdrawal would have been allowed, this might of itself be a ground for a venire de novo (Reg. v. Yeadon, 10 W. R. 64, 31 L. J. M. C. 70), the indictment being for a misdemeanour. Lastly, it is necessary to observe that, in entertaining this case, notwithstanding that the appellant pleaded guilty, we adopt the construction of the Act which recommended itself to the court in Reg. v. Brown in preference to the decision in Reg. v. Clark, where it was held that a question arising upon a plea of guilty was not a question arising upon a trial.

BRUCE, J., read the following judgment: I agree with the judgment of Wright, J., and with the reasons he has given. I do not propose to go through the authorities cited by him, but I wish to make a few observations of my own tending to the same conclusion on somewhat different grounds. I think the statement in Chitty's Criminal Law (2nd ed.), vol. 3, p. 1141, is correct and is fully supported by the authorities. The statement is as follows: "And it is holden that if all the defendants mentioned in the indictment, except one, are acquitted, and it is not stated as a conspiracy with certain persons unknown, the conviction of the single defendant will be invalid and no judgment can be passed upon him." That passage seems to me to apply exactly to the present case. The point of the passage turns upon the circumstance that the defendants are included in the same indictment, and I think it logically follows from the nature of the offence of conspiracy that, when two or more persons are charged in the same indictment with conspiracy with one another, and the indictment contains no charge of their conspiracy with other persons not named in the indictment, then, if all but one of the prisoners named in the indictment are acquitted, no valid judgment can be passed upon the one remaining person, whether he has been convicted by the verdict of a jury or upon his own confession, because, as the record of the conviction can only be made up in the terms of the indictment, it would be inconsistent and contradictory and so bad on the face of it. The gist of the crime of conspiracy is that two or more persons did combine, confederate and agree together to carry out the object of the conspiracy. To quote from Sir William Erle on Trade Unions, p. 31: "With respect to the crimes classed under the term 'conspiracy' the external act of the crime is concert, by which mutual consent to a common purpose is exchanged." Where the indictment charges that A., B., and C. combined, confederated, and agreed together to do a certain thing, and A. and B. are acquitted by the verdict of a jury from the charge, it is inconsistent with that finding that there could have been any combination, confederation, and agreement between them and C., and unless they combined, confederated, and agreed with C., C. cannot be found guilty of the charge. It seems to me it matters not whether the trial of A., B., and C. took place at the same time or not, so long as they are charged upon one indictment. Only one record can be drawn up based upon that indictment; if the proceedings have taken such a course as to negative mutual consent to a common purpose by all but one of the parties who are alleged to have conspired together, no valid record of a conviction against that one can be drawn up. If the record finds that A. and B. are acquitted on a charge of agreeing together with C. the same record cannot without inconsistency find that C. agreed together with A. and B. As to the note in Russell on Crimes, vol. 3, p. 146 (4th ed.), referred to in the judgment of Wright, J., where it is suggested that a verdict of not guilty is not to be taken as establishing the innocence of the person acquitted because the verdict may have been arrived at simply in consequence of the absence of evidence to prove his guilt, I think it is a very dangerous principle to adopt to regard a verdict of not guilty as not fully establishing the innocence of the person to whom it relates. If it is to be applied at all it would apply to persons tried at the same time, and yet it is perfectly clear upon the authorities that if two persons are tried together upon a charge of conspiring with one another, and one is acquitted by the jury and the other convicted, the conviction cannot stand, although it is perfectly clear that the verdict of acquittal may have been obtained simply upon the ground that there was a failure of evidence to establish the charge against the person who was acquitted.

There is another point in the case. It is clear that the court had power to allow the appellant to withdraw his plea of guilty. The court, no doubt, had a discretion in the matter, and if the court had exercised its discretion it may be that that would be final, and we should have no power to interfere with the exercise of its discretion. But the court, acting upon the erroneous opinion that it had no power to allow the withdrawal of the plea, never did exercise its discretion. If it had exercised its discretion it is quite possible that it might have allowed the withdrawal of the plea, and if it had allowed the withdrawal of the plea of guilty and allowed the appellant to plead not guilty, and he had been tried by the same jury who acquitted the other defendants or by another jury, it is quite possible that he would have been acquitted. The appellant has been deprived of this chance of acquittal by reason of a mistake of the court. I think every intendment should be made in favour of an accused person, and as the court by reason of a mistake as to the extent of its powers did not exercise a discretion which it might have exercised in favour of the appellant, the appellant is, I think, entitled on that ground alone to have the conviction set aside.

DARLING, J.—I agree with the judgment delivered by Wright, J. I only wish to add a word agreeing with what he has said as to the power of this court acting under the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78 to make such order as justice may require.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—As regards the first point my brother Jelf and I had considerable doubts, but we are unable to answer the very able judgments of Wright and Bruce, JJ., and therefore we concur in these judgments because we are not able to give satisfactory reasons for not doing so. In so concurring we place great weight on the fact that it was a joint indictment and a joint trial. Upon the second point we entirely concur without any hesitation, and I entirely agree that Reg. v. Brown ought to be followed in preference to Reg. v. Clark.

NEALE v. GORDON-LENNOX. (a.)

Practice—Compromise—Authority of counsel—Reference of action—Limitation of authority to agree to terms.

When restrictions are placed by a client upon his counsel's authority to compromise or to agree to certain terms, and consent is given by counsel, disregarding those restrictions, such consent is not binding on the client, even in the case of the other side being unaware of them.

Where, therefore, counsel agreed to a reference, without providing for a special condition imposed by his client and unknown to the opposite party, the order for reference was set aside and a new trial ordered.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 50 W. R. 487, [1902] 1 K. B. 838, reversed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, 50 W. R. 487, [1902] 1 K. B. 838 (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.).

In this case an application was made to Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., to rescind an order made by him referring, by consent, the action, which was brought to recover damages for slander. Prior to the consent given by counsel to the reference, the plaintiff signed a document giving authority to her counsel to consent to a reference on certain terms mentioned in the Lord Chancellor's judgment. The restrictions on the authority of her counsel were not communicated to the other side.

After the action had been referred, but before the order was drawn up, the plaintiff communicated with her solicitor, that her terms had not been complied with, as counsel had exceeded her authority, and after argument the Lord Chief Justice ordered the case to be restored to the jury list.

The Court of Appeal, however, considered the agreement to refer binding on the client.

Sir R. Reid, K.C., and R. J. Drake, for the appellant.

Isaac, K.C., and Norman Craig, for the respondent.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed. I do not propose to go through the different cases which have been cited before your lordships, because I think that there is a higher and much more important principle at stake than that which is involved in discussing whether a particular part of a bargain has or has not been within the exact authority given to the learned counsel.

The undisputed facts in this case are these: The learned counsel who was employed for the plaintiff was desirous, for reasons which I appreciate and entirely share, of sparing his client the necessity of wading through by a public trial such a cause of action as is involved in the trial of this cause. I myself was desirous of giving the parties an opportunity, even at this late hour, of preventing that which would, I should think, be injurious and certainly exceedingly painful to them both. But when the parties have resolved that their rights are to be determined by a regular tribunal, and that they will not agree to those courses which others may think more advantageous and more pleasant for them, the court has no authority to insist upon their abstaining from the exercise of their legal rights; they must be permitted to conduct their litigation as they will.

Sir Edward Clarke, being moved by the desire to which I have referred, obtained in writing from his client a distinct consent upon certain terms to refer this cause. It is important to look at the terms with reference to an observation that I will make presently. The terms are these—that the defendant, who was sued upon an allegation of having spoken certain grave and slanderous words of the plaintiff, should publicly at the time of the reference of the cause state by her counsel that no imputation had been made, that no imputation was intended to be made, and that the defendant was satisfied that there was no ground for any imputation upon the plaintiff's moral character. Can anybody doubt that this condition was one of supreme importance to the party who insisted upon it? It seems to me that a great many people would share the view of the plaintiff—I do not care whether they would be right or wrong in that view—but they would say, "If I am to go before a tribunal which has not, as Sir Robert Reid said, the weight and authority of a public trial, I must have it perfectly understood, before I go before that private tribunal, that every imputation of any sort or kind upon my private character is withdrawn." The learned counsel who has last addressed us suggests that this does not involve the negative. I entirely disagree with him. I think that insisting upon such a preliminary to entering into a reference at all does involve in the most emphatic form the negative: "Unless that is done I absolutely decline to have it tried otherwise than by a public tribunal." And that authority is in in writing. We are not dealing here with an uncertain recollection of conversations. That is a written authority given, and, nevertheless, it is sought to refer the cause by the agreement of counsel without any such public statement, although the court has before it the fact that such was the authority given, and that the preliminary statement about the plaintiff's character was an essential condition of the bargain by which the case was referred.

As I said, I will not go through the cases, because to my mind there is a higher and much more important principle involved. The court is asked for its assistance—and I entirely repudiate the technical distinction between what is called an application for specific performance and an order to be made that such and such things should be done—the court is asked for its assistance when it is asked to make and enforce this order that the trial of the cause should not go on; and to suggest to me that a court of justice is so far bound by the unauthorized act of learned counsel that it is deprived of its general authority over justice between the parties is, to my mind, the most extraordinary proposition that I ever heard. That condition of things seems not to have been in the contemplation of the Court of Appeal. I will only say for myself that I should absolutely repudiate any such principle. Where the contract is something which the parties are themselves by law competent to agree to, and where the contract has been made, I have nothing to say to the policy of law which prevents that contract from being undone: the contract is by law final and conclusive. But when two parties seek as part of their arrangement the intervention of a court of justice to say that something shall or shall not be done, although one of the parties to it is clearly not consenting to it, but has in the most distinct form said that the consent to refer—to take it from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunal—shall only be on certain terms—to say that any learned counsel can so far contradict what his client has said, and act without the authority of his client as to bind the court itself, is a proposition to which I certainly will never assent.

That appears to me to be decisive of this case. A great many cases have been quoted, but it seems to me that of every one of those cases it would be true to say that no court has suggested that the court had not the power to do such a thing. It has been said, "If you allow this, everybody will be making similar applications." That is policy. It has been said that in such and such a case the parties were present in court and did not immediately repudiate the transaction, and therefore I must assume that they did consent. Those are all examples of what, in the exercise of its discretion, a court might or might not do because it was or was not satisfied that the circumstances of the case did not justify the undoing of a bargain which had been made. And I can well adopt, and feel that I could safely affirm, every one of the decisions referred to. But when I come to this case, and consider the question of what should be the position of the other party who has acted upon the apparent authority of counsel, there are cases in which the court undoubtedly, in the exercise of its discretion (and that is the observation which I intended to make), might well say, "If it is only a question of money, if it is only a question which costs will rectify, this matter can be put right by the payment of costs." That is one example. Or the position of the other party might have been altered and changed—for instance, I could imagine the case to be so delayed that it made the Statute of Limitations to run so that there was no possibility of trying the action again; and other cases might be put which would raise the question of the other party being put into such a position by the unauthorized act of counsel that one might well say, "This is a case in which one of two innocent parties must suffer; then the person by the act of whose counsel (the counsel whom he is responsible for employing) the difficulty has been created must suffer; the position of the parties has been totally altered by what has taken place, and therefore we cannot interfere." That would be because, upon its general jurisdiction of doing justice between the parties, the court would think that it was not a case in which it ought to interfere. This was in effect the language of Lord Lyndhurst, C.B., in one of he cases which have been quoted, Wright v. Sorely, 2 Cr. & M. 671.

But, turning to the present case, I can hardly conceive a case in which there is a more important principle involved than a case in which a person is coming to vindicate her character in public. What is the argument on the other side? What injustice is done to the other side by the action being tried now instead of its being tried then? Nobody can suggest any. It is said, "Your counsel made a bargain, and we will not let you off the bargain which he made." It seems to me that it is unarguable to say, if it is a matter of discretion at all, that that is a matter which would prevent the court exercising its discretion. The effort to put this right by an application made to the court was attended with certain costs. The Lord Chief Justice has, with great propriety, I think, said that the party by the act of whose counsel the difficulty has arisen must pay the costs of that proceeding; but now that that is out of the way, what injustice or what impropriety is there in the cause being restored to the list and being tried in due course? I can see none.

On the other hand, to tell me that the person whose character is alleged to have been attacked—I am not saying whether it is true or not—is to be deprived by this unauthorized act of the opportunity of vindicating her character in public, seems so gross an injustice that, upon the general jurisdiction that every court has over its own procedure, this court ought to refuse to allow that injustice to be committed. I therefore move your lordships that this appeal be allowed, and that the order of the Court of Appeal be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I agree entirely in the two propositions which Sir Robert Reid laid down in his reply. I do not think that the court is entirely in the hands of the counsel, and bound to give the seal of its authority to any arrangement that counsel may make when the arrangement itself is not in its opinion a proper one. In the next place, I do not think that counsel has authority to compel his client against his will to refer an action which he desires to try in open court.

Lord BRAMPTON.—I am also of opinion that this decision ought to be reversed, and that the parties ought to be remitted to try the case in the ordinary course. I have rarely heard anything more preposterous than the notion that a suitor can impose no effective veto upon a course proposed to be taken by his or her own counsel which, rightly or wrongly, in his or her judgment, will operate most prejudicially to his or her interests in an action, and possibly to the ruin of his or her character. I quite agree, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed and the case restored to the paper.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the Court of Appeal inadvertently, or for some reason which I do not understand, omitted to take into account the duty and function of a court in a matter of this kind. The judgment of the Court of Appeal proceeds upon the ordinary doctrines of agency; but the ordinary doctrines of agency are only half of what is to be considered in a matter of this kind. The real facts are extremely simple. The court which originally made the order made an order referring an action of libel and slander to a gentleman for trial. It made that order by the consent of the parties—it had no jurisdiction and no right to make that order except on the footing that the parties consented. The order is good on the face of it, and the learned judge who made it was perfectly justified in making it, having regard to the evidence before him. But before that order is drawn up one of the parties interested discovers that it is made without her consent at all, and not only without her consent, but in spite of her express instructions. Now, I venture to say that if that had happened in the Chancery Division, with the practice of which I am familiar, it would have been a matter of course for the learned judge who made that order to stay the drawing of it up if he had been informed that the court had inadvertently made the order upon the assumption that the parties were consenting when in fact they did not consent. I cannot imagine that it would cross his mind for a moment that anything ought to be done except to stay the drawing up of that order. Unfortunately the plaintiff here, wishing to get rid of the order, drew it up with the view of getting it set aside; and in form this is an application, not to defer the drawing up of the order, but to have it set aside; but that is mere form—mere machinery. It would be absolutely wrong, to my mind, for the court to allow that order to be acted on and to take effect the moment it is judicially ascertained and brought to its attention that it is an order which the court never would have dreamt of making if the court had known the facts. That point of view seems to me to have been overlooked by the Court of Appeal, and to be fatal to the validity of the order. The order made by the Lord Chief Justice was, as I understand it, that the order for reference should be set aside and the action set down for trial, the costs of the application to set it aside being the defendant's in any event; and that, to my mind, ought to stand. The appeal ought to be allowed with costs—that is to say, the decision appealed from ought to be reversed with costs.

JANSON v. DRIEFONTEIN CONSOLIDATED MINES (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance—Bullion—Seizure of gold by foreign government—Subsequent declaration of war—Insurance of enemy's property.

An insurance by a British subject of an alien's goods effected before war actually breaks out between this country and the foreign government to whom the alien owes allegiance, is a binding agreement which may be enforced on the resumption of peace, and this is so though the goods were seized by the foreign government when hostilities were imminent and for the purpose of carrying on the war.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (49 W. R. 660, [1901] 2 K. B. 419) affirmed.

Appeal from order of Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Romer, L.J., Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting), 49 W. R. 660, [1901] 2 K. B. 419, affirming a judgment of Mathew, J., 48 W. R. 619, [1900] 2 Q. B. 339.

The respondents were a limited company, which for the convenience of carrying on its business was incorporated and registered in the Transvaal according to the laws of the late South African Republic.

The shareholders were almost entirely resident outside the Transvaal and in Europe, and were not subjects of the South African Republic.

Gold bullion, the property of the company, was insured at Lloyds during transit from the Transvaal to the United Kingdom by a policy dated the 1st of August, 1899, which covered the risk of capture and detention.

When the policy was effected, the question of possibility of war between this country and the Transvaal was in the contemplation of the parties.

While in transit the gold was seized on the 2nd of October, 1899, by order of the government of the Transvaal against the will of the respondents when at a railway station in that country.

At that date negotiations were proceeding between this country and the Transvaal which might result in war; and war did eventually break out on the 12th of October.

The respondent company brought this action before the resumption of peace, on the policy to recover the amount of loss insured against. At the trial of the action no objection was raised by the defendants that the war was still continuing, but they contended that it was contrary to public policy to allow the insurance to be enforced.

Mathew, J., gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The defendants, the underwriters, appealed.

Aug. 5.—Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case the plaintiffs, who had effected a policy at Lloyds on a large quantity of gold which was being consigned from South Africa to London, sue on this policy, dated the 1st of August, 1899, in respect of a seizure by the Transvaal Government of the gold in question on the 2nd of October of the same year. There is no doubt that the loss of the gold is covered by the express words of the policy in question, and the defence to the action rests upon the proposition that the policy was an unlawful contract.

It may be that for some purposes, or it might be the subject of debate whether I am correct in assuming what I do assume for the purposes of my judgment, but for the sake of clearness I do assume that the plaintiff company was an alien, a subject of the Transvaal Government. I also assume, though this also might be the subject of debate, that both parties to the contract had in their minds, on the 1st of August, the possibility of war, and even the probability of war, on the 1st of August. The making of the policy and the loss under it both accrued before the breaking out of war, which it is agreed between the parties occurred at 5 o'clock on the 11th of October.

All the judges, with the exception of Vaughan Williams, L.J., have held that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover upon the policy; and if I rightly understood the reasoning of the learned Lord Justice, he thinks the policy was in its inception illegal, and would have been equally illegal even if no war had intervened. He does indeed say that there could have been no claim if war had not occurred; but he is mistaken, since the assumed imminence of the war and the seizure of the Transvaal Government might have occurred even if war had finally been averted.

The difficulty I have in dealing with the learned judge's judgment is that I do not trace any definite proposition as to what interest of the state, or what public injury, is supposed by him to be involved; but at all events, in whatever sense the learned judge uses this phrase, it is upon this general ground alone that he decides against the plaintiffs. Now, as I have said, I understand the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J., is put upon the sole ground that this policy is against public policy. He puts it at various parts of his judgment in different ways. He calls it a contravention of public interest, injurious to the country, inconsistent with public duty, repugnant to the interests of the state, and no doubt there are equivalent phrases to be found in many judgments where their application is expounded; but the learned judge, beyond using these phrases, does not go on to explain in what sense they are used, and how and on what principles of law the policy in question was unlawful.

I do not think that the phrase "against public policy" is one which in a court of law explains itself. It does not leave at large to each tribunal to find that a particular contract is against public policy. If such a principle were admitted, I should very much concur with what Serjeant Marshall said in the first edition of his work on marine insurance a century ago: "To show or insinuate that it might, in any case, be proper for a judge to prevent a party from availing himself of an indisputable principle of law, in a court of justice, upon the ground of some notion of fancied policy or expedience, is a new doctrine in Westminster Hall, and has a direct tendency to render all law vague and uncertain. A rule of law, once established, ought to remain the same till it be annulled by the Legislature, which alone has the power to decide on the policy or expedience of repealing laws or suffering them to remain in force. What politicians call expedience often depends on momentary conjunctures, and is frequently nothing more than the fine-spun speculations of visionary theorists, or the suggestions of party and faction. If expedience, therefore, should ever be set up as a foundation for the judgments of Westminster Hall, the necessary consequence must be that a judge would be at full liberty to depart to-morrow from the precedent he has himself established to-day; or to apply the same decisions to different, or different decisions to the same circumstances, as his notions of expedience might dictate."

But I do not think the law of England does leave the matter so much at large as seems to be assumed. In treating of various branches of the law learned persons have analyzed the sources of the law, and have sometimes expressed their opinion that such and such a provision is bad because it is contrary to public policy; but I deny that any court can invent a new head of public policy; so a contract for marriage, brokerage, the creation of a perpetuity contract, in restraint of trade, a gaming or wagering contract, or, what is relevant here, the assisting of the king's enemies, are all undoubtedly unlawful things; and you may say that it is because they are contrary to public policy they are unlawful; but it is because these things have been either enacted or assumed to be by the common law unlawful, and not because a judge or court have a right to declare that such and such things are in his or their view contrary to public policy. Of course, in the application of the principles here insisted on, it is inevitable that the particular case must decided by a judge; he must find the facts, and he must decide whether the facts so found do or not come within the principles which I have endeavoured to describe—that is, a principle of public policy, recognized by the law, which the suggested contract is infringing, or is supposed to infringe.

If this is the true view, it is not difficult to solve the question whether a contract of insurance made before a war and sought to be enforced in respect of a loss incurred before the war is illegal, either in its inception or at the date when the loss was incurred. However stated it amounts to this—that the thing done must be in its nature an assistance to the public enemy, and if there be no public enemy there can be no aid given to him. Nor is this a mere question of words: the importance of the whole region of public policy involved makes the existence of war actually existing at the time of the creation of the contract or its fulfilment necessary. I will assume for my present purpose (though I think it might well be debated) that the Transvaal Co. did, to quote the language of Vaughan Williams, L.J., "enter into this contract with a view to the imminent war which might or might not break out with Great Britain." I note that the Lord Justice uses the phrase "imminent," and one is disposed to ask, Does that word represent a principle capable of logical application to the propositions ultimately arrived at? It is notorious that for many years the Transvaal Government had been purchasing and storing up arms and ammunition to an enormous extent which could have no other object than war with this country. Were all the contracts made with British subjects illegal? or with foreigners, breaches of neutrality on the part of countries of which such subjects were supplying arms and ammunition to the expected enemy of the British Government? No such principle has ever been affirmed by any lawyer yet, and the principles upon which commercial intercourse must cease between nations at war with each other can only be where the heads of the state have created the state of war.

Bynkershoek propounds the principle: [His lordship read a passage from Quæst. Juris Publici, lib. 1, cap. 22, beginning "Præmisi quem admodum," and ending "prohibendum est."] Throughout this the actual existence of the public enemy is assumed, and it is, as I have said, no mere technical phrase. It must be the enemy made so by the public authority.

In order to produce the effect, either nationally or municipally, it must be a war between the two nations. No contract or other transactions with a native of the country which afterwards goes to war is affected by the war. The remedy is indeed suspended: an alien enemy cannot sue in the courts of either country while the war lasts; but the rights on the contract are unaffected, and when the war is over the remedy in the courts of either is restored.

The earlier writers on international law used to contend that some public declaration of war was essential, and Valin, writing in 1770, does not hesitate to describe Admiral Boscawen's operations in the Mediterranean in 1754 as acts of piracy, because no actual declaration of war had been made; but though it cannot be said that that view is now the existing international understanding, it is essential that the hostility must be the act of the nation which makes the war, and no amount of "strained relations" can affect the subjects of either country in their commercial or other transactions: "Quand le conducteur de l'état, le Souverain, déclare la guerre à un autre Souverain on entend que la nation entière la guerre à une autre nation. Car le Souverain représente la nation, et agit au nom de la société entière, et les nations n'ont à faire, les unes aux autres, qu'en corps dans leur qualité de nations. Ces deux nations sont donc ennemis; et tous les sujets de l'une sont ennemis de tous les sujets de l'autre. L'usage est ici conforme aux principes" (Vattel, liv. 3, c. 5. n. 70).

In Muller v. Thompson, 2 Camp. 610, Lord Ellenborough held that the voyage to Konigsberg in 1810, though the relations were very strained between this country and Prussia, British ships being actually excluded from Prussia, and it being objected that this was an enemy's port, was lawful inasmuch as no war was declared and no act of hostility committed—we could not be said to be at war, which alone could render the voyage unlawful.

Trading with the king's enemies is, of course, illegal. Undertaking by contract to indemnify the king's enemies against loss inflicted by the king's forces is also illegal. Such things are manifestly unlawful; but the words "king's enemies" are a necessary feature of the last proposition.

Substituting the word "aliens," who may possibly or even probably become the king's enemies—and in this case the loss and the policy were both before there were any persons who could answer to that description—it would be, to my mind, to introduce a new principle into our law to hold that the probability of a war should have the same operation as war itself. It is war and war alone that makes trading illegal.

I think no more striking example of the mischief which might result from so loose a mode of applying the principle of public policy in courts of justice could be found than the example which elicited Serjeant Marshall's protest, which I have quoted above. Lord Mansfield had expressed the opinion that it was good policy to permit an insurance by British underwriters of enemies' goods, because we might obtain more in premiums than we should lose by capture; but this, in my view, was plainly wrong, and Valin, followed by Pothier and Emergon, denounced such insurance, and said that by the English practice one part of the nation was restoring them by insurance what another part took from them by arms.

If it were competent to a court of law to consider the question which Vaughan Williams, L.J., propounds, whether upon principles of public policy, apart from the known and ascertained rule that intercourse between nations at war is forbidden (which, for the reasons I have given, I think it is not), I should answer the question in a different way from that at which he arrives. Instead of a known and ascertained rule which makes it clear whether a contract is unlawful or not each of the contending parties to a contract must look all round the political horizon, and form a judgment whether in some one or more contingencies the fulfilment of it may be injurious to his own country in the event of war; and I note here again the word "imminent" finds a place in the learned judge's question. It seems to me that the hindrance done to the free commercial intercourse between nations would be far more injurious to the interests of both than the injury the learned judge suggests.

But further, as the learned judge himself points out, the question depends, not on what afterwards takes place, but on whether the supposed contract is illegal in its inception. The learned judge says, "The accident of no war occurring would merely prevent any claim arising, but would not affect the legality of the contract or its construction." I think the learned judge is mistaken here, because the Transvaal Government might have seized the gold although no war had taken place; but the proposition is one which discloses the impolitic nature of such a principle. The courts would have to consider whether war was probable or "imminent," and the contract would have to be regarded as illegal, not because war occurred, but because war was likely to occur. I cannot imagine worse public policy than this.

For these reasons I think this appeal should be dismissed, and I only desire to add that the authorities referred to in the argument do not justify the proposition that expected wars render a contract illegal between citizens of the two nations between whom war is anticipated, to lay down such a rule would be to establish an entirely new code for which there is no authority in the law.

I conclude by reading the words of Parke, B., on this subject when advising your lordships' House in Egerton v. Lord Brownlow and Others, 4 H. L. Cas. 1, at p. 123. "To allow this to be a ground of judicial decision would lead to the greatest uncertainty and confusion. It is the province of the statesman, and not the lawyer, to discuss, and of the Legislature to determine, what is the best for the public good, and to provide for it by proper enactments. It is the province of the judge to expound the law only, the written from the statutes; the unwritten or common law from the decisions of our predecessors and of our existing courts, from text-writers of acknowledged authority, and upon the principles to be clearly deduced from them by sound reason and just inference; not to speculate upon what is the best, in his opinion, for the advantage of the community. Some of these decisions may have, no doubt, been founded upon the prevailing and just opinions of the public good; for instance, the illegality of covenants in restraint of marriage or trade. They have become a part of the recognized law, and we are therefore bound by them, but we are not thereby authorized to establish as law everything which we may think for the public good, and prohibit everything which we think otherwise."

It is not necessary to go through all the principles of law which may make a contract altogether illegal. As a wagering contract is illegal, so wills creating a perpetuity have no operation in that respect, but it is enough for the purpose I have in hand. They are defined legal principles, known to and absolutely fixed as part of our law, and a judge is called upon to bring the instrument he has to construe to the test—whether it is or is not within such principles; but I do not think he has any jurisdiction to bring into the discussion his own views of what he may consider an inexpedient thing in his own peculiar view of public policy. To permit such a discussion to arise it must be a question of some public policy recognized by the law.

To apply what I have said to this case, I do not deny that a judge has a right to consider whether the thing incriminated is an adherence to the king's enemies, or something calculated to assist them; but I do not think we are at liberty to consider whether the contract might be against public policy because one of the parties to it might become an alien enemy afterwards.

For these reasons I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed and the judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN (read by Lord Davey).—I assume that the corporation, which was plaintiff in the action and is now respondent here, was to all intents and purposes in the position of a natural-born subject of the late South African Republic. I do not think it can be entitled to any exceptional favour or to any peculiar indulgence by reason of the fact, if it be the fact, that the bulk of its shareholders were of European nationality. If all its members had been subjects of the British Crown, the corporation itself would have been none the less a foreign corporation and none the less in regard to this country an alien.

I assume, further, that the seizure which has given rise to the claim on which the action is founded was made by the government of the South African Republic in immediate contemplation of war with this country, which that government was then determined at all hazards to bring about unless this country would 'submit to conditions which no sovereign state with a particle of self-respect could entertain.

Notwithstanding these assumptions, and notwithstanding the very able argument of the learned counsel for the appellants, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that there is no defence to the action.

I think the learned counsel for the respondent was right in saying that the law recognizes a state of peace and a state of war, but that it knows nothing of an intermediate state which is neither the one thing nor the other—neither peace nor war. In every community it must be for the supreme power, whatever it is, to determine the policy of the community in regard to peace and war. It is not, I think, for private individuals to pronounce upon the foreign relations of their sovereign or their country and to measure their own responsibilities arising out of civil contracts with foreigners by a standard of public policy which they set up for themselves, even though their views may be right in the abstract and might possibly find acceptance with a jury of their countrymen if such a question were within the competence of such a tribunal. Public policy, in my opinion, requires a good citizen in matters of this sort to conform to the rule and guidance of the state. However critical may be the condition of affairs, however imminent war may be, if and so long as the government of the state abstains from declaring or making war or accepting a hostile challenge there is peace—peace with all attendant consequences for all its subjects.

The result, therefore, in the present case is that, however hostile the intentions of the South African Republic may have been at the moment when this gold was seized, the seizure must be treated as a seizure in time of peace between the republic and this country.

The event which happened was within the terms of the policy, and there is no ground on which the underwriters can dispute their liability.

The appeal, I think, must be dismissed with costs.

My noble and learned friend Lord Shand concurs in this opinion.

Lord DAVEY.—I do not think it necessary to state the facts of this case, or to discuss in any detail the numerous cases which were cited in the course of the argument. I should, if I were to do so, be only troubling your lordships with a repetition of what has been said, and I believe will be said, by my noble and learned friends. I will content myself by stating concisely how the case presents itself to my mind and the conclusion to which I have arrived.

I think it must be taken that the respondent company was technically an alien, and became, on the breaking out of hostilities between this country and the South African Republic, an alien enemy. I also assume, in accordance with the decision in Aubert v. Gray, 3 B. & S. 163, that the loss occasioned by the embargo placed on the goods by the assured's own government might, in ordinary circumstances, be recovered on the policy.

There are three rules which are established in our common law. The first is that the king's subjects cannot trade with an alien enemy—i.e., a person owing allegiance to a government at war with the king, without the king's licence. Every contract made in violation of this principle is void, and goods which are the subject of such a contract are liable to confiscation. The second principle is a corollary from the first, but is also rested on distinct grounds of public policy. It is that no action can be maintained against an insurer of an enemy's goods or ships against capture by the British Government. One of the most effectual instruments of war is the crippling of the enemy's commerce, and to permit such an insurance would be to relieve enemies from the loss they incur by the action of British arms, and would, therefore, be detrimental to the interests of the insurer's own country. The principle equally applies where the insurance is made previously to the commencement of hostilities, and was, therefore, legal in its inception, and whether the person claiming on the policy be a neutral or even a British subject if the insurance be effected on behalf of an alien enemy. The third rule is that, if a loss has taken place before the commencement of hostilities, the right of action on a policy of insurance by which the goods lost were insured is suspended during the continuance of war and revives on the restoration of peace.

In the present case the third rule would have constituted a defence in the present action; but the parties, being desirous to obtain a decision on the merits of the case, waived the objection. I have some doubt whether it was competent for the parties to take this course, for it humbly appears to me that, the objection being one based on considerations of public policy affecting the sovereign, his courts should be held bound to take notice of the plaintiff's inability to sue, and I do not think that this observation is inconsistent with Flindt v. Waters, 15 East, 260. But the point is now happily academic, and I do not desire to make it a ground of judgment.

Your lordships will have observed that, in each of the rules on this subject which I have endeavoured to formulate, the actual commencement of hostilities is made the time when and the occasion on which the rules come into operation. The learned counsel for the appellant has endeavoured to persuade your lordships to extend their operation to a period when the relations between two governments are strained and war is imminent, though the peace has not been broken and negotiations are still continued, on the grounds that the same principles of public policy are as applicable to such a state of things as to a time of actual hostility. In the case before us he says that the seizure of the gold by the government of the South African Republic was in contemplation of and with a view to the eventuality of war. The seizure of the gold, however, was not in itself an act of hostility against this country.

I am not disposed to agree to such an extension of the law, which it appears to me is unsupported by any authority. Public policy appears to me to be always unsafe and treacherous ground for legal decision, and in the present case it would not be easy to say on which side the balance of convenience would incline. On the one hand, such an extension of the law as your lordships are invited to lay down would certainly lead to interference with the lawful contracts and commercial pursuits of the king's subjects. It might conceivably precipitate a state of war which it was the object of statesmen to avert; and I think there is great force in the observation made by Romer, L.J., as to the difficulty of determining the intention of a foreign government, and the embarrassment which might ensue from our courts being obliged to decide a question of that kind as one of fact. I quote the following passage from the judgment of the learned Lord Justice: "I think the intention of a foreign government at any given time ought by these courts, for such a purpose as that which I am now considering, to be treated as conclusively determined by the way in which our government chooses or has chosen to deal with that foreign government, and that where our government has not treated the foreign government as being hostile at a particular time, our courts not to try and ascertain what was then in the minds of the king, president, or responsible ministers, or authorities of the foreign government."

Against these considerations is to be set only the possible but somewhat remote advantage to our government which might accrue from the enforcement of the rule contended for by the appellant.

I prefer to abide by the limits of the law as laid down in the decided cases and by the text-writers, and I therefore think that the decision of Mathew, J., and the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

Lord BRAMPTON (read by Lord Lindley).—I am of opinion that the respondent is entitled to your lordship's judgment. At first sight the case may appear to be fraught with difficulty; but when the material facts, which are few and simple, are ascertained and understood, the difficulty will, as I think, be found to be more apparent than real.

The plaintiff is a company incorporated under the laws of the South African Republic for the purpose of working gold mines therein. The majority of its shareholders are subjects of the United Kingdom. The company has an office and a committee of management in England, and it was a custom of the company to transmit to this country gold bullion for sale and distribution of the profits among its shareholders. The company clearly must be treated as a subject of the republic, notwithstanding the nationality of its shareholders.

In the early autumn of 1899 the company was, in the ordinary course of business, about to send to the United Kingdom a large amount of such bullion, and on the 1st of August it effected a policy of insurance on its transit from the mines to England with underwriters at Lloyds, the defendant, a British subject, being one. On the 2nd of October the bullion was placed in the mail train at Johannesburg for conveyance to Cape Town en route for its destination. It reached Vereeniging, the frontier station of the republic, in safety; but on its arrival there it was seized and appropriated by the then government of the republic, and became totally lost to the plaintiff. When the bullion was so seized there can be no doubt that the friendly relations between this country and the South African Republic were much strained; but both countries were negotiating for a settlement of their differences, and it was not until the afternoon of the 11th of October that war was declared between them, from which date they continued in open hostility until the end of May, 1902. The action was commenced on the 30th of January, 1900, the crucial issue between the parties being whether war had been commenced, or a state of hostility equivalent to a state of war, so far as the insurance was affected, was in existence between the two countries when the seizure was made on the 2nd of October, 1899. If the answer was in the affirmative, the plaintiff, as a subject of the republic, could not recover upon his policy against the defendant, an English subject and an alien enemy of the plaintiffs' country; for, although covered by the words of the policy, it would have been a loss happening during the existence of hostilities, and within the proviso which, according to the language of Lord Ellenborough in Brandon v. Curling, 4 East, 410, at p. 417, is in all cases considered as engrafted in every insurance—namely, "that this insurance shall not extend to cover any loss happening during the existence of hostilities between the respective countries of the assured and the assurer." The reason he assigns for this is, "because, during the existence of such hostilities, the subjects of one country cannot allowably lend their assistance to protect by insurance the property and commerce of the subjects of the other." The law is in other words also explained by Willes, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Esposito v. Bowden, 5 W. R. 732, 7 E. & B. 763, at p. 779: "It is now fully established that the presumed object of war being as much to cripple the enemy's commerce as to capture his property, a declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country, and that such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal." If, however, the answer to the issue between the parties ought to be, as I think it was rightly found by Mathew, L.J., in the negative, the plaintiff company was clearly entitled (subject to a point which was waived) to recover its loss from the defendant for both the making of the contract of indemnity and insurance and the loss by seizure—which was simply an outrage by the republic upon its own subject—occurred before the declaration of war. By way of defence it was urged that the seizure of the bullion by the government of the republic was incidental to actual or expected hostilities against her Majesty Queen Victoria, and for the purpose of supplying the republic with funds to levy war upon her Majesty, and that, coupled with the actual declaration of war which followed, created a state of hostility against her Majesty, and rendered the plaintiff's claim for indemnity contrary to public policy and irrecoverable.

This contention, though very ingenious and exceedingly well argued by his learned counsel, affords, in my opinion, no bar to this action. It was an endeavour to extend the well-established principle described by Lord Ellenborough so as to meet the circumstances of this case, in which undoubtedly hostile intentions were made manifest by word and by action during the time negotiations for peace were being carried on, though no declaration or act of war was made or done until after the British Government had signified by silence, on the 11th of October, the non-acceptance of the ultimatum of the republic received on the previous day. No decided authority supporting this contention was cited to your lordships, while, in my opinion, reason and good sense are against it.

Every prudent government naturally endeavours and takes steps to place itself in a condition to uphold its own country in the possible event of a state of hostility arising with any other power, and it would indeed be strange that a declaration of war should be held to have relation back to an indefinite period of time during which both the hostile countries believed themselves to be and conducted themselves towards each other as in a condition of amity, and were negotiating with a view to avoid any rupture of a then existing state of peace. I do not think it necessary to say more.

In my opinion the judgments of Mathew, L.J., and of the majority of the Court of Appeal ought to be upheld, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON.—The fulness with which this very interesting case is being discussed by some of my noble and learned friends may absolve me from saying more than a few words. I agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed, but I wish to rest my concurrence on one definite ground—namely, that at the date of the seizure the South African Republic was not at war with Queen Victoria; that this company was a Transvaal subject, and that the nationality of its shareholders is immaterial; that the gold was seized as sinews of a war against Great Britain intended by the seizers and morally inevitable: these propositions I accept as the conditions of the argument; and it is obvious that the circumstance that this gold was insured lessened pro tanto the pressure of the war once it broke out.

But then the question is, Does this state of facts bring the case within any prohibition of the common law? Now, after very careful consideration of this question and with a high appreciation of the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J., I am satisfied that, near as in every sense the state of things at the time of the seizure was to war, it is yet separated from it by a line of the sharpest and most definite kind. It cannot be affirmed that at the moment in question there was a state of war between this country and the Transvaal. That the Transvaal was a future enemy, an intending enemy, that she was arming, and that this seizure was an act of arming—all this I assume and I believe; and if the principle of the cases about actual war really involved cases of impending war, I should not be deterred by the absence of any former decision from applying it. But for the purposes of the present question there are, as it seems to me, but two categories—war and not war; and the difference between the two things is essential. The present case is perhaps as strong a case as can occur, but in it war was still a contingency or futurity. To extend the law's prohibition of trading with the king's enemies to future or contingent enemies would be subversive of the broad and palpable distinction between peace and war, would be unworkable in practice, and productive of endless uncertainty and loss. I mention these considerations, not as if we were here as legislators, or had to decide upon a balance of general considerations. But the question whether it is workable or salutary is one of the tests of any legal doctrine, and I am satisfied that the law against trade with enemies is inapplicable to the events now in question.

Lord LINDLEY.—I will not detain your lordships by recapitulating the facts of this case. I will only ask your lordships to bear in mind that the policy was effected and the loss of the goods insured took place before war was declared or broke out. These facts are of cardinal importance.

Before considering the legality or illegality of the policy, it is desirable to consider the legal position of the company assured by it. The company was incorporated and registered according to the laws of the Transvaal, and it carried on business there. It had gold mines there and extracted gold from them, and sent such gold to England or Europe for sale and division of profits amongst its shareholders there. It had also a London office and London committee of management. For all purposes material for the determination of the present appeal the company must, in my opinion, be regarded as a company resident and carrying on business in the Transvaal although not exclusively there. It was subject to the laws of that country. When war broke out the company became an alien enemy of this country: see the American case of Society for the Propagation of the Gospel v. Wheeler, 2 Gall. 104. If it becomes material to attribute nationality to the company it would, in my opinion, be correct to say that the company was a Transvaal company and a subject of the Transvaal Government, although almost all its shareholders were foreigners resident elsewhere and subjects of other countries. But when considering questions arising with alien enemies, it is not the nationality of a person, but his place of business during war that is important. An Englishman carrying on business in an enemy's country is treated as an alien enemy in considering the validity or invalidity of his commercial contracts: M'Connell v. Hector, 3 Bos. & P. 113. Again, the subject of a state at war with this country, but who is carrying on business here or in a foreign neutral country, is not treated as an alien enemy; the validity of his contracts does not depend on his nationality, nor even on what is his real domicil, but on the place or places in which he carries on his business or businesses: Wells v. Williams, 1 Salk. 46. As observed by Sir William Scott in The Jonge Klassina, 5 C. Rob. 297, at p. 302, "a man may have mercantile concerns in two countries, and if he acts as a merchant of both he must be liable to be considered as a subject of both with regard to the transactions originating, respectively, in those countries. That he has no fixed counting-house in the enemy's country will not be decisive": see also The Portland, 3 C. Rob. 41.

I pass now to consider the seizure and its effect on the rights of the assured against the underwriters.

The risk of loss by seizure by a foreign government was clearly insured against in the sense that the general words of the policy covered such a risk. But even if this particular risk is one which cannot be lawfully insured against, the fact that the general words cover it does not render the policy illegal ab initio: the only consequence is that the general words must be read as subject to an implied proviso that they are not intended to cover and do not cover any risk against which it is unlawful to insure. Therefore, if the seizure in question could not be lawfully insured against, the general words ought not to be held to cover it. This rule for dealing with general words in policies of insurance was formulated and acted upon in Furtado v. Rodgers, 3 Bos. & P. 191, and Kellner v. Le Mesurier, 4 East, 396, and has been recognized ever since. In those cases it was held that general words did not cover loss by capture by British forces of an enemy's goods insured before war broke out.

This policy being effected before war broke out, it is not invalid upon the ground that it was when made a contract with a then alien enemy; nor can it be treated as an invalid contract ab initio by reason of the generality of its terms. This was in fact conceded by the counsel for the appellants in his reply. The question then is reduced to this: Is the seizure in question one which it is unlawful to insure against?

One ground, and one ground only, is invoked to show that it is, and that ground is the ground of public policy. A contract or other transaction which is against public policy—i.e., the general interest of this country, is illegal; but public policy is a very unstable and dangerous foundation on which to build until made safe by decision. On this point I venture to remind your lordships of the weighty observations of Alderson, B., and Parke, B., in Egerton v. Brownlow.

The seizure of the gold in the present case was a distinct gain to the captors. To indemnify the owner of the gold against the loss of such gold is clearly a benefit to the owner, and such an indemnity is a benefit to a person who is regarded as an enemy as soon as war breaks out. But he was not an enemy when the policy was effected nor when the gold was seized, and how it can be against the policy of this country to keep faith with him when the war is over I fail to see. He cannot, of course, sue in this country during the war if the defendants raise that objection; but they do not. The contention is that if the war were over this action could not be maintained.

Reference was made in the argument to such cases as The Jan Frederick, 5 C. Rob. 128, and The Bœdes Lust, 5 C. Rob. 233, to show that contracts made before war broke out, but in contemplation of it, for the protection of enemy's property against British capture, will not be recognized in this country. This is intelligible enough; for to recognize such contracts would be to defeat the object of this country in effecting the capture. It would be to undo by means of British tribunals the work done for the British nation by its naval or military forces. Anything which would produce or be calculated to produce such an effect as that would be clearly against public policy, and be judicially dealt with accordingly.

I am unable myself to bring the present case within this principle.

The view that public policy requires an extension of rules already recognized so as to meet the present case has been very clearly presented by Vaughan Williams, L.J., in his judgment.

I am unable, however, to arrive at the same conclusion. His view appears to me to be based on the doctrine which identifies every subject of a state with its own government.

This doctrine was no doubt laid down in Conway v. Gray, 10 East, 536, and so long as that case stood there was authority for the proposition that an ordinary policy of insurance does not cover a loss occasioned by the seizure of the assured property by the government of the country of the assured. But even before 1861 this doctrine can hardly be said to have been regarded as settled law; it has never been accepted in America. The subject was carefully examined in the second edition of Arnould on Insurance, vol. 2, pp. 803, et seq., and in 3 Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, pp. 292, et seq. In 1861, Aubert v. Gray finally repudiated any such general doctrine in this country. It was, however, unnecessary in that case to decide whether such a seizure would be covered by a policy if the seizure occurred during or in contemplation of war with this country. The court left this point open; but Conway v. Gray does not cover it, for the embargo there in question was not an act of hostility.

A seizure after war has broken out is very different from a seizure before war has been declared or has actually commenced.

It appears to be settled that a British subject cannot even before war insure a person against any loss sustained by him after the war began and whilst he is an enemy of this country: see Furtado v. Rodgers, and Brandon v. Curling. Those were cases of capture after war, by the British forces in the first case, and by our allies in the second case; and these authorities go far to show that if the seizure here had been after war had broken out the policy would not have covered such a loss.

But, apart from Conway v. Gray, 10 East, 536, and others based upon the doctrine there laid down and now exploded, there is no authority for saying that an insurance effected before war does not cover a seizure of the insured property by the government of the assured in time of peace, even if war with this country is imminent and shortly afterwards breaks out between that government and our own.

In Arnould on Insurance, vol. 1, p. 102 (2nd ed.), it is stated generally: "When the party intended to be insured by the policy does not become an alien enemy until after the loss and cause of action have arisen, his right to sue on the policy is only suspended during the continuance of hostilities and revives on the restoration of peace." For this is cited Flindt v. Waters, which warrants the author's statement.

That case is also useful as showing that, where the insurance is legal in its inception and the loss occurs before war, an action on the policy may be successfully brought even during war if the underwriter does not put on the record a special dilatory plea. The case is an authority for the course taken in this case of obtaining a decision of the controversy between the parties on its merits without waiting for the termination of the war.

The general rule laid down in Arnould is a sound intelligible working rule, and covers the present case.

I agree with Vaughan Williams, L.J., in thinking that Aubert v. Gray does not quite cover this case; but I cannot agree with him in thinking that public policy requires that this action should be decided in favour of the underwriters. War produces a state of things giving rise to well-known special rules. It prohibits all trading with the enemy except with the royal licence, and dissolves all contracts which involve such trading: see Esposito v. Bowden But threatened war or anticipated war or imminent war is peace, which may not after all result in war; and to apply the rules of war to insurances against loss before war breaks out would paralyze commerce, and often without any real necessity. Is it for the interest of this country to dislocate trade because international relations are strained and war appears probable to the public, who do not know and cannot know the real views and resolutions of the governments concerned? It must be remembered that contracts of insurance are not by any means the only contracts which have to be considered in this connection; what affects them affects contracts of sale and contracts of carriage both by land and sea, and in fact affects the whole external commerce of the country. Romer, L.J., saw this, as is apparent from his judgment.

Where a policy of insurance is not void ab initio and a loss from one of the perils insured against happens before war is declared or breaks out, what defence can be offered to an action upon it? I know of none except where the loss is occasioned by British capture followed by war Of course, if war breaks out before the action is brought or before it is over, the war suspends its prosecution, for an alien enemy cannot sue in this country: Le Bret v. Papillon, 4 East, 502. Your lordships are asked to invent a new defence unheard of before, and to say that every policy on a foreigner's property abroad is subject to the implied condition that it shall not be seized by his own government in order to be used against this country if war breaks out. Such a doctrine, I venture to think, would paralyze legitimate trade and be entirely against the interests of this country.

In my opinion the order and judgment appealed from should be affirmed and the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Nov. 28.

WRIGHT v. LEFEVER. (a.)

Negligence—Premises in dangerous state of repair—Key to view given by house agent—Invitation—Owner's liability for accident.

Landlord held liable for injury caused to a stranger through the front doorsteps giving way, who had obtained a key to look over the premises, which were to let, from the house agent.

Application by the defendant for judgment or new trial in an action tried before Walton, J., and a common jury.

The plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries under the following circumstances:

The plaintiff seeing a house belonging to the defendant with the usual notice in the window that it was to be let, applied to the house agents for the key.

After going over the house and inspecting it, he again on the same day saw the house agents and told them it was very much out of repair, and said the steps leading to the basement were positively dangerous, and he asked whether the landlord would put it in repair.

He did not return the key, saying he would like to look at the house again, and two or three days later he went over the house with a builder in order to have an opinion as to what repairs he should require the landlord to do if he made an offer to take the house.

On the following day he again went to the house, this time being accompanied by his wife, and as he was going up the steps leading to the hall door one of the steps fell in and the plaintiff received the injuries of which he complained.

At the trial the plaintiff's case was that, as he was on the premises by the defendant's invitation, the defendant was liable to him in damages, if he sustained injury in consequence of the premises being in a dangerous condition.

The jury found that the plaintiff when the accident happened was going up the steps for the purpose of going over the house; that he was doing so at the house agents' request; that the steps were dangerous; that the danger was not known to the plaintiff before the accident; that he could not by reasonable care have ascertained the danger; that it was not known to the defendant or his agents; but that if the defendant had taken reasonable care in the management of the house he would have known it.

The jury explained their answer to the last question as meaning that as the defendant knew that the steps leading to the basement were said to be dangerous, he ought to have known that the steps leading to the front door might also be in the same condition.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment having been entered on the findings for the plaintiff with £36 15s., the damages awarded him by the jury, the defendant appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and H. C. Davenport, for the defendant.—There was no contractual relationship here between the plaintiff and the defendant, who went on the premises as a mere licensee at any rate after the first visit, and therefore the defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff to guard him against possible harm: Le Lievre v. Gould, 41 W. R. 468, [1893] 1 Q. B. 491; Lane v. Cox, 45 W. R. 261, [1897] 1 Q. B. 415; The Moorcock, 37 W. R. 439, 14 P. D. 64; Ivay v. Hedges, 9 Q. B. D. 80, 31 W. R. Dig. 134. Moreover, the defendant had no more knowledge that the premises were dangerous than the plaintiff himself: Indermaur v. Dames, 14 W. R. 586, L. R. 1 C. P. 274. The only duty on the part of the defendant was to take care that there was no concealed danger, and of this there is no evidence: Burchell v. Hickisson, 50 L. J. C. L. 101, 29 W. R. Dig. 144.

Kemp, K.C., and W. de B. Herbert, for the plaintiff, were not heard.

COLLINS, M.R.—This application must be dismissed. In my opinion on the findings of the jury, the learned judge had no alternative but to enter judgment for the plaintiff. What the jury substantially found was that the plaintiff went to the house by the invitation of the defendant. The defendant complains of that finding on several grounds and says that when the plaintiff went to the house after the first time he went there at his own risk and was in the position of a mere licensee. It was sought to put him among the class of persons towards whom the duty of the owner of the premises is less than it is towards persons who come on the premises by his invitation, and that he could only be liable for that which constituted a trap. In the case of Indermaur v. Dames, Willes, J., said that the owner is liable if he knows or ought to know of the danger, and, therefore, that disposes of the finding of the jury that in fact neither the defendant nor his agents knew that the steps were dangerous. Then it was said that the plaintiff was not on the premises on the day when the accident happened by the invitation of the defendant. The key had been lent to him on the previous occasion and he had failed to return it. The jury, however, came to the conclusion that the subsequent visits to the house was an incident of the arrangement between the parties, and that was a question of fact to be considered and determined by the jury. It cannot reasonably be urged that the invitation of the defendant to the plaintiff to look over the house was limited to the first looking at the matter from a commonsense view. It follows therefore, that the plaintiff was in the same position on the second visit as he was on the first. The only other finding questioned by the defendant was the last—namely, that if reasonable care had been taken in the management of the house the defendant would have known of the danger. Mr. Lush said that the only means which the evidence showed that the defendant possessed for learning the dangerous condition of the steps was what he had learnt about them from the plaintiff. He argued, therefore, that as the only evidence of the defendant's or his agent's knowledge was that which his agent had been told by the plaintiff himself about the condition of the basement steps, any inference which they ought to have drawn therefrom pointing to the probable dangerous condition of the door steps the plaintiff was in quite as good a position to draw as they were. It was clearly open to the jury to take into consideration other possible sources of information, and the question of knowledge was not one of law but one of fact for the jury. As the findings stood there was ample authority for holding that the defendant was under an obligation to take steps to guard the plaintiff against any danger on his premises which he knew or ought to have known, and which the plaintiff did not know. There being evidence to justify the findings of the jury their judgment must stand.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., gave judgment to the same effect.

In re LAWLEY.
ZAISER v. LAWLEY. (a.)

Power—Appointment—General power to appoint by will—Security for loan—Covenant to appoint—Priority—General debts—Liability of appointed fund.

Where there is a general power to appoint by will only, an appointment by will made in favour of a creditor in pursuance of a covenant in a mortgage in consideration of money lent to the donee of the power during his lifetime will not give that creditor priority over the other creditors of the donee's estate.

Lady Wenlock, by her will, gave to her son, the Hon. F. C. Lawley, a general power to appoint a sum of £10,000 by will. In default of appointment this sum was to form part of her residuary estate.

By a mortgage, dated the 7th of April, 1892, Mr. Lawley covenanted with Mr. G. F. Perkins, in consideration of a loan to him of £1,000 bearing interest at 8 per cent., that he would immediately sign his will, which was already prepared and bore even date with the mortgage, whereby, in exercise of the testamentary power of appointment under his mother's will, he appointed that the trustees of the will should stand possessed of the sum of £10,000 and the investments representing the same upon trust to pay to the mortgagee thereout in preference and priority to all other payments the said sum of £1,000 and all interest thereon; and that he would not revoke or alter his will without the consent in writing of the mortgagee. This will was signed on the same day as the mortgage.

Lawley died on the 18th of September, 1901, without having changed or altered his will except by certain codicils changing his executors. The whole of the said sum of £1,000, together with arrears of interest, was then due.

Shortly after Mr. Lawley's death this action was commenced by creditors for the administration of his estate. The trustees of Lady Wenlock's will paid into court to the credit of the action certain bonds of the nominal value of £3,200, which represented a part of the £10,000 over where Mr. Lawley had a testamentary power of appointment. Mr. Perkins having died, his executors took out a summons in the action asking for payment of the sum due to them from the sum in court, or in the alternative that they might rank as creditors of the estate.

Badcock, K.C., and E. Ford, for the applicants.—This sum of £10,000 can only become general assets of the estate by the act of the appointor in exercising his power, but the other creditors cannot take it against the other acts of the appointor: In re Newnham's Estate, W. N., 1881, 69. The rule as to sums becoming general assets only applies where the appointment was to volunteers: In re Roper, 36 W. R. 750, 39 Ch. D. 482. Where the appointment is for value there is no rule that a general testamentary provision should not so hold as to give an appointee a preferential right over other creditors.

H. Wace, for the respondents.—Where a general power of appointment is exercised by will, such property becomes subject to the debts of the testator, and the appointee is trustee of the creditors: Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), pp. 254-5; Jenny v. Andrews, 6 Madd. 264; Williams v. Lomas, 16 Beav. 1; Fleming v. Buchanan, 3 De G. M. & G. 976; In re Hodgson, 47 W. R. 443, [1899] 1 Ch. 666. In re Newnham's Estate is distinguishable.

Badcock, K.C., replied.

July 29.—JOYCE, J.—The Honourable Francis Charles Lawley, under the will of his mother, Lady Wenlock, had a general power to appoint by will a sum of £10,000, which, in default of appointment, was to go as part of the residuary estate. He borrowed a sum of money, and as part of the security covenanted forthwith to make a will exercising this power of appointment, so that the loan should be a first charge upon the fund, and not to revoke such a will. He made a will accordingly and died. The question now is, whether the applicants, who are the legal personal representatives of the lender, have as against the appointed fund any priority over other creditors.

In Fleming v. Buchanan, 3 De G. M. & G. 976, at p. 980, the law is thus laid down by Knight-Bruce, L.J.: "On whatever ground it was originally so held, it is and has for a long time been the settled law of the country, that if a man having a power, and a power only, over personal estate to appoint it as he will, exercises the power by a testamentary appointment, the property becomes subject in a certain order and manner to the payment of his debts whatever may be the intention or absence of intention upon his part." The order there mentioned is the order in which assets generally are applied in payment of debts according to the table set out in Jarman on Wills (5th ed.), vol. 2, p. 1430. This statement of the law is not confined to the case of a power to appoint by will, but extends also to a power to appoint by deed or will when the appointment is made by will. The earliest case I have found upon this subject is one of Thompson v. Towne, Prec. Ch. 52, 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 466. There a testator, at the time of his death having a power of appointment by will over a sum of £500, exercised such power by his will in favour of legatees. The Lord Keeper Somers decreed this £500 to be assets to pay the debts of the plaintiff, a creditor; and it is stated in the reports that on appeal to the House of Lords this decree was affirmed, but upon what precise grounds does not appear.

When the power is to appoint by deed or will, the appointee under an appointment by deed for good consideration takes in priority to creditors. Thus, for example, in Lassells v. Lord Cornwallis, 2 Vern. 465, Prec. Ch. 232, and 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 467, Lord Cornwallis in the settlement on his marriage reserved a power to charge an estate with any sum not exceeding £3,000 for such purposes as he should think fit. Upon a sale he by deed appointed this £3,000 to the purchaser as a collateral security for the enjoyment of his purchase, and if no incumbrance arose the appointment was to be void. No incumbrance having arisen, by his will he bequeathed the £3,000. The Lord Keeper Wright, following Thompson v. Towne, decreed the £3,000 to be assets of Lord Cornwallis and subject to the collateral security to be applicable in payment of debts. In Daubeny v. Cockburn, 1 Mer. 626, at p. 639, Sir William Grant speaks of the general equity of creditors to have what is appointed to a volunteer considered as assets if wanted for the payment of debts: see also in Ewart v. Ewart, 1 W. R. 466, 11 Hare 276, at p. 285, per Lord Hatherley when Vice-Chancellor. It is contended in the present case that the creditor who lent money upon the faith of the covenant is not a volunteer as against the appointed fund. But although in the case of a general power to appoint by deed, or to appoint by deed or will, a contract to execute the power is aided as a defective execution, this is not so when the only power to appoint is by will. The granting of relief against the defective execution of a power is subject to the general rule that equity will not assist in defeating the intention of the person creating the power that no appointment should be made but by a revocable instrument: Reid v. Shergold, 10 Ves. 370, and Cooper v. Martin, per Rolt, L.J., 15 W. R. 5, L. R 3 Ch. App. 47, at p. 58. If the applicants were to succeed in the present case the result would practically be that a donee of a general power to appoint by will could always make an effectual appointment by an instrument inter vivos. The court will not decree specific performance of a covenant to execute a power where it is only a power to appoint by will. Such a covenant creates no specific charge, and a breach of it merely affords ground for a claim to damages: In re Parkin, Hill v. Schwarz, 41 W. R. 120, (1892) 3 Ch. 510, an authority which is, I think, really decisive of the present case. Much reliance was placed by the applicants upon the statement or dictum of Kay, L.J., then Kay, J., in In re Roper, 39 Ch. D. at p. 487, where it is said: "There is no doubt that, in case of a man who has a general power of appointment, and exercises it by will in favour of volunteers, the property so appointed will be considered as assets for the payment of his debts." I do not think, however, that it was intended there to make any distinction—in the case of an appointment by will—between an appointment to volunteers and one to other persons. If it was, I think the statement is inaccurate or misleading.

The truth is that everyone taking under an appointment by will, though a creditor, is merely a volunteer as between himself and the creditors. The books no doubt speak of a legacy for good consideration—e.g., a legacy to a widow in lieu of dower or to a creditor in satisfaction of his debt, and when the other creditors have been paid such legatees as between themselves and other legatees may be entitled to priority. Still they are only legatees, and in respect of the legacy volunteers as between themselves and the general body of creditors.

The result, if I am right, is that the applicants have no priority as against the appointed fund over other creditors, and there must be a declaration accordingly.

The applicants appealed.

Badcock, K.C., and E. Ford, for the appellants.

Hughes, K.C., and Wace, for the respondents.

Badcock, K.C., replied.

The following authorities were referred to in addition to those cited in the court below: Robinson v. Ommanney, 31 W. R. 525, 23 Ch. D. 285; Townshend v. Windham, 2 Ves. sen. 1; Vaughan v. Vandersteegen, 2 W. R. 293, 2 Drew. 165; Bainton v. Ward, 2 Atk. 172; In re Harvey's Estate, Godfrey v. Harben, 28 W. R. 73; In re Parkin, Hill v. Schwarz, 41 W. R. 120, [1892] 3 Ch. 510; Goylmer v. Paddiston, 2 Vent. 353, s.c. sub. nom. Goilmere v. Battison, 1 Vern. 48; George v. Milbanke, 9 Ves. 190.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that the judgment of Joyce, J., is right and must be affirmed. In this case Mr. Lawley, who under the will of his mother had a general power to appoint by will a sum of £10,000, which in default of appointment was to go as part of her residuary estate, borrowed £1,000, and as part of the security covenanted forthwith to make a will exercising the power of appointment for the purpose of securing the payment to the lender of the said £1,000 and interest. He exercised the power of appointment by his will and died. The question which we have to decide is whether the applicants, who are the legal personal representatives of the lender, have as against the appointed fund any charge or any priority over the other creditors. There can be no doubt but that both real and personal estate subject to general powers of appointment become assets for the payment of the appointor's debts if the power is exercised in favour of volunteers. The power must, of course, be exercised, but provided the general power is exercised the estate becomes assets. It is said, however, that this proposition is only good as against volunteers. Mr. Badcock has argued before us that the representatives of the mortgagee in the present case are not volunteers, the mortgagee having purchased the exercise of the appointment by the loan of £1,000.

Now in Fleming v. Buchanan Knight-Bruce, L.J., in the passage cited by Joyce, J., in his judgment, says: [His lordship read the passage, and continued:] Our attention was called to the fact that Knight-Bruce, L.J., in this passage does not use the word volunteer at all, and it is suggested that the rule as laid down by the Lord Justice applies equally whether the person in whose favour the general power is exercised is a creditor or a volunteer. I somewhat doubt myself whether the Lord Justice did intend to lay down the rule as widely as this, and I am not sure that it would have been right so to do. It will be observed that the Lord Justice was dealing with a case in which a general power was exercised by testamentary appointment, and in which there was no suggestion of an antecedent charge or of a covenant to exercise the power, and in which there is nothing to show that there was any power exercisable by deed as well as by will. Now, if one applies the rule laid down by the Lord Justice to a case of the exercise by testamentary appointment of a power only exercisable by will it does not seem to matter one bit whether one limits the rule, that the exercise of a general power of appointment makes the subject of it assets for the appointor's debts to volunteers or does not do so, because in my opinion in such a case everyone who takes under the will exercising the power necessarily is a volunteer. The judgment of Stirling, L.J., then Stirling, J., in In re Parkin makes it clear that a contract to leave by will on the part of one who is merely donee of a testamentary power of appointment cannot be enforced by a judgment or decree for specific performance, and it is equally clear that the revocation of a will made in pursuance of such a contract cannot be restrained. The basis of this judgment is that the donor of a power exercisable by will only does not intend that the power should be exercised until death. The donor means the power to remain capable of execution till the death of the donee of the power, and the court will not assist to defeat the intention of the donor. This being so, all that the lender of the money got by the covenant in the mortgage deed was the covenant and the right to damages for breach of it. He did not under the deed get any priority or charge whatsoever. The exercise of the power makes the fund assets at the moment of death, and cannot do so before. It follows that the position of the lender in whose favour the power was exercised is that of a legatee taking by the bounty of the testator; he could not at any time before the death of the testator have asserted any title to or charge on this personal estate. In truth, everyone taking under a will is a volunteer even though the testator may have been under some contractual obligation to make the appointment. I prefer to base my judgment on my conclusion that the lender, the mortgagee, Mr. Perkins, was in fact a volunteer, because I have no doubt myself that this rule making real and personal estate subject to general powers of appointment assets for the payment of the appointor's debts was a rule laid down in favour of creditors against volunteers, and I doubt very much whether the original rule had any reference to the priority of secured over unsecured creditors.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am unable to differ from the reasoning of Joyce, J., and after what has been said by him, and said in this court, I have very few observations to make. It is important, in my opinion, to bear in mind in dealing with this case that the mortgagor had no power of appointment by deed, and consequently the mortgage which was executed by him was ineffectual to create a charge on the fund, which was the subject of the power of appointment, or to bind that fund in any way. I think that the case of Reid v. Shergold, and what is there laid down by Lord Eldon, is a clear authority for that proposition. For the reasons which were given in the case which I myself decided of In re Parkin, and to which I adhere, I think that the covenant on the part of the mortgagor contained in the mortgage deed to execute the power of appointment by will was incapable of being enforced by way of specific performance, and for the same reasons I think that the covenant not to revoke the will, when made, could not be enforced by injunction. Now, that being so, it seems to me that the mortgage deed amounted to personal security and nothing more. What the mortgagees got by virtue of that deed consisted simply of the personal covenant of the mortgagor, and as regards the fund itself the mortgagees were content to accept such a title as the will of the mortgagor could confer upon them—that is to say, a title which depended on the bounty of the testator. Now that title is subject to various infirmities, and amongst others to this, that the law has said, with respect to testamentary dispositions, that the testator must be just before he is generous—that is to say, that those dispositions can take effect only subject to the payment of the general creditors of the testator. I cannot see myself that the mortgagees in this case have, as regards the fund, any priority over other creditors so far as they claim under the will, and it is only by virtue of the will, as I have already said, that they can claim the fund. They are, as between themselves and the other creditors, volunteers. I should like to say one word as to the only direct authority which was cited in favour of the appellants, that is the case of In re Newnham's Estate before Hall, V.C., which is reported very briefly in the Weekly Notes for 1881, at p. 69. That, in my opinion, was a different case. In that case the testatrix having a power of appointment by will had induced the trustees of the will to pay over a portion of the fund to her in her lifetime, and she made a will by which she exercised the testamentary power of appointment by directing that the trustees should hold the fund upon trust to pay and indemnify themselves against advances which had been made to her and subject thereto upon trust for certain beneficiaries. After the death of the testatrix who had so exercised the power by will general creditors contended that by appointing the fund the law made it available for payment of her debts, and that the trustees must make good the portions of the fund which they had misapplied before they could prove against the estate for advances. The Vice-Chancellor rejected that contention, saying that as the creditors of the donee of the power could not get at the property subject thereto except through the act of appointment he could not take it against the other acts of the appointor. That report is a very short one, and the grounds for the decision are not clearly stated, but I apprehend that to mean this: Supposing that the executors of the testator had asked for payment to themselves of the whole fund the trustees who had made the advance would have a right to say "We paid that portion to your testatrix and it is already a part of her assets. You cannot call upon us to replace the fund." I think that the creditors would not stand in any better position than the executors through whom they claimed title, and that the act of the appointor which was referred to by Hall, V.C., is her act in taking possession in her lifetime of part of the fund which was subject to the power. In my judgment that does not apply to the present case at all, which is an appointment for special reasons, and therefore I think the present case is not governed by it and that the decision of Joyce, J., ought to be affirmed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the language of James, L.J., in In re Hoskin's Trusts, 25 W. R. 779, 6 Ch. D. 281, "I hold it to be established beyond all question that when a feme covert, or any other person having a general power of appointment over a fund of personalty, makes an appointment of the fund by will and appoints an executor, the executor, when he has proved the will, is entitled to receive the appointed fund."

The executors here were entitled to receive and have received the appointed fund. The question then arises, what are they to do with it? As a matter of construction this is a demonstrative legacy, and as such it is subject to the payment of the testator's debts. It is said, however, that this is not so, because the will was made in pursuance of a covenant in the mortgage and was not a voluntary transaction. But the applicants take nothing under the mortgage. They take solely under the will. The doctrine of specific performance has no application to a case like the present. The testator covenanted that he would give a legacy, and he has given a legacy. Such a legacy must be taken with all its incidents. There are some legacies which have priority over other legacies, such as legacies to a widow in satisfaction of her dower, or to a creditor in satisfaction of a debt. But it has never been held that such a preferential legacy can be paid until after all debts are satisfied: see Blower v. Morret, 2 Ves. sen. 420, and Davies v. Bush, Younge, 341. It may be, though I express no opinion on the point, that the applicants might claim priority over any ordinary legatees of other parts of the £10,000, but I am clearly of opinion that they cannot claim a penny in their character of legatees as against the testator's creditors.

A testatrix by her will gave a legacy to Percy H., son of C. A. H. C. A. H. had no son Percy; but he had a son Herbert who was generally called "Bertie." Two persons, not sons of C. A. H., but who stood to the testatrix in the same degree of relationship as the sons of the said C. A. H., bore the name of Percy, but they did not claim the legacy.

Held, that Herbert, son of C. A. H., was entitled to the legacy, the solicitor taking testatrix's instructions having probably mistaken the word Bertie for the word Percy.

Summons.

This was a summons on the part of Herbert William Hooper to determine what person upon the true construction was entitled to a legacy of £200 given under the will of Anne Hooper, deceased.

The facts of the case were as follows: By her will bearing date the 13th of December, 1881, the testatrix appointed E. F. Good and J. Warner executors thereof and devised and bequeathed to them all her estate and effects upon trust for sale and conversion, and after payment thereof upon trust to pay a number of legacies, and among others a legacy to "Percy Hooper, son of Charles Adams Hooper, £200." The rest of the estate was thereby given to testatrix's executors for their own use and benefit. The said testatrix died on the 14th day of January, 1895, without having altered or revoked her said will, and probate thereof was duly granted to the said executors named in the will.

At the time of the testatrix's death the said Charles Adams Hooper, who was a nephew of the testatrix's husband, had three sons: Charles Bennett Hooper, Archibald Frank Hooper, and Herbert William Hooper. Another nephew of the testatrix's husband, Leonard Hooper, had a son named Leonard Percy Hooper, and a third nephew of the same gentleman had a son named Percy Frank William Hooper. The plaintiff claimed the legacy on the ground that he was a son of Charles Adams Hooper, that he was usually called "Bertie" (facts verified by affidavit), and that the testatrix in giving instructions for her will must have said "Bertie, son of Charles Adams Hooper," and that the solicitor preparing the same mistook the word Bertie for the word Percy and accordingly wrote "Percy, son of Charles Adams Hooper," instead of "Bertie, son of Charles Adams Hooper."

Church, for the plaintiff.—It is clear that there was a mistake by the solicitor in preparing the will. The testatrix no doubt used the word Bertie which he mistook for Percy. This is a case where the description "son of Charles Adams Hooper" may reasonably be held to prevail against the name Percy.

He referred to Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), pp. 240-247; Pitcairne v. Brase, Finch, 403.

Druce, for the executors.—In view of the fact that there are sons of other nephews of the testatrix whose names are Percy, the intention of the testatrix to benefit the plaintiff is doubtful and the gift fails for ambiguity.

Adams v. Jones, 9 Hare 485, was also referred to.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—Charles Adams Hooper, a nephew of the testatrix's husband, had three sons, one of whom, the plaintiff, was called Bertie. Besides there are two other sons of the nephews of the testatrix's husband called Percy—Leonard Percy Hooper and Percy Frank William Hooper. Neither of these, however, claims the legacy. If the bequest is ambiguous, of course the legacy must fail. But I think that the legatee is sufficiently identified as the son of Charles Adams Hooper. And it was not at all unnatural that the solicitor in taking the testatrix's instructions should have mistaken the word Bertie for Percy. I therefore hold that Herbert William Hooper is entitled to the legacy.

Originating summons.

This was the further consideration of one summons and the hearing of another, both being upon the same will and heard together.

So far as the questions upon which the case is reported are concerned the facts were as follows:

R. Appleby, by his will in 1848, having given his personalty, other than leaseholds, to trustees for sale and conversion and for investment as therein mentioned, and having given and devised his real and leasehold estates to his trustees, directed them to hold his real and leasehold estates and residuary personalty and the stocks, funds, and securities of which the same might consist, upon certain trusts for his daughter Ann Skinner, the wife of J. H. Skinner (after the death of his wife, who died in his lifetime), during her life. And after her death, in case she should leave J. H. Skinner or any future husband surviving her, to pay the rents and profits, interest, dividends, and income to J. H. Skinner or such future husband during his life; and subject to these trusts the real and residuary personal estates were after the death of Mrs. Skinner to be held upon certain trusts for her children. And in default of children (which happened), after the decease of Mrs. Skinner and of any husband of hers, and of such failure of her children as aforesaid, the trustees were to sell the real and leasehold estates and hold the moneys to arise from the sale, and also the residuary personal estate, upon trust for certain persons and their children as therein mentioned, all of whom were ascertainable within the period allowed by law.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died in 1854. In the same year J. H. Skinner was appointed a trustee of the will together with the two trustees named in the will who had accepted the trusts.

In 1873 these other two trustees died, leaving J. H. Skinner the sole trustee.

In 1875 two new trustees were appointed—namely, the plaintiffs in the first summons.

At the date of the deed next mentioned the trust property consisted in part of various securities included in a schedule to the deed which were not authorized as investments by the will of the testator.

By deed in November, 1876, reciting that the greater part of the investments in the schedule thereto were unauthorized, but that J. H. Skinner desired that the trust property should remain undisturbed in its then state of investment, he covenanted to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of the same. The income from the unauthorized investments continued to be paid to Ann Skinner. She died in October, 1882. After her death the income of the investments was received and retained by J. H. Skinner as tenant for life until their sale, which took place in the course of the year 1885, when they were sold at a profit.

In July, 1899, J. H. Skinner died.

In February, 1900, the surviving trustees took out the first summons against the beneficiaries and persons claiming from them asking for an inquiry who were the persons then entitled, and in what shares, to the residuary estate. Shortly afterwards one trustee, who was the legal personal representative of Mrs. Skinner, the sole next-of-kin of the testator, took out the second summons against the other trustee, who was appointed to represent the heir-at-law of the testator, and against the persons claiming under the trust for sale, to have it declared that all the limitations after the death of J. H. Skinner were void for remoteness. An inquiry having been directed under the first summons as to what (if anything) the estate of J. H. Skinner was liable for in respect of over-payments of income arising from the unauthorized securities, the master certified that the income from this source made or retained by J. H. Skinner and the other trustees from one year from the death of the testator amounted to £16,456 12s. 8d., and that if the trust moneys had been invested in Consols they would have produced £9,927 15s. 5d., showing a difference of £6,528 17s. 3d. The case now came on for further consideration. Any claim in respect of income made during the life of Mrs. Skinner was not pressed, and the question argued was confined to the income received from the unauthorized investments by J. H. Skinner after his wife's death from 1882 to 1885.

Mulligan, K.C., and T. A. Herbert, for the trustees of the will of the testator.—The plaintiffs are not bound to account for the income received by J. H. Skinner. There has been no loss to the estate from the investment of the trust moneys upon the securities from which this income proceeded. J. H. Skinner as tenant for life was entitled to the whole income, and he is not liable either as tenant for life or as trustee to refund any part of it: Stroud v. Gwyer, 28 Beav. 130, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 85.

Carson, K.C., and Beddall, for one of the beneficiaries under the trust for sale.—The trustees and the estate of Skinner must account for the income received over what would have been received if the trust fund had been invested in Consols: Dimes v. Scott, 4 Russ. 195. The case of Stroud v. Gwyer was wrongly decided, and was disapproved of by Hall, V.C., in In re Hill, 50 L. J. Ch. 551, 29 W. R. Dig. 196 The distinction made by Romilly, M.R., in Stroud v. Gwyer, between that case and Dimes v. Scott is unsound.

Norton, K.C., and C. W. Turner, Rowden, K.C., and R. Hughes, Levett, K.C., and J. D. Davenport, MacSwinney, T. Douglas, and E. P. Hewitt, for other beneficiaries or assignees.

BYRNE, J., held that the estate of J. H. Skinner was not liable to repay the money claimed, in his capacity of tenant for life; the claim against J. H. Skinner was barred by the Statute of Limitations; and as regards his capacity of trustee the case was covered by Stroud v. Gwyer, by which his lordship considered bound.

The next question was as to the validity of the trusts of the proceeds of sale of the real and leasehold estates, and arose upon the second summons.

Norton, K.C., and T. A. Herbert, for the trustees.—The trust for sale is clearly void, as it is to take effect after the death of any future husband of Mrs. Skinner, and he might not be born until after the death of the testator. That being so, all the trusts of the proceeds of the sale are void also, and the property passes to the heir-at-law: London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 321, 620, 20 Ch. D. 562. Goodier v. Johnson, 30 W. R. 449, 18 Ch. D. 441, was a different case, as there there was a gift of the income until the sale. Goodier v. Edmunds, [1893] 3 Ch. 455, on the same will, only decided that the beneficiaries took the shares as real estate. In re Daveron, 42 W. R. 24, [1893] 3 Ch. 421, was decided upon the ground of election.

They also referred to In re Warren's Trusts, 32 W. R. 641, 26 Ch. D. 208; Wollaston v. King, 17 W. R. 641, L. R. 8 Eq. 165; In re Hancock, 23 L. R. Ir. 34, 37 W. R. Dig. 205.

Rowden, K.C., and R. Hughes, for some of the beneficiaries under the trust for sale.—The trust for sale is mere machinery, and directed only for the purposes of division: In re Daveron. The classes of beneficiaries are all ascertainable within the prescribed period. In re Wood, [1894] 2 Ch. 310, was a different case, as there the class was not to be ascertained within the period named.

They also referred to Wood v. Drew, 33 Beav. 610.

Norton, K.C., and C. W. Turner, Levett, K.C., and J. D. Davenport, MacSwinney, T. Douglas, and E. P. Hewett, for other beneficiaries or mortgagees, supported this view.

July 1.—BYRNE, J.—I propose to follow the view of the law as expressed by Stirling, J., in Goodier v. Edmunds. That case came before the Court of Appeal as Goodier v. Johnson upon a question of construction, but Jessel, M.R., at the end of his judgment, says: "The result is that there is a gift to a class who must be ascertainable within the prescribed period subject to gifts over of shares in certain events, and if any of these gifts over are invalid, the original gift of those shares remains unaffected. It seems to me, however, that the trust for sale is bad, as it is not limited to take effect within the period of a life in being and twenty-one years after. But there is a trust of the property, and the rents and profits thereof, until sale, for the persons to whom the proceeds of sale are bequeathed, and if the trust for sale is bad, still that trust is good, and will carry the property to them. It therefore appears to me that the whole corpus is effectually disposed of." In the will in that case there was in terms a gift of the income of the property until the sale in favour of the persons who would take the proceeds of the sale if the trusts for sale had been good. In the present case I have no such gift in terms. When that case came again before Stirling, J., he says, with reference to the view of Jessel, M.R.: "Sir George Jessel, however, does not say (though his language may seem to imply) that the beneficial interests would have failed but for the trust of the rents and profits until sale. . . . As at present advised I should not be prepared to hold that the interests of the beneficiaries would fail notwithstanding the invalidity of the trust for sale. To hold, for example, that a trust to sell at a period beyond the perpetuity limits, is entirely invalid; but that a trust to divide at the same period between the members of the same class, accompanied by a power to sell for the purposes of division, is good as regards the equitable interests, would, in my judgment, be to sacrifice substance to form. Cases may possibly occur where the trust for sale and the beneficial interests thereunder are so inextricably mixed up that both must stand or fall together; but where it can be seen that the trust for sale is mere machinery for facilitating a division between the persons for whom the property is destined, I think that effect ought to be given to the equitable interests, even though the instrument by means of which the division is intended to be carried out may prove to be unavailing. In the present case I should have thought that, in the absence of the trust of rents and profits until sale, the beneficiaries ought to be held entitled, but that the beneficial interests would devolve as real estate; for I apprehend that nothing short of an absolute and effective trust for sale can in equity create a conversion of realty into personalty": see Hyett v. Mekin, 32 W. R. 513, 25 Ch. D. 735. As regards the will in the case before me, I come to the conclusion that the trust for sale is mere machinery for the purpose of division, and that the equitable interests go to the persons who would have taken under the trust for sale, but that they pass as real estate.

Held, on appeal, reversing the revising barrister's decision, that whether or not the benefit of the Electoral Disabilities (Military Service) Removal Act, 1900, terminated immediately upon the proclamation of peace, the interval between the declaration of peace and the end of the qualifying period was covered by section 2 of the Electoral Disabilities Act, 1891.

Per Lord Alverstone, L.C.J.—That the whole of the qualifying period was covered by the Act of 1900, s. 1 (i.), as the word "during" in section 3 referred less to the mere continuance of the war than to the continuance of military service rendered necessary by the war.

Case stated by the revising barrister, for the borough of Ipswich.

The appellant, who claimed to be placed on the occupiers' list of electors for the parish of St. Clement's, Ipswich, had volunteered for military service in the recent war in South Africa, and he was absent from this country on military service on behalf of the Crown in South Africa during the whole of the twelve months preceding the 15th of July, 1902.

On objection being made to the claim, it was argued that the claim was good under the Electoral Disabilities (Military Service) Removal Act, 1900, notwithstanding the claimant's absence.

The revising barrister decided that as peace was proclaimed in June, 1902, the claim was bad, inasmuch as the war had come to an end on the declaration of peace, and the absence of the claimant during the whole of the qualifying period was consequently not an "absence during the continuance of the present war" within the meaning of section 3 of the said Act; and he disallowed the claim of the appellant Marsh and of two other persons who claimed on the same grounds.

From this decision the claimant Marsh appealed.

Section 1 (i.) of the Electoral Disabilities (Military Service) Removal Act, 1900, provides that "a person shall not be disqualified for being registered for voting . . . in respect of a qualification for which any residency or inhabitancy is required, by reason only that during the whole or any part of the qualifying period he has as a member of the Reserve, Militia, Yeomanry, or Volunteer Forces, or otherwise as a volunteer been absent on actual military service on behalf of the Crown, whether beyond the seas or not." By section 3, "this Act shall apply only to absence during the continuance of the present war in South Africa."

Section 2 of the Disabilities Removal Act, 1891, enacts that "a person shall not be disqualified from being registered" as a parliamentary or local government elector "by reason only that during part of the qualifying period not exceeding four months during any one term, he has in the performance of any duty arising from or incidental to any office, service, or employment held or undertaken by him, been absent from his dwelling-house or lodgings."

Daldy, for the appellant.—The revising barrister was wrong in holding that the Act of 1900 only excused residence up to the date of the "termination of the continuance of the war." The words in section 3, "during the continuance of the present war," must be taken to include a reasonable period after the actual declaration of peace. After the war has ended, so far as actual hostilities are concerned, there are still martial operations and the necessary movements of troops. The object of the Act would be defeated if the narrow construction placed on it by the revising barrister is upheld. Moreover, it would be impossible to get home the whole of the men who volunteered, between the declaration of peace in June and the 15th of July; and if the barrister's view is right, then those volunteers who were not in England by the 15th of July last are disfranchised for the present year. Even if the decision were right on the ground that the war ceased on peace being declared, the interval between the declaration of peace and the 15th of July is covered by the provisions of section 2 of the Act of 1891.

The respondent (the town clerk of Ipswich, who had been made respondent pursuant to section 38 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878) did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We differ somewhat as to the grounds on which this appeal should be allowed, but are all agreed that the revising barrister ought to have allowed the claims. Speaking for myself, I am content to base my judgment on what I think to be the true construction to be placed on sections 1 and 3 of the Act of 1900. [His lordship having read the sections, continued:] If a strict grammatical construction must be placed by the court on these sections, the line would have to be drawn at the moment of the declaration of peace. Mr. Daldy contended that the intepretation put on the word "during" by the revising barrister was too narrow, and he pointed out that if the revising barrister's decision was right then as peace was declared before the 15th of July all who had volunteered and did not get back before that date lost their vote, whereas if peace had been declared on the 16th of July all who came back would be able to claim the benefit intended to be given them by the Act. In my opinion the word "during" refers less to the continuance of the war than to the services rendered necessary by the war. Happily, in any case the Act of 1891 gets over the difficulty. The words that have raised the difficulty are those in section 3 of the later Act of 1900, and no doubt the Legislature will see that they are not again used if an Act is passed next time England has a foreign war. In my opinion the provisions in the Act of 1891 may reasonably be construed so as to cover this case. There is no evidence on which we are invited to hold the contrary.

WILLS, J.—I agree that the claimant ought to be registered, but I confess I find some difficulty in construing the words of the Act of 1900 as liberally as they have been construed, as it is difficult to get out of the material words more than they actually say. However, as even on the strictest grammatical construction given to the words and taking them in their narrowest sense, the claimant was excused residence up to June; and the remaining few weeks were covered by the Act of 1891; so that whether you give the narrow or the liberal construction to the Act of 1900, the appeal ought to be allowed and the claim admitted.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I am content to base my decision on the Act of 1891, which, on the evidence before us, is sufficient to justify the claimant's right to be registered as a voter. As the Act of 1900 refers only to the war now happily over, it appears to me unnecessary to try and decide what is the proper construction to be borne by the words "during the continuance of the present war," as no doubt the Legislature will take care that such a question shall not arise again.

Under the Metropolitan Meat Market Act, 1860, the Corporation of the City of London were authorized to take a certain portion of the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, in connection with the establishment of a meat market, and by section 11 *of that Act it was provided that, except for the purposes of rating, the premises so taken should be deemed to be in the City of London, but that they should, nevertheless, continue to be rated in and to the parish of St. Sepulchre. The appellant, who was the occupier of a stall in the meat market on a portion of the above premises, claimed to have his name inserted in Division I. of the occupiers' list of voters for the East Division of the Parliamentary Borough of Finsbury, and his claim was objected to.

The revising barrister disallowed the claim, on the ground that, on the true construction of the Act of 1860, the qualifying premises ceased in 1860 to form part of the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, for the purposes of the electoral franchise, and that that was so notwithstanding the provision as to rating contained in section 11.

THE COURT affirmed his decision on the same grounds.

Case stated by the Revising Barrister for the East Division of the Parliamentary Borough of Finsbury.

The appellant claimed as a joint tenant of a stall in the Central Meat Market of the City of London to have his name inserted in Division I. of the occupiers' list of electors for the East Division of the Parliamentary Borough of Finsbury in the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, as a £10 occupier in respect of the said stall.

The claim was duly objected to.

The revising barrister decided that the area of the qualifying property was not within the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, mentioned in the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, Schedule VI., which defined the boundaries of the Parliamentary borough of Finsbury; that the area of the qualifying property had previously to the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, ceased to be part of the parish of St. Sepulchre, and was within the City of London pursuant to the Metropolitan Meat and Poultry Market Act, 1860; and that that was the case notwithstanding the provisions relating to rating in section 11 of that Act; and he accordingly refused to place the claimant's name upon the register.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts were as follows:

In connection with the construction of the Central Meat Market, the Corporation of the City of London were authorized by the Metropolitan Meat Market Act, 1860, to purchase and take certain lands and tenements then situate in the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex (which adjoins the city), and the property in respect of which the present claim was made constituted part of the site of the said premises.

By section 11 of the Act of 1860, it was provided that "except for the purposes of rating, as hereinafter mentioned," these lands and tenements by the Act authorized to be purchased and taken "shall as and when purchased and taken be deemed to be and be in the City of London, but they shall nevertheless continue to be rated and assessed as if they had remained in and continued to form a part of the said parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, and shall continue to be rated to . . . poor and other parochial rates of that parish, and the same shall be paid by the corporation of the city (who shall be deemed the occupiers of the premises) in and to the said parish upon the same assessable value as those lands and tenements are now assessed, but the sites of the said lands and tenements, or any other buildings that may at any time be erected thereon, shall not be otherwise rated or assessed to the said parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, or any other parish whatsoever."

By the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, Schedule VI., the East Division of the Parliamentary borough of Finsbury includes the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex.

Soper, for the appellant.—The appellant and seventeen other persons, who are also appellants, hold stalls on a part of the meat market which was acquired by the City of London and which till then formed part of the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex. Up to last year the claimants had all been on the list of voters for the East Division of Finsbury, but their names were last year taken off, and the revising barrister has now refused to replace them on the ground that the effect of the Meat Market Act, 1860, was to bring the portion of St. Sepulchre parish acquired by the City of London within the city. Inasmuch as section 11 of the Market Act, 1860, expressly provides that the part of the market which was formerly in the parish of St. Sepulchre shall continue to be rated and assessed as if it remained in and continued to form part of that parish, it implies that that part has never been separated from that parish for Parliamentary purposes. Therefore the claimants were entitled to be put upon the list of voters for East Finsbury for that parish to which they are rated.

The respondent was not represented.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think that the decision that the revising barrister has come to is a right decision. The facts show that the City of London acquired a part of the parish of St. Sepulchre for the purpose of enlarging their meat market. Under the Act authorizing them to acquire this additional land a provision is made that that part of the market should nevertheless continue to be rated in and to the rates of that parish of which it formerly formed a part. But that provision was inserted only to make good the primary loss to the parish of St. Sepulchre, it did not prevent the land so acquired from becoming part of the City of London for Parliamentary and other purposes. The revising barrister was right in disallowing the claims on the ground that the appellants had no qualifying occupancy in East Finsbury.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

GUARDIANS OF PLYMOUTH UNION (Appellants) v. GIBBS (Respondent). (a.)

Bastardy — Poor law — Illegitimate child becoming chargeable—Marriage of mother—Power of guardians to obtain order against putative father—Bastardy Laws Amendment Act (36 Vict. c. 9), s. 5.

It is competent for the magistrates, at the instance of the poor law guardians, to make an order against the putative father of an illegitimate child who has become chargeable to the union, ordering him to contribute to its support, notwithstanding that the mother of the child has a husband who is able to support it.

Case stated by magistrates.

The special case set out the following facts:

On the 29th of January, 1902, a summons was issued against the respondent calling on him to show cause why he should not contribute to the support of a bastard child of one Florence Payne, formerly Saxey, which it was alleged had become chargeable to the town of Plymouth, and of which he was alleged to be the father.

At the hearing of the summons it was proved that Florence Saxey, then a single woman, on the 16th of December, 1898, gave birth to a bastard child afterward named Charles Henry Gibbs Saxey, of which the defendant was proved to be the father.

On the 16th day of April, 1901, Florence Saxey married one George Payne, a stableman, earning from 21s. to 22s. 9d. per week, and three months after the marriage the home was broken up, and the said Charles Henry Gibbs Saxey was on the 16th of July, 1901, taken to the workhouse in the town of Plymouth, where he was still being maintained.

It was admitted George Payne was of sufficient ability to maintain the said C. H. G. Saxey.

On the 17th of August, 1901, Florence Saxey resumed cohabitation with, and was living with George Payne at the date of the hearing, but he refused to take C. H. G. Saxey out of the workhouse and maintain him.

The contention of the appellants before the magistrate was that they were entitled to an order against the respondent under 36 Vict. c. 9, s. 5, to contribute to the relief of the bastard child, and that it was not obligatory on them to force the husband to maintain him.

The respondent contended that on the marriage of Florence Saxey her husband, George Payne, became permanently legally liable to maintain the bastard child, and as George Payne was of sufficient ability to maintain the child the justices were not at liberty to make an order on the putative father to contribute towards the relief of the child, who had not become properly chargeable to the town of Plymouth.

The justices dismissed the application on the following grounds—viz.: That by statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 57, the liability is thrown upon the husband to maintain the illegitimate children of his wife born before marriage while under sixteen years of age, and that the case of Lang v. Spicer, 1 M. & W. 129, expressly decides that the husband is primarily liable under the statute for such maintenance at least while of ability to maintain; and, further, that having regard to the fact that a woman cannot herself obtain an order against the putative father of an illegitimate child born before marriage, it would seem inconsistent that the guardians of the poor should be able to do so in such a case, seeing that there is a person—namely, the husband, who by statute is responsible.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument or before the magistrates: Lang v. Spicer; Stacey v. Lintell, 27 W. R. 551, 4 Q. B. D. 291.

Gardner, for the appellants.

Hawke, for the respondents.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case is not free from difficulty, but it seems to me that we should consider the section and see if there is anything to prevent us from giving effect to the plain words of the section. At the time of the passing of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, and up till 1872 there was no power on behalf of guardians to obtain a direct order against the putative father of a bastard child, but they could enforce an order obtained by the mother. But by the Act of 1872 (36 Vict. c. 5) they obtained such a power for the first time. The Act of 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c 9) is practically identical with the previous statute. By section 5 of the last mentioned Act it is provided that "when a bastard child becomes chargeable to a union or parish the guardians may apply to two justices having jurisdiction in the union or parish in petty sessions, and thereupon such justices may summon the man alleged to be the father of the child to appear before them or two justices having the like jurisdiction to show cause why an order should not be made upon him to contribute to the relief of the child." It is contended that this section must be limited to the case of illegitimate children of a mother whose husband is not able to support them. This is practically what the argument on behalf of the respondent comes to. It is contended that the word chargeable in the Act of 1873 must be interpreted to mean ultimately chargeable. I think that if that had been intended other language would have been employed. I am of opinion that the words must be taken in their ordinary sense as meaning "in fact chargeable." Some colour is given to this view of section 5 by the third proviso, which provides that nothing in this section shall be deemed to relieve the mother of a bastard child from liability to maintain her child.

If that is so, the justices can call upon the putative father to show cause why he should not maintain the child. Of course, the fact that the mother's husband has means is one that the justices may and should take into consideration, but I have come to the conclusion that the magistrates may make an order notwithstanding that it has been proved that the mother's husband has means. The difficulty of dual liability has been discussed in several cases, and I would point out that it has been decided that an order can be enforced against the putative father after the marriage of the mother. The Acts of 1872 and 1873 were passed with a full knowledge of the existence of the dual liability, and if they had meant to give an unnatural meaning to the word "chargeable" other language would have been used. The case must go back to the magistrates with the opinion that they may make an order against the putative father, though I do not say they should do so.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } July 7; Aug. 6, 1902.

"THE LEITRIM." (a.)

Ship Admiralty—General average loss—General average adjusters—Loss of time freight.

The words "all loss" in the well-known passage in Lawrence, J.'s, judgment in Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East 220, at p. 228, relating to a general average sacrifice, ought not to be extended so as to include losses which are the result of accidental circumstances affecting the loser, and are not losses which the other persons interested ought in ordinary course to be treated as concerned with.

The practice of general average adjusters of not allowing in general average, loss of time freight which is the result of detention for repair of damage caused by a general average sacrifice is in accordance with legal principles, and is rightly left out of consideration.

Action.

The question raised in this case was whether a shipowner is entitled to some compensation in general average for the loss of time freight due to the detention of a vessel whilst under repair of damage resulting from a general average loss.

The plaintiff, Ralph Milbanke Hudson, was the registered managing owner of the steamship Leitrim, and the defendants were the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Co. (Limited).

The Leitrim was a steamship of 4,824 tons gross register, of the port of Sunderland, and was fitted for carrying frozen meat in her No. 2 lower hold.

On the 2nd of February, 1900, the vessel was chartered to Messrs. William Milburn & Co., at the rate of £1,680 per calendar month, the period of hire to expire about the 20th of January, 1901.

By clause 17 of the charter-party it was provided that "in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men and stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; and should she in consequence put into any other port than that to which she is bound the port charges and pilotage at such port to be borne by the steamer's owners; but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or from any accident to the cargo such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers' risk and expense."

By clause 28 the charterers had "liberty to sub-let the steamer for admiralty transport or other service, the charterers to remain responsible for due fulfilment of the conditions of the charter."

Under this latter clause the vessel was sub-let by charter on the 5th of September, 1900, to Messrs. Houlder Bros., for the purpose of carrying a cargo of coals from Barry to Cape Town. Under this charter freight was to be paid at the rate of thirty-five shillings per ton "delivered or on bill of lading quantity less two per cent. at receiver's option, to be declared in writing before cargo is broken."

On the 15th of September, whilst The Leitrim was loading coals at Barry, a fire broke out in No. 2. lower hold, and in order to extinguish the fire it was found necessary to pour large quantities of water into both No. 2 hold and into the cross-bunker to which the fire had spread. After the fire was extinguished, the coals from No. 2 hold and from the cross-bunker were landed and sold and were eventually replaced by new shipments. A portion of the insulation in No. 2 hold was damaged by the fire, and parts of the steelwork of that hold and also in the cross-bunker were burned and buckled. In addition to this fire damage to the insulation, the employment of water to extinguish the fire, so damaged the charcoal and paper of the insulation as to necessitate the renewal of nearly all of it, and in order to replace and repair it all the brine pipes in this hold and in the cross-bunker were necessarily removed. The time occupied in extinguishing the fire, discharging the damaged coals, and entirely repairing and refitting the vessel, extended from the 15th of September to the 24th of October, a period of thirty-nine days. The time necessary for the repair of the insulation damaged by water together with the incidental removal and reinstatement of the brine pipes would by itself have been thirty-one days. In respect of the period of thirty-nine days Messrs. Milburn & Co. claimed and were allowed by the plaintiff a deduction from the hire of the vessel of £2,160 under clause 17 of the charter-party of the 2nd of February, 1900. The vessel was insured by the plaintiff (and his co-owners) with the defendant company under a policy of the 18th of June, 1900, for £4,000, and it was on this policy that he claimed.

A statement of general average was prepared and dated the 11th of February, 1901, but the plaintiff objected that it did not allow him the loss of hire, which he contended should be made in general average as a voluntary sacrifice. Accordingly on the 14th of January, 1902, a supplementary general and particular average statement was prepared by average adjusters, and a general average sum of £1,340 2s. 11d. was allowed as "net loss of time freight resulting from detention under repair of general average damage exclusively, after crediting wages and provisions of crew already in general average." The concrete question for the court, therefore, was whether this sum of £1,340 2s. 11d. was rightly included in general average. If the judgment of the court was in the affirmative the plaintiff was to be taken to be entitled to recover £66 18s. 6d., but if in the negative judgment was to be entered for the defendants.

Carver, K.C., and Cambier, for the plaintiff.—The loss incurred was the direct consequence of the general average act of pouring the water into the hold to save the ship and cargo from destruction. This loss of hire, therefore, in respect of the time occupied in repairing the water damage, was a general average sacrifice and there is no reason why loss of time freight directly caused by the general average act should not be made good in general average. They relied on the definition of a general average sacrifice as laid down in Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East 220, at p. 228—viz., "all loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo come within general average, and must be borne proportionately by all who are interested." The words "all loss" certainly include the loss of time freight.

They cited Da Costa v. Newnham, 2 T. R. 407; Power v. Whitmore, 4 M. & Sel. 141; Anglo-Argentine &c., Agency v. Temperley Shipping Co., 48 W. R. 64, [1899] 2 Q. B. 403.

Scrutton, K.C., Hamilton, K.C., and Mackinnon, for the defendants.—By the universal practice of average adjusters loss of time freight is not treated as a general average loss. Clause 11 of the voyage charter incorporates the York-Antwerp rules, and as the shipowner gave authority to sublet, and allowed the shipment under those rules, the practice thereunder excludes the claim with adjustment of general average.

BARNES, J., in giving judgment, stated the facts, and proceeded as follows: The question raised in this case is novel and difficult and has not, so far as I am aware, been considered in the courts. Evidence has been given before me by experienced average adjusters to the effect that according to the practice of average adjusters a loss of time charter freight in such cases is never included in general average. No evidence to the contrary was given, and I think, therefore, it may be taken that the practice of average adjusters is uniform on this matter. The question, therefore, comes to be whether this practice is right, because although it was suggested by counsel for the defendant company that as the sub-charter provided that in case of average the same was to be settled according to the York-Antwerp Rules, 1890, and that under rule 18 of those rules, "Adjustment except as provided in the foregoing rules (which do not apply to the present case): the adjustment shall be drawn up in accordance with the laws and practice that would have governed the adjustment had the contract of affreightment not contained a clause to pay general average according to these rules." The adjustment should be in accordance with the practice, yet that rule does not, in my opinion, mean that the adjustment is to be in accordance with practice if the practice conflicts with the law. I have, therefore to determine what is the law applicable to this case. The real question appears to me to be whether the shipowner is entitled to some compensation in general average for the delay caused by the sacrifice. I do not think that the question is whether he is entitled to be compensated in general average for the particular consequence of the delay in this case, because that would be to make the rights and liabilities of the cargo owners depend entirely on the contract of time charter to which they are in no way parties. The shipowners' loss of freight is caused by the operation of the cessor clause, No. 17, in the original time charter. If that clause had not been inserted, the time charterers would have remained liable to pay the freight in accordance with the principle upon which the old case of Ripley v. Scaife, B. & C. 167, was decided, and in my opinion the cargo owners ought not to be affected by the question whether the loss of time falls, by the contract between the shipowner and the time charterers to be borne by the one or the other. If the time charterers had to continue paying freight during the delay, the measure of their loss would appear to be the loss of the benefit which would have accrued to them but for the delay. Counsel for the plaintiff relied upon the well-known passage in Lawrence, J.'s, judgment in Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East 220, at p. 228, which is as follows: "All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo, comes in this general average, and must be borne proportionately by all who are interested." They argue that the hire for thirty-one days was lost by the sacrifice, and that, therefore, it ought to be borne proportionately by all who are interested.

But, in my opinion, the words "all loss" in this and other statements of the principle of general average have not the width of meaning attributed to them by the plaintiff's counsel. They ought not, I think, to be held to extend to include losses which, to use a term which has been employed, are the result of "accidental circumstances" affecting the loser, and are not losses which the other person interested ought in ordinary course to be treated as concerned with. This term is to be found in the judgment of Lord Esher in Rodocanachi v. Milburn, 35 W. R. 241, 18 Q. B. D. 67. That was an action by charterers against shipowners for non-delivery of cargo, and the plaintiffs had sold the cargo to arrive. It was held that in estimating the damages the market value at the time when the cargo should have arrived must be looked at and not the price at which the plaintiffs had sold the cargo. Lord Esher said: "But the value is to be taken independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff. It is well settled that in an action for non-delivery or non-acceptance of goods under a contract of sale the law does not take into account, in estimating the damages, anything that is accidental as between the plaintiff and the defendant, as, for instance, an intermediate contract entered into with a third party for the purchase or sale of the goods. It is admitted in this case that if the plaintiffs had sold the goods for more than the market value before their arrival they could not recover on the basis of that price, but would be confined to the market price because the circumstance that they had so sold the goods at a higher price would be an accidental circumstance as between themselves and the shipowners, but it is said that as they have sold for a price less than the market price, the market price is not to govern, but the contract price. I think that if the law were so it would be very unjust. I adopt the rule laid down in Mayne on Damages which gives the market price as the test by which to estimate the value of the goods independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff, and so independently of any contract made by him for the sale of goods. That rule gives the mode of estimating the value which is to be taken for the purpose of arriving at the damages." It is for similar reasons that although when goods have been sold to arrive and have been jettisoned in circumstances giving rise to a general average loss the actual loss to the merchant is the price at which the goods were sold, yet the market value of the goods at the time of the ship's discharge is the basis of compensation. So also in my opinion the reason why, when a ship has been chartered at one rate of freight, and goods have been shipped at a different rate of freight, the chartered freight is left out of consideration in assessing the compensation for freight lost by jettison of goods, is that the chartered freight is a matter with which the owners of cargo are not concerned, and its loss may be termed an "accidental circumstance" peculiar to the shipowner.

These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the cargo-owners have no concern with the contract between the shipowner and the time charterers, that the loss of freight under it caused by the delay is the result of an accidental circumstance peculiar to the shipowner and time charterers and that the question is whether the shipowner is entitled to be compensated in general average on the basis of the ordinary consequences of the delay, as if the ship were carrying the goods simply under the contract under which they were shipped. This is a different question from that which has been discussed in text-books as to the allowance in general average to the owners, of the expenses of maintaining and paying the crew during the delay caused by the execution of repairs rendered necessary by a general average sacrifice. I know it has been thought by some that by common law those expenses are not to be included in general average in such a case, but the cases which are referred to by Mr. Lowndes and criticized by him on on p. 241 of his work do not appear to me to go to this length, and I agree with what Thesiger, L.J., said in Atwood v. Sellar, 28 W. R. 604, 5 Q. B. D. 286, that "As a matter of fact it is extremely doubtful whether the expenses for wages of crew or provisions in a port of refuge have ever been disallowed by our courts as constituting a claim for general average in a case where the ship has put into the port to repair damage itself belonging to general average." The wages and provisions of the crew during the delay in question have been allowed in general average in the present case apparently under the York-Antwerp rules, which are referred to in the sub-charter, and I have not to decide anything about them, though as at present advised there appears to me to be strong reasons for holding that at any rate whenever the delay is to repair damage which is itself the subject of general average, the wages and maintenance of the crew during such delay should be allowed by law in general average. But it does not at all follow that the mere loss of the profitable employment of the vessel as distinguished from actual expenses should in such a case be allowed.

In the first place, so far as I can ascertain, a loss of this character has never been claimed in general average. It is not introduced in the York-Antwerp rules, nor can I find any trace of it being allowed by the laws of any foreign country, though many of them contain provisions as to the allowance in general average of the wages and maintenance of the crew. It may be said, why on principle should not the loss of time be compensated for when that loss is due to the necessity for repairing damage, itself the subject of general average? I think the answer is that, although possibly there may be cases in which the loss of time is not common to all concerned, at any rate in cases like the present, is that the loss of time is common to all the parties interested and all suffer damage by the delay, so that the damages by loss of time may be considered proportionate to the interests and may be left out of consideration. Were this otherwise great inconvenience would arise and enormous difficulty be found in attempting to ascertain what was the proper amount of loss on each of the numerous interests which go to make up a shipping adventure. An average adjuster has a heavy task now when he has to deal with actual losses and values, but if he were also to have to assess speculative and estimated losses his task would be still heavier. Moreover, this inconvenience and difficulty is practically obviated by treating everyone's loss of time as proportionate to his interests and not bringing it into account. This appears to work substantial justice, for reverting to what I have said about accidental circumstances peculiar to a party, it seems clear that if the losses by delay—I am not dealing with expenses—were to be investigated, accidental circumstances would be excluded, with the result that all that could be considered would be the loss of the profitable employment during the delay of the capital invested in each interest concerned; and it would be unreasonable and difficult and involve very speculative inquiries to embark upon an examination of what upon such a basis would be the loss on each interest, so that for all practical purposes the losses may be considered as proportionate to the interest and left out of consideration altogether. Counsel for the plaintiff felt the difficulty there is in allowing claims for delay of a general character to be introduced into a statement of general average, and they endeavoured to distinguish between such claims and that in the present case the former, as they said, being speculative and the latter definitely ascertainable. But as I have already noticed, this definite loss is due to arrangements between the actual owner and the owners pro hac vice of the vessel which ought not to affect cargo owners who have no cognizance of such arrangements, and are not parties thereto, and place their goods on board the vessel on the terms that they shall be subjected to the ordinary incidents involved in so doing.

In my opinion, therefore, the practice affecting this matter, proved by the average adjusters who have been called, is in accordance with legal principles and is right, and I answer the question which was agreed should be submitted to the decision of the court—viz., whether the item of £1,340 2s. 11d. for sacrificing time hire was rightly included in the adjustment of general average, in the negative. The consequence is that judgment will be entered for the defendants with costs.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Nov. 26.

JONES v. LAVINGTON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant—Quiet enjoyment—Implied covenant—"Let"—Unlimited covenant.

An unlimited covenant for quiet enjoyment cannot be implied from the use of the word "let" in a contract of letting.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Grantham, J., and a jury.

The defendant was the holder of a long lease of a house granted in 1893 by the Governors of the Foundling Hospital, which lease contained a covenant by the lessee not to use the house or permit it be used for the purpose of any trade or business, and also contained a proviso for re-entry by the lessors in the event of a breach of the said covenant.

By an agreement in writing, not under seal, dated the 19th of July, 1900, between the defendant as landlord and the plaintiff as tenant, it was agreed as follows: "The landlord lets to the tenant who agrees to take" the lower part of the said house at a yearly rental of £85 for the term of three years. The agreement did not contain any covenant or term corresponding to the covenant contained in the superior lease. The plaintiff, who had no knowledge of the superior lease, entered into possession of the premises let to him and proceeded to carry on therein the trade and business of a metal worker.

In December, 1901, the plaintiff was restrained from carrying on his said trade or business on the said premises by an injunction obtained by the superior landlords.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that prior to the agreement he informed the defendant that he required the premises for the purpose of carrying on his said trade or business therein, and that the defendant verbally warranted and falsely represented to the plaintiff that he had good right and full title to demise and let the premises, and that the plaintiff should have and quietly enjoy the premises for the said purpose. The plaintiff also alleged that it was an implied term of the agreement that he should and might quietly enjoy the premises and carry on his said trade or business therein. The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of covenant, or in the alternative for breach of warranty and for fraudulent misrepresentation.

At the trial the jury in the first instance said that they found a verdict for the plaintiff for £150 damages; but Grantham, J., having subsequently asked them whether they found there had been any fraud on the part of the defendant, they answered that question in the negative. Grantham, J., thereupon gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff applied for judgment or a new trial.

Witt, K.C., and R. J. Drake, for the plaintiff.—This agreement of letting carries with it an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, which extends to eviction by title paramount. Such a covenant for quiet enjoyment is to be implied from the word "let" as much as from the word "demise." The dicta contained in the judgment delivered by Kay, L.J., in Baynes v. Lloyd, 44 W. R. 328, [1895] 2 Q. B. 610, to the effect that a distinction is to be drawn in this respect between the words "let" and "demise" have been disagreed with by the Divisional Court in Budd-Scott v. Daniell, ante, p. 134, [1902] 2 K. B. 351.

They referred to the following cases: De Lassalle v. Guildford, 49 W. R. 467, [1901] 2 K. B. 215; Holder v. Taylor, Hob. 12; and Bandy v. Cartwright, 1 W. R. 415, 8 Exch. 913.

Trevor F. Lloyd, for the defendant, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal fails. The jury have negatived fraud, and it is not seriously contended on the plaintiff's behalf that he can claim for breach of warranty, for the alleged agreement that the plaintiff should have quiet enjoyment, if it existed, was not a collateral agreement. It is, however, argued that out of the terms of the contract of letting a covenant or contract for quiet enjoyment can be implied, and that not merely a limited covenant for quiet enjoyment in respect of acts of the lessor and persons claiming under him, but an unlimited covenant in respect of the acts of all persons. That contention is concluded by the judgment of this court delivered by Kay, L.J., in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons. They there held that, assuming that in the absence of the word "demise" in a contract of letting either a covenant for title or a covenant for quiet enjoyment could be implied, the duration of such covenant was limited by that of the lessor's own estate. That was the point actually decided. But the court in the course of their judgment, dealing with the effect of the word "demise," and with the covenants in law to be implied therefrom, say this: "The weight of authority is in favour of the view that a covenant in law is not implied from the mere relation of landlord and tenant, but only from certain words used in creating the lease." They had previously said that "let" was not one of those words. They take exception to a dictum of Parke, B., in Hart v. Windsor, 12 M. & W. 68, at p. 85, that the word "let" or any equivalent words which constitute a lease have, no doubt, the same effect as the word "demise." Our attention was called to the case of Budd-Scott v. Daniell in the Divisional Court. I think it would be unbecoming in us to call in question the opinion expressed by the Court of Appeal. But it is not necessary for us to decide in this case whether any covenant for quiet enjoyment can be implied from the word "let." The plaintiff's contention is that an unlimited covenant can be implied. In my opinion the authorities show that whether any covenant for quiet enjoyment can be implied from the word "let," at any rate an unlimited covenant for quiet enjoyment cannot be implied.

Held, that, the breach of the contract of employment having occurred after the bankruptcy, the cause of action did not vest in the plaintiff's trustee in bankruptcy, who had not intervened in any way, and the plaintiff was therefore entitled to sue in his own name.

Judgment of Phillimore, J. ([1902] 2 K. B. 397), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., after the trial of the action with a jury: reported in [1902] 2 K. B. 397.

By an agreement in writing the defendants agreed to employ the plaintiff, and he agreed to serve them, as their traveller for a period of five years from the 17th of April, 1899, at a salary and a commission on all orders procured by him.

Early in June, 1901, the plaintiff was adjudicated bankrupt, and subsequently on the 29th of June, 1901, the defendants dismissed him from their employment.

He thereupon brought this action for wrongful dismissal, being then an undischarged bankrupt.

The defendants pleaded that the plaintiff before action was adjudicated a bankrupt, and remained undischarged when the action was brought, and that the cause of action, if any, vested in the trustee of his estate and effects.

The trustee in bankruptcy had not intervened in any way.

At the trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £100 damages, and Phillimore, J., on further consideration held that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain the action. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Kemp, K.C., and E. W. Hansell, for the defendants.—The plaintiff being an undischarged bankrupt the cause of action for wrongful dismissal vested in his trustee: Wadling v. Oliphant, 24 W. R. 246, 1 Q. B. D. 145; Emden v. Carte, 29 W. R. 600, 17 Ch. D. 169, 768. It was immaterial whether the breach of the contract of employment occurred before or after the adjudication. All a bankrupt's property, present or future, vests in his trustee in bankruptcy, except (1) certain property specially excepted by section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; (2) so much of the personal earnings of the bankrupt as are necessary for the support of himself and his family; and (3) damages recoverable for injury to the person or feelings of the bankrupt, whether arising from tort or breach of contract. The bankrupt may sue for property acquired by the bankrupt during his bankruptcy, including his personal earnings, subject to the right of his trustee to intervene, and in the case of personal earnings the trustee can only claim the surplus beyond that which is necessary for the support of bankrupt and his family. Damages for breach of contract to employ are not personal earnings; they are compensation for breach of the contract to employ: Wadling v. Oliphant. The damages here are not after-acquired property for which the bankrupt can sue in his own name until the trustee intervenes. The contract to employ the bankrupt was before the bankruptcy, and the right to sue for breach of it passed to the plaintiff's trustee in bankruptcy.

They also referred to Beckham v. Drake, 2 H. L. Cas. 579; Stanton v. Collier, 2 W. R. 197, 3 E. & B. 274; In re Byrne, Ex parte Henry, 9 Morrell 213, 41 W. R. Dig. 13; Osman v. Raphael, 12 Times L. R. 376.

Lord Coleridge, K.C., and J. R. Macoun (Bovill Smith with them), for the plaintiff.—The right to claim damages for wrongful dismissal after the bankruptcy is after-acquired property, for which the bankrupt can sue, though his trustee in bankruptcy may intervene: Herbert v. Sayer, 5 Q. B. 965; Jameson v. Brick and Stone Co., 27 W. R. 221, 4 Q. B. D. 208; Cohen v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 551, 25 Q. B. D. 262. The cases of Wadling v. Oliphant and Emden v. Carte did not decide that the bankrupt could not sue; they only decided that the trustee had the right to intervene. It might be that in the present case the trustee could intervene and claim the money, but that was a matter entirely between the bankrupt and his trustee. In Beckham v. Drake the wrongful dismissal occurred before the bankruptcy, and that case is not an authority for saying that in a case like the present the bankrupt cannot maintain the action. The old form of declaration for wrongful dismissal was that the plaintiff was ready and willing to go on serving the defendant, and yet the defendant dismissed him. The trustee in bankruptcy could not allege that. This in not such a contract as passed to the trustee in bankruptcy, and therefore, for any breach occurring after the bankruptcy the trustee cannot sue. If the contract passed to the trustee he must take it with its obligations as well as its benefits, and he would be liable to an action for breach of it, though he could not compel the bankrupt to perform it. A contract for mere personal service never passes to the trustee in bankruptcy: per Blackburn, J., in Wadling v. Oliphant, 1 Q. B. D., at p. 148. The action is therefore maintainable.

They also referred to Williams v. Chambers, 10 Q. B. 337; Ex parte Dewhurst, 20 W. R. 172, L. R 7 Ch. App. 185; Cook v. Whellock, 38 W. R. 534, 24 Q. B. D. 658; In re Roberts, 48 W. R. 132, [1900] 1 Q. B. 122.

Nov. 24.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., and the question is whether the trustee in the bankruptcy of the plaintiff is a necessary party to the action. The contract of employment was made before the bankruptcy, and the dismissal—that is, the breach—occurred after the adjudication. The defendants pleaded the bankruptcy of the plaintiff and that the cause of action had passed to his trustee. The question is whether that is a good plea; in other words, whether the action can be maintained by the bankrupt in his own name alone. Phillimore, J., held that the plea failed, and in my opinion that decision is right. A large number of authorities were cited to us, and we desired to look carefully into those authorities before giving our decision, and for that purpose we postponed giving judgment.

The principle applicable to the case has been laid down in Beckham v. Drake in the House of Lords. This is one of that class of cases in which the bankrupt's own labour is the sole consideration given by him for the contract of the defendants to employ him and to pay him salary. It is not a contract of a mixed nature where something else is given by the bankrupt in addition. In return for his labour the defendants contracted to employ him and pay him a salary. For any breach of that contract, if complete at the date of the bankruptcy, carrying with it the right to a sum of money, there is no doubt that the trustee in bankruptcy would be the proper person to sue. But so far as the contract is in fieri and still unperformed at the date of the bankruptcy, it is clear from Beckham v. Drake that the right of action for any breach of it occurring after the bankruptcy would not pass to the trustee. The trustee could only intervene and intercept, if he could, such sum as might be recovered by the bankrupt. He could not put in suit the contract which was still in fieri, and allege readiness and willingness to carry it out. That proposition seems to me to be clear from Beckham v. Drake. The contract in that case was also a contract of employment and the action was brought for a breach of that contract by reason of the wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff before his bankruptcy. The House of Lords held that the right of action passed to the assignees of the insolvent. I will take a passage from the opinion delivered by Cresswell, J., when advising the House of Lords, which seems to me to put in a short and concise form what the majority of the judges said. Cresswell, J., said (2 H. L. Cas., at p. 615), "I agree that a contract for the future work and labour of the bankrupt cannot be made by the assignees; they cannot hire him out (as was said by Lord Mansfield), and as a consequence the assignees cannot, after bankruptcy, adopt and enforce a contract made before the bankruptcy for the application of the personal skill or labour of a bankrupt; but I do not think it thence follows that, where a contract to employ a trader has been broken before his bankruptcy, the assignees cannot sue upon that breach, it having been established that rights of action in general are vested in the assignees." There is also a passage in the opinion of Parke, B., in the same case to the like effect (at p. 625): "This contract, if unexecuted, would clearly not have passed to the assignees. But the question is not whether the contract, but whether the right of action for the breach of it before the bankruptcy, passed." It seems to me, therefore, that the contention put forward on behalf of the defendants that the contract, with all its incidents, passed to the trustee, in the same way all the rights under a contract for the sale of goods would pass, is not tenable. Subject to the limitation above mentioned, the contract did not pass to the trustee. The breach of the contract occurred after the bankruptcy, and gave rise to a cause of action for which the bankrupt could sue. There is, however, this well-established rule, that in regard to rights accruing to a bankrupt after the bankruptcy, though the bankrupt has a right to sue in his own name, the trustee may intervene and take the proceeds, except, in the case of personal earnings, so much as may be necessary for the maintenance of the bankrupt and his family. In actions of this class, if any moneys come to the bankrupt larger than are necessary for such maintenance, the trustee can intervene and intercept that amount. The question whether the trustee can intervene and intercept the proceeds of the action is quite distinct from the question whether the bankrupt has a right to bring the action in his own name. We are not deciding the question whether the trustee can intervene and claim the proceeds; we are only deciding that the bankrupt can sue in his own name.

It was said on behalf of the defendants that the point was decided in their favour by two cases—namely, Emden v. Carte and Wadling v. Oliphant. In Emden v. Carte the facts were these: The plaintiff, who was an architect, sued for remuneration in respect of employment under a contract made in 1877, and for damages for an alleged wrongful dismissal from such employment in 1880. The plaintiff was adjudicated bankrupt in 1878. So we see that in that case the dismissal took place after the bankruptcy, and the contract, for breach of which the action was brought, had been made before the bankruptcy. Fry, J., held that he could not under the authority of the rules of 1875 substitute the trustee for the original plaintiff, but that he could add him as a co-plaintiff, which he accordingly did, and gave him the conduct of the action. I agree with Phillimore, J., that that decision does not involve this, that the action could not be maintained without the trustee being made a plaintiff, but that it does decide this, that the trustee could intervene. It was pointed out in that case by Fry, J., that it was not an action merely for personal services, but that there were other things to be done, which put it outside the narrow class of cases of personal service. The real point is that that decision does not involve the proposition that the bankrupt himself could not maintain the action, but all that the Court of Appeal and Fry, J., held was that the trustee was entitled to intervene and intercept the fruits of the action. The other case—Wadling v. Oliphant—is still more easy to distinguish from the present case. The head-note there states that a bankrupt, who had never obtained his order of discharge or passed his final examination, procured employment as editor of a weekly newspaper without the permission or knowledge of his trustee, and six years after the bankruptcy he was awarded by the decree of a competent court £104 as six months' salary in lieu of proper notice of dismissal. It was held that the bankrupt's trustee could claim this money before it was paid to him, as against any creditors subsequent to and without notice of the bankruptcy. In that case there was a clearly ascertained sum of £104 which accrued to the bankrupt after the bankruptcy, and it was held that in respect of that sum the trustee could intervene and appropriate it. But that case does not decide that the bankrupt was not a proper party to the action. Therefore, in neither of those cases was it suggested that the bankrupt himself could not maintain the action; it was merely decided that the trustee could intervene. It seems to me that the principle laid down in Beckham v. Drake governs this case, and the bankrupt is the proper person to sue. In my opinion the judgment of Phillimore, J., is right, and should be affirmed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is very important to observe the sequence of events. First, there was the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants whereby the defendants agreed to employ the plaintiff for a term of years as a traveller. Next came the bankruptcy of the plaintiff; and after that the breach of contract by reason of the wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff. Upon that the present action was brought by the bankrupt alone to recover damages for wrongful dismissal. Upon that state of facts the question for our determination is whether the bankruptcy of the plaintiff is an answer to the plaintiff's claim, it not being alleged that his trustee in bankruptcy has intervened. It is contended on behalf of the defendants that on the bankruptcy of the plaintiff the contract vested in the trustee. The question what contracts vest in a trustee in bankruptcy was considered by the Court of Exchequer in Gibson v. Carruthers, 8 M. & W. 321, and Parke, B., in delivering judgment, said this at p. 333: "There can be no doubt that the effect of the assignment under 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, ss. 12 and 63, is to vest in the assignees, to use the language of Lord Tenterden in Wright v. Fairfield, 2 B. & Ad. 727, at p. 732, every beneficial matter belonging to the bankrupt's estate, and, amongst the rest, the right of enforcing unexecuted contracts, by which benefit may accrue to that estate, and such as may be performed on the part of the bankrupt by the assignees; such, in short, as would pass as part of his personal estate to his executors if he had died, which would not include that description of contract where the personal skill or contract of the bankrupt would form a material part of the consideration." It was therefore laid down that contracts in which personal skill is a material part of the consideration were excepted from assignment under the Bankruptcy Act then in force. If that is good law, there seems to me to be nothing in any of the subsequent Bankruptcy Acts, or in that now in force, to alter it. The real question, accordingly, is whether the law was correctly laid down by Parke, B., in the passage I have read. Not long after that decision came the case of Beckham v. Drake, which went to the House of Lords. In that case the sequence of events was different from that in the present case. There was first the contract of service; secondly, the breach; and thirdly, the bankruptcy of the plaintiff. The House of Lords held that the right of action vested in the assignees in bankruptcy of the plaintiff. The House was advised by a large number of judges, many of whom expressed a clear opinion in the sense indicated in the judgment of Parke, B., in Gibson v. Carruthers. I particularly wish to refer, in addition to the passages read by the Master of the Rolls, to passages in the opinions delivered by Williams, J., 2 H. L. Cas., p. 598; Erle, J., on p. 604; and Wilde, C.J., on p. 633. None of the learned judges expressed any opinion to the contrary, and in my judgment the view expressed by Parke, B., is correct in principle. The contract in the present case was, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, in fieri, and it could not be completed without the concurrence of the bankrupt, and the trustee had no power to compel him to concur. It seems clear to me that a contract of this kind does not vest in the trustee in bankruptcy. The two cases which have been so much referred to seem to me merely to decide that the trustee in bankruptcy may intervene and claim the damages which the bankrupt may recover. The trustee may still intervene in the present action, but up to the present he has not done so. The appeal therefore fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: It has been established for many years that, notwithstanding the generality of the language used in the Bankruptcy Acts, there are some contracts and some rights of action which do not vest in the trustee. For the present purpose it is sufficient to mention contracts for purely personal service. Such unexecuted contracts are not assignable by deed, and they are not, by virtue of the statute, vested in the trustee. If, however, at the date of the bankruptcy a sum of money is due in respect of services rendered under the contract, the trustee will take the money and not the bankrupt. But as to future services, the bankrupt can sue for his remuneration under the contract, subject only to the right of the trustee to intervene and claim the fruits of the litigation. Now, it is clear that the plaintiff's contract of service did not pass to the trustee. The plaintiff continued to act as traveller after the bankruptcy. The judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Beckham v. Drake, 11 M. & W. 315, and the opinions of the judges who advised the House of Lords in that case, 2 H. L. Cas. 579, place this beyond doubt. And there was not, at the date of the bankruptcy, any accrued right of action under the contract which might have vested in the trustee, as in Beckham v. Drake. So far as I am aware, there is no authority inconsistent with this view. I think that Phillimore, J.'s, decision was correct, and that the appeal fails.

In re S., A SOLICITOR. (a.)

Practice—Motion to attach—Delivery of bill—Service of order—Form of notice of motion—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 44, r. 2.

An order had been made on a solicitor for delivery of bill on a client's petition within a certain period. The period therein fixed was extended by a later order, but that order was not drawn up nor served upon the solicitor. On a motion to attach the solicitor,

Held, that the order extending the time should have been drawn up and served on the solicitor, and this not having been done, that the motion failed.

Motion.

This was a motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment against a solicitor, Mr. S., for his contempt in not having delivered to the applicant, Mr. W. R. Renshaw, a bill of fees and disbursements in all suits, actions, and other matters of business in which he had been employed, pursuant to orders dated the 3rd of July, 1902, and the 5th of August, 1902.

The facts of the case were as follows:

The respondent had been employed by the applicant as his solicitor for several years, and had had a large number of business transactions with him.

By an order dated the 3rd of July, 1902, made on the petition of the applicant, it was ordered that the said respondent do within a fortnight after the service of the said order deliver his bill. This order was served on the 8th of July.

On the 31st of July, 1902, a summons was taken out by the respondent's firm, the respondent's solicitors, for a two months' extension of time, and by an order dated the 5th of August, 1902, the time for delivery was extended to the 28th of August,

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1902. This order was never drawn up or served upon the solicitor or his firm.

As the accounts extended over several years, the respondent's firm found a difficulty in preparing them, and applied on the 28th of August for a fresh extension of time. This was refused, and on the respondent's firm's solicitors applying on the 22nd of September to take out a summons for extension of time, they were told that this was not vacation business.

The present motion was served on the respondent's firm on the 21st of October.

Rowden, K.C, and Dickinson, for the applicant.

Norton, K.C, and Martelli, for the respondent.

Levett, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the respondent's firm.—The notice of motion is bad in point of form. The applicants did not draw up or sign the order of the 5th of August, and consequently they cannot bring themselves within ord. 41, s. 5.

Rowden, K.C., in reply.—A distinction must be drawn between the form of order and the service of the writ.

BYRNE, J.—Two orders were made against the solicitor and one against his firm. By the order of the 8th of July the time for the delivery of the bill was limited to the space of a fortnight from the service of the said order. That order was duly served.

On the 31st of July, 1902, the respondent's firm, by whom he acted in the matter, took out a summons for a two months' extension of time to deliver the bills. On the 5th of August the master extended the time for delivery to the 26th of August.

Was that an order? In my judgment it was an order, and it should have been personally served. As a matter of fact it was never drawn up. The time fixed by the order expired on the 26th of August.

On the 21st of October, then, a motion for attachment is served. I shall not discuss points involved in the motion. There is the technical point that the order in respect of which it is proposed to attach the respondent, and which gave him additional time, has not been served on him, has not been personally served on him. If the extended time given by this order had expired before this order was drawn up, a four-day order should have been obtained and served before moving for an attachment. According to the practice both orders should have been served before moving. The application therefore fails, and costs must follow the event.

In re MANN.

HARDY v. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Charity—Will—Institute erected for the benefit of inhabitants—Legacy for the benefit of the institute—General charitable intention.

A testatrix erected an institute, and during her life it was used for the benefit of the inhabitants of a place. By her will she gave £3,000 to trustees to be applied in such manner as they should consider most expedient for the benefit of the institute.

Held, that there was a general charitable intention, and that the legacy was valid.

Summons.

The will of the testatrix, Miss Edith P. Mann, contained the following bequest: "I bequeath to my trustees the sum of £3,000 to be applied by them in such manner as they shall consider most expedient for the benefit of the Mann Institute, Moreton-in-the-Marsh."

The testatrix died on the 30th of May, 1902.

The summons was taken out to determine the question whether the bequest of £3,000 took effect, and if so whether it constituted a good charitable bequest.

Beattie, for the executors.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.

Tyssen, for the residuary legatees.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: In this case I think Mr. Tyssen's ingenious argument has really been disposed of by Mr. Parker's reply. I think Mr. Parker is well founded in saying that the testatrix, on the evidence, intended to found an institute to be used in various ways for the benefit of the inhabitants of Moreton-in-the-Marsh. Then the evidence goes on to specify the various modes in which it is attempted to obtain that benefit. And I have to decide this question on the assumption (because the point is not raised on the summons) that she did not convey the land on which the institute stood in a mode sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds or the Mortmain Acts. Assuming, therefore, there was this institute as stated in the affidavits used during her life, but that it could no longer take effect so as to bind her residuary legatees after her death, I find that she has by her will given £3,000 to trustees, to be applied by them in such manner as they may consider most expedient for the benefit of the Mann Institute, in Moreton-in-the-Marsh. Mr. Tyssen's point was that that was for the buildings only, but I do not adopt that construction, that is too narrow a view. I think it is for the purposes for which the Mann Institute is founded—that is to say, for the benefit of the inhabitants. It seems to me that it is a charitable purpose, and the two particular modes in which it was used during her lifetime—namely, partly for a working men's club and partly for a hall and gallery for concerts, lectures, and other meetings, would both be public purposes for the benefit of the inhabitants not inconsistent with the general charitable intention which I have already inferred. Therefore I answer the question by saying that the £3,000 is so given. There must be a scheme.

Semble, section 20, which charges the costs of every action brought against the administrator with reference to the convict's property on such property, has no application to an action brought against the administrator by the convict to recover his property.

Action with witnesses.

This was an action brought by an ex-convict against Sir Robert Anderson, the late, and Mr. Henry, the present, assistant commissioner of the Criminal Investigation Department, asking for an account of his property which had come into their hands, for delivery up of what might be found due to him, and for damages for wrongful conversion of his property.

On the 25th of July, 1895, the plaintiff had been convicted of felony and had been sentenced to six years' penal servitude and to pay the costs of the prosecution.

Sir Robert Anderson was appointed his administrator under the provisions of the Felony Act, 1870, and, as such, took possession of his property. This property consisted, among other things, of certain jewellery and other personal property, some shares in the Louisville and Nashville Railway, and certain bonds.

During the course of the administration all the property was sold with the exception of four foreign bonds, now alleged to be worthless, and was now represented by the sum of £2,327 12s. 10d. Metropolitan Stock and £564 1s. cash. The amount realized by the sales was £3,753 8s. 4d., and the disbursements (including an item of £737 16s. 6d. for the taxed costs of the prosecution) amounted to about £750. The facts as to the sale of the jewellery are set out in the judgment.

With regard to the sale of the Louisville and Nashville shares it appeared that in November, 1895, a demand for the payment of the taxed costs was sent to Scotland-yard.

The matter was brought to the knowledge of Sir Robert Anderson, and he gave directions that the Louisville and Nashville shares should be sold to defray these costs. Sir Robert stated, as his lordship found to be the fact, that he personally exercised a discretion in the matter and thought it desirable that the shares should be sold.

The actual conduct of the sale was left in the hands of a subordinate official, who is now dead, and who was, though not to Sir Robert Anderson's knowledge, a dishonest person. Instead of going to a stockbroker, the subordinate official negotiated their sale through a money-changer.

From the documentary evidence it appeared that the money-changer had been instructed to sell the shares on the Stock Exchange at the best price of the day, and had purported so to sell them at 52, and had charged broker's commission as well as a commission for himself. Whether there was in fact such a sale is doubtful, and evidence was given that the lowest Stock Exchange quotation of Louisville and Nashville shares on the day in question was 52½. The shares have since greatly increased in value.

The version which the money-changer now gave of the transaction, and which his lordship refused to believe, was that the arrangement between himself and the subordinate official was that he should sell for not less than 52, and that, if he sold for more he should keep the profit.

Some time before the expiration of the plaintiff's sentence, correspondence took place between his solicitors and the administrator relating to his property, and on the 22nd of March, 1900, Sir Robert Anderson, in answer to an inquiry, wrote that he had no bonds belonging to the plaintiff in his possession. This was a mistake, as he had then in his possession four such bonds.

Sir Robert Anderson ceased to be assistant commissioner in May, 1901, but was not relieved of his administratorship, and subsequent letters were written by Mr. Henry, his successor, on his behalf.

On the 29th of July, 1901, after the sentence had expired, he refused to give an account.

On the 31st of July the writ in the present action was issued. Subsequently the defendants took out a summons asking that the plaintiff be ordered to give particulars of the property he claimed, and that in default the action should be stayed. His lordship made an order to this effect, but the order was reversed by the Court of Appeal. The defendants then put in defences in which they did not offer to account or to pay anything. Afterwards, in obedience to an order, the defendants furnished accounts.

Astbury, K.C., and M.R. Emanuel, for the plaintiff.—The Act under which the defendant was appointed administrator must be read according to the rules regulating ordinary trust instruments. Consequently the power of sale is to to be used only for the purpose of making the payments mentioned in the Act. Even if that construction of the Act is wrong, the plaintiff has shown that the exercise of the powers by the administrator is primâ facie malâ fide. There was no valid reason for the sale of the jewellery, and with respect to it the defendants in fact exercised no discretion. The sale of the shares was carried out in so irregular a manner that the administrator cannot say, as against the plaintiff, that it was a valid sale, for since there was no sale on the Stock Exchange there is no price at which the plaintiff can be fixed. From the evidence it is clear that the plaintiff could not have recovered his property without bringing this action.

Birrell, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the defendants.—The power of sale given to the administrator is absolute. So far as he was concerned the sale of the plaintiff's property was bonâ fide, and, therefore, cannot be called in question by the plaintiff. We admit, however, that the plaintiff cannot be charged with double commission. By section 20 the administrator is entitled to have his costs out of the property. In view of the special circumstances of the plaintiff's case, it cannot be said that the defendant acted so unreasonably as to be deprived of his costs. The sole object of the later stages of this action has been to make the administrator liable for wrongful conversion of his property, and the costs of those later stages should at any rate be paid by the plaintiff.

Astbury, K.C., replied.

BUCKLEY, J.—In this case a large number of the matters which were in dispute between the parties are no longer in dispute between them. There are two matters on which the judgment of the court is required. The first one, which involves the construction of the Act of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, is whether the plaintiff is entitled to question the sale which was made by the defendant of his property; he asks for damages for the wrongful conversion of his property. The second is as to how the costs of this action ought to be borne.

The question arises in this way. The plaintiff, John Carr, was on the 22nd of July, 1895, convicted of felony and sentenced to six years' penal servitude. Under the Act to which I have referred the defendant, Sir Robert Anderson, was appointed administrator of his property. In the course of that administration he sold, in particular, certain Louisville and Nashville shares, and certain jewellery belonging to the plaintiff. The plaintiff says that he was wrong in so doing, that he had no right to sell them, and that the defendant is responsible to him in damages for so doing.

With regard to that I go at once to the Act of Parliament, to see what the powers of the administrator were. That Act, which was passed in the year 1870, abolished the forfeiture of land and goods for treason and felony, and provided for the appointment by the Crown of an administrator of convicts' property and gives him certain powers. Amongst those, by section 12, "The administrator shall have absolute power to let, mortgage, sell, convey, and transfer any part of such property as to him shall seem fit." Wider language it is difficult to conceive. There is an absolute power to sell as to him shall seem fit; the power, of course, is to be exercised reasonably and properly, but so far as that language is concerned it is an absolute power irrespective of whether money is wanted for payment of debts or not. Then follow four sections, 13, 14, 15, and 16, dealing with payments which the administrator may make out of the convict's property; and then section 17 runs thus: "The several powers hereinbefore given to the said administrator, or any of them, may be exercised by him in such order and course as to priority of payments or otherwise as he shall think fit; and all contracts of letting or sale, mortgages, conveyances, or transfers of property bonâ fide made by the said authority of the said administrator under the powers of this Act and all payments or deliveries over of property bonâ fide made by or under the authority of the said administrator for any of the purposes hereinbefore mentioned shall be binding, and the propriety thereof, and the sufficiency of the grounds on which the said administrator may have exercised his judgment or discretion in respect thereof, shall not be in any manner called in question by such convict or by any person claiming an interest in such property by virtue of this Act." It has been contended by the plaintiff's counsel that, in reading that section I ought to read the words "for any of the purposes hereinbefore mentioned" as if they qualified the words "all contracts of sale made by the administrator under the powers of this Act." In my opinion that is not the true construction of that section. I think you must read it thus, reading it shortly, "All contracts of sale bonâ fide made by the administrator under the powers of this Act shall be binding and all payments or deliveries over of property bonâ fide made for any of the purposes hereinbefore mentioned shall be binding," and that the words "for any of the purposes" apply only to the latter case and not to the former. That being, in my view, the true construction of the Act of Parliament, I go on to state what are the facts as to the sale which the administrator made. If I am right in my construction of the Act of Parliament, all I have got to look at is to see whether the administrator has made a sale bonâ fide. I agree that that involves that he shall not have made it blindly or carelessly, or without exercising any judgment or discretion upon it, but if he has bonâ fide sold, then that is to be binding, and the propriety of it, and the sufficiency of the grounds upon which he made it, are not to be in any way called in question by the court.

First, the convict had certain jewellery and other property. The administrator sold that in two lots, the one on the 13th of February, 1896, when there was a sale of goods, chattels, and jewellery for £49 5s. 6d., less a commission of £4 18s. 6d., leaving a balance of £44 7s. The other on the 6th of August, 1896, when there was a sale of goods and chattels and bags and clothing, for £21 12s., less a commission of £2 3s. 2d., leaving a balance of £19 8s. 10d. What Sir Robert Anderson, who has given evidence in the matter, tells me about that is this: He, as a superior official at Scotland-yard, does not attend to all the details of the administrations necessarily himself. A certain official was his subordinate, and in everything connected with the administration in which any act had to be done he had to come to Sir Robert Anderson personally to get authority to do it, but the matters of detail were attended to by the subordinate. As regards this sale of jewellery, it was made under a course of practice which is universally followed at Scotland-yard, that property of this description of comparatively small value belonging to a convict, is sold without special directions given in respect of it. Sir Robert Anderson does not recall, his memory does not serve him, that he personally gave any instructions as regards the sale of this jewellery. He says it was sold under an established course of practice. I think that is sufficient for the purposes of the Act of Parliament. It seems to me that a sale thus made is a sale bonâ fide made, a sale made because a reasonable course of practice is laid down in the office, which is followed by the administrator in dealing with that class of property. The only other ground on which the sale is attacked is this, that it is said, and said truly, that at that time no money was wanted for the purpose of paying any obligation of the convict. If I am right in my construction of the Act of Parliament, that has nothing to do with it. The administrator is not limited to selling for the purpose of paying debts. He has an absolute power to sell as he sees fit, if he sells bonâ fide, and he has sold bonâ fide.

The other matter is this. The convict was entitled to 260 hundred dollar shares in the Louisville and Nashville Railway Co. These were sold in two lots on the 20th of November and the 30th of November, 1895, and the story as to that requires some consideration in detail. [His lordship then stated the facts and reviewed the evidence as to these sales, and continued:] So far as Sir Robert Anderson was concerned, the sale was a sale on the stock. No broker's note has been produced; whether there was such a sale or not I do not know. That was the sale of these shares. There was a subsequent sale of the other ten certificates on the 30th, and another note of the money-changer relating to them. That sale, as it appears to me, was a sale bonâ fide made by the administrator, and it is a sale which, upon these materials, the convict cannot call in question. Supposing, as might be the case, that it would have been competent to him to have brought some action in which he would have set up that the administrator, as his trustee, had so sold these shares as that he was not entitled to rely on that sale, but was subject to attack in respect of it, not because the sale was not made bonâ fide, but because it was made in some improper manner, then it appears to me he ought to have come here proving these facts. No such allegation is made in this action, and I have only been listening to all this evidence as to what took place between the subordinate official and the money-changer for this reason, that in dealing with the affairs of a public department such as this it appears to me to be very necessary that the court should know all the facts in order to form as reliable a judgment as possible as to whether the acts of the department have been really bonâ fide. As regards Sir Robert Anderson's action in this matter, I am quite satisfied that it was perfectly bonâ fide; but I cannot part with this case without saying that I am startled to find that the affairs of a department such as that at Scotland-yard have been so managed as I find these were managed. No subordinate ought to be allowed to go to a money-changer to consider whether bonds should be sold or not. That is not a proper way to approach the matter; and there is another matter which is perhaps even more serious in that it appears on the documents themselves, that there was a double commission paid—that the assistant commissioner has charged a commission to a broker, whether there was a sale through a broker or not, and a commission to the money-changer. Mr. Birrell has very fairly said, on behalf of Sir Robert Anderson, that he cannot support that, and the double commission cannot be charged. I think the attention of the authorities of Scotland-yard ought to be called to this case and I hope that the proceedings there will be more strictly regulated in future. It follows from what I have said that the plaintiff is, in my opinion, not entitled to any inquiry as to damages sustained by any improper sale with regard to his property. I think there has been no improper sale.

I pass on to consider the other question, and that is, how the costs of this action ought to be borne. I entirely bear in mind that an administrator appointed under the Act, particularly in the case of a criminal such as this, has an exceedingly difficult duty to discharge. He has to see that the property which comes to his hands, as having been in the hands of a convict, reaches, if possible, its proper destination, and there may be some sort of primâ facie presumption that the fact that it comes from the convict's possession is no evidence that it belongs to him. In this case the administrator used his power under the Act of Parliament to deal with a great deal of this property upon the footing that it belonged to other people, and it was handed back to other people. There remained certain property in his hands, and for that, under the Act of Parliament, subject, of course, to the powers and provisions of the Act, he was responsible to the convict at the expiration of his sentence—that is to say, the 22nd of July, 1901. [His lordship then related the negotiations between the parties prior to the commencement of the action, and continued:] The first question to consider with reference to the costs is whether the plaintiff was justified in issuing the writ. It seems to me that he was, he had got no information as to what his property was, and I do not anticipate that he would have got it unless he had issued his writ asking for relief in respect of that matter. The action went on and, ultimately, by an answer, sworn, I understand, on the 10th and filed on the 11th of June of the present year, a full account was rendered. Then, for the first time, the convict got his information. Under these circumstances, is he or is he not entitled to say that this action was rendered necessary by the conduct of the trustee? It appears to me that it was. Attention has been called to section 20 of the Act of Parliament, which provides that "the costs as between solicitor and client of every action or suit which may be brought against the said administrator," and so on "shall be a first charge upon" the property, and it has been argued that that section deals not only with actions brought against the administrator by third parties, but also with actions brought against the administrator by the convict himself. I think the better opinion is that it does not apply, and for this reason, that no such section is wanted in that case. Of course, in an action brought by the cestui que trust against his trustee relating to the trust, the trustee is primâ facie entitled to his solicitor and client costs, but whether the section applies or not, it concludes with these words "unless the court before which such action is tried or such suit is heard shall think fit otherwise to order," so that, even if the section applies, I have to consider whether I ought otherwise to order in this case. For the reasons which I have given it seems to me that the plaintiff was entitled to issue his writ, and that in seeking to enforce an account he is entitled to say that he was put to that expense by the action of the trustee. But, on the other hand, it seems to me that there are some other considerations that I ought to bear in mind. In the first place, the trustee would be entitled certainly to all his costs of rendering the accounts. He, of course, in accounting fully for all the trust property, is entitled to his costs of taking his accounts himself. He, of course, therefore, would be entitled to receive some costs. Further, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the great question which has been litigated before me here is the question whether the convict is entitled, as against the administrator, to damages in respect of the wrongful conversion of his property, on which I hold that the plaintiff is wrong. It seems to me, therefore, that although the plaintiff has a claim in respect of the costs of the action, on the ground that it was necessitated by the conduct of the trustee, that the trustee, on the other hand, in respect of certain matters is entitled to claim the costs as against the plaintiff, and I think that I shall do justice as between the parties by saying that there shall be no costs of the action.

REX v. OWEN AND ROBERTSON. (a.)

Employer and workman—Compensation—Injury by accident in England—Employer resident and domiciled in Scotland—Application for arbitration—Jurisdiction of county court within whose district accident happened—"District"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule II., clause 9 —Workmen's Compensation Rules, r. 15.

Where a workman, resident in England, is engaged by an employer, whose residence and domicil are in Scotland, is injured in the course of his employment by an accident occurring in England, proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, may be taken in England, and the judge of the county court within whose district the accident occurs has jurisdiction under clause 9 of the 2*nd Schedule of the Act to hear an arbitration for the settlement under the Act of the compensation due to the workman, and services of the necessary notices may be effected by registered post.*

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained calling on his Honour Judge Owen, the judge of the County Court of Monmouthshire, and William Robertson, of Glasgow, to show cause why the said judge should not proceed to hear and determine the matter of an arbitration under the provisions of the Workmen's

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Compensation Act, 1897, in the said County Court of Newport, between Isaac Jenkins, the applicant, and the said William Robertson, the respondent, for the assessment of the amount of compensation to be paid by the respondent to the applicant for personal injuries caused to him on the 15th of November, 1901, by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a workman employed by the respondent as a dock labourer.

From the affidavits on which the rule was obtained it appeared that the applicant, Jenkins, a dock labourer, residing at Newport, in the county of Monmouth, was on the 15th of November, 1901, employed by the respondent's agent on board the steamship Nugget, which was then lying at the Ebbw Vale Wharf, River Side, Newport, for the purpose of assisting in stowing away iron rails which were being placed on board.

Whilst so employed one of the rails fell upon the applicant's feet, and the applicant sustained personal injuries which rendered him unable to follow his usual occupation.

The respondent, who was the owner of The Nugget, was at the time domiciled in Scotland, and neither resided nor carried on business in England or Wales.

Proceedings for an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, were instituted on behalf of the applicant in the County Court of Newport, holden at Monmouth, being the court of the district in which the accident occurred and the matter arose, as the applicant and the respondent resided in different districts.

The respondent filed an answer objecting, amongst other things, that the court had no jurisdiction in the matter as he, the respondent, was domiciled in Scotland.

The matter came before the learned county court judge on the 13th of March, 1902, and in a reserved judgment given on the 17th of April, 1902, the learned judge decided that he had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the arbitration; and he further decided that if he had jurisdiction the compensation to which the applicant would be entitled would be a sum amounting to £1 11s. 3d., being at the rate of 3s. 1½d. per week for ten weeks from the 20th of November, 1901, to the 14th of February, 1902.

In giving his reasons for holding that he had no jurisdiction the learned judge said he was of opinion that a person residing in Scotland was not liable to process from a civil court in England or Wales unless he was made liable by some statute or rule of court made by statutory authority; that clause 9 of Schedule II. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, was the only part, either of the Act or the rules made under it, which dealt with the question of jurisdiction; that the word "district" in that clause meant the district of a county court as mentioned in the County Courts Act, 1888, and as specified in the County Courts (District) Order in Council, 1899; that clause 9 went on to direct that if the parties "reside in different districts" the act to be done should be done "in the district in which the accident out of which the said matter arose occurred"; that he was of opinion that if the parties to an arbitration did not reside in the same district, and if the arbitration was to take place in the district where the accident happened, it was a condition precedent to such an arbitration taking place that the parties to it should reside in different districts of county courts, or, in other words, that they should reside in some part of England or Wales; that he could not find anything in the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, which dealt with the question of jurisdiction; that rule 64 of those rules provided that in any matter not provided for under those rules the practice in county courts under the County Courts Act, 1888, and the County Court Rules should apply as far as practicable; that the County Courts Act, 1888, applied only to England and Wales, and there was not any provision, either in the Act or in the rules made under it, which enabled proceedings to be taken in a county court against a person residing in Scotland; and, after referring to section 164 of the County Courts Act, he said that he could not find that he had any power to hear an arbitration under the Act where the respondent, as in this case, resided in Scotland; and, further, that if he were to make an award in the applicant's favour such award could not, in his opinion, be enforced, as the Inferior Courts Judgments Extension Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 31), s. 10, which enabled a judgment of a county court to be enforced against a party to the action residing in Scotland or Ireland, did not apply except to a case in which the summons in the action had been personally served upon the defendant within the district of the county court by which the judgment was given; that an award of a judge made under the Workmen's Compensation Act could only be enforced in the same manner as a judgment or order of the court (see rule 26 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898), and that if a judgment could not be enforced it was a strong argument, in a case where the jurisdiction to give the judgment was doubtful, that the jurisdiction did not exist; and for these reasons he held that he had no jurisdiction, and refused to hear and determine the arbitration.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), provides in Schedule II., under the heading "Arbitration":

Clause 9. Where any matter under this Act is to be done in a county court, or by, to, or before the judge or registrar of a county court, then, unless the contrary intention appear, the same shall, subject to rules of court, be done in, or by, to, or before the judge or registrar of, the county court of the district in which all the parties concerned reside, or if they reside in different districts the district in which the accident out of which the said matter arose occurred, without prejudice to any transfer in manner provided by rules of court.

Clause 14. In the application of this schedule to Scotland — (a) "Sheriff" shall be substituted for "county court judge," "sheriff court" for "county court," "action" for "plaint," "sheriff clerk" for "registrar of the county court," and "act of sederunt" for "rules of court."

Clause 15. Paragraphs 4 and 7 of this schedule shall not apply to Scotland.

Clause 16. In the application of this schedule to Ireland the expression "county court judge" shall include the recorder of any city or town.

Section 2 of the Act: (1) Proceedings for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof. . . . (2) Notice in respect of an injury under this Act shall give the name and address of the person injured . . . and shall be served on the employer, or, if there is more than one employer, upon one of such employers. (3) The notice may be served by delivering the same to or at the residence or place of business of the person on whom it is to be served. (4) The notice may also be served by post by a registered letter addressed to the person on whom it is to be served at his last known place of residence or place of business, and if served by post shall be deemed to have been served at the time when the letter containing the same would have been delivered in the ordinary course of post, and in proving the service of such notice it shall be sufficient to prove that the notice was properly addressed and registered.

The Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, provide as follows: Rule 15. (2) Service may be effected either in accordance with the rules as to service of default summonses, or by registered post in accordance with the provisions of sub-sections 4 and 5 of section 2 of the Act with reference to service of notice in respect of an injury, and the provisions of those sub-sections shall apply to such service.

Rule 64. Where any matter or thing is not specially provided for under these rules, the same procedure shall be followed and the same provisions shall apply, as far as practicable, as in a similar matter or thing under the County Courts Act, 1888, and the rules made in pursuance of that Act.

Lush, K.C. (Bailhache with him), showed cause.—As a preliminary objection this is not a case for a mandamus, the only remedy is by appeal to the Court of Appeal. The learned county court judge did not decline to entertain the case, but, after fully hearing the arguments, decided that the proceedings could not be brought in the county court as the employer was domiciled in Scotland.

Bonsey, for the county court judge.

Bankes, K.C. (A. Parsons with him), in support of the rule.—The county court judge in reality declined jurisdiction, and the proper remedy is therefore by an application to this court for a mandamus to hear and determine the matter under section 131 of the County Courts Act, 1888: Reg. v. Southampton County Court, 65 L. T. Rep. 320, 40 W. R. Dig. 65; Welland v. Great Western Railway Co., 16 Times L. R. 297.

THE COURT here decided to hear the case on its merits.

Lush, K.C., for the respondent.—The learned judge had no jurisdiction to entertain these proceedings. The Act of 1897 does not apply where only one of the parties is resident in England. There are no provisions under which proceedings can be instituted against a person residing out of England or under which notice of accident can be served upon such person. Clause 9 of the second schedule is not applicable to an employer resident in Scotland. The word "district" in that clause means "county court district." Section 2, sub-section 3, implies that service of notice must be within the jurisdiction.

He referred to The City of Agra, [1898] P. 198, 47 W. R. Dig. 4.

Bonsey, for the county court judge.—The county court judge has no jurisdiction where the employer is resident out of England. Service of the notice on an employer in Scotland would not give the learned judge jurisdiction: Spence v. Parkes, [1900] 2 Ir. R. 619. The award could not be enforced in Scotland.

Robson, K.C., for the applicant.—This Act applies to the whole of the United Kingdom and makes all employers liable to pay compensation in cases to which the Act applies, whether the parties reside in the same part of the United Kingdom or in different parts of it. The Act confers the jurisdiction; service of notice does not found the jurisdiction, but is merely a matter of procedure: see dicta of Cotton, L.J., in In re Busfield, 34 W. R. 372, 32 Ch. D. 123, and Bowen, L.J., in In re King & Co.'s Trade-Mark, 40 W. R. 580, [1892] 2 Ch. 462. The county court judge has jurisdiction under clause 9 of the second schedule. The word "district" in that clause means the area over which a county court or sheriff court has jurisdiction; it should not be read in its technical sense as meaning county court district. If the parties do not reside within the jurisdiction of the same court, the court which has jurisdiction in the matter is the court within whose jurisdiction the accident took place. Notice of the accident may be served by post by registered letter under section 2, sub-section 4.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is, in my opinion, one of the class of cases arising under this and other Acts where we do not and cannot expect to find every particular case dealt with in express words. What we have to decide is, looking at the whole scope of the Act and at certain expressions in it that have to be construed, what is the intention of the Legislature expressed in words which seem to me to be capable of two meanings. The facts may be shortly stated thus: An accident happened on board a ship at Newport, in Monmouthshire; the owner of the ship, being the employer, who would be respondent or defendant to a claim if he were resident in England, was a Scotchman domiciled in Scotland. It is therefore said that no county court judge can entertain any proceedings in respect of a claim by the workman under the arbitration clauses of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, or any proceedings taken under the Act. Now, when we are dealing with parts of the United Kingdom, as to which parts there are separate systems of law, we do require to see that the Act of Parliament does not apply in cases in which the general scope of the Act would show that it does apply to the whole of the United Kingdom. Whether this case was a casus omissus from the Act, though I do not think it was, I have no doubt whatever that the scope of this Act was intended to apply to all three or four parts of the United Kingdom—England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. That the employers in that geographical area were meant to be made liable to the provisions of this Act I have not the least doubt; and if it should turn out that a Scotch employer, or an Irish employer, liable to pay compensation under the provisions of the Act, and having the rights and benefits of the Act, has been left out, then it would clearly be a casus omissus, and I think there is nothing in the Act of Parliament to show it was intended to be so. The main foundation of the argument for the applicant in support of the rule was that we find in the statute a general direction that employers are to be under certain liabilities as employers and that workmen are to have certain rights as against those employers, and that therefore the Scotch employer ought to be liable where the accident happens in England. The Act is by no means a one-sided one, because the employers are also to have certain privileges; and unless we find that the Scotch employer is excluded if the accident happens in England or Ireland, as the case may be, and unless the words are too limited to enable us to do so, we ought, if we can, to give effect to the intention of the Act. It is not disputed that the Act was intended to apply to Scotland. As a consequence of that it was thought necessary to make certain enactments in the statute in order to make the language and machinery of the statute apply to Scotland and to Ireland. These enactments are to be found in the definition of "dependants" in section 7; and I think it very important to find that it was not thought necessary upon that point to make any other reference, alteration, or special enactment in any other section until we come to that section. In the first schedule, which is the schedule dealing with the "Scale and conditions of compensation," there are two specific clauses, 16 and 17, which are inserted to make that schedule work in connection with jurisdiction in Scotland and Ireland respectively. Then when we come to the 2nd schedule—the arbitration schedule—there are two clauses, 14 and 15, which make the schedule specially apply to Scotland, and clause 16 makes the schedule specially apply to Ireland. That is clear ground which, in my opinion, shows that the Act was intended to apply as a whole to these areas. That being so, we now come to the particular clause which has created the difficulty in this case—namely, clause 9 of the arbitration schedule. Clause 9 says: "Where any matter under this Act is to be done in a county court." Now, in the application of this schedule to Scotland, we are allowed, by clause 14 of the same schedule, for "county court" to read "sheriff court" as well, so that we may read it "sheriff court" or "county court"—"or by, to, or before the judge or registrar of a county court," for that we may read "by, to, or before the 'sheriff' or 'sheriff clerk.'" Therefore we have the opening words in clause 9 including sheriff court and county court, and also including for this purpose registrar and sheriff clerk. Then the clause goes on, "unless the contrary intention appear, the same shall, subject to rules of court, be done in, or by, to, or before the judge or registrar of, the county court of the district in which all the parties concerned reside, or, if they reside in different districts, the district in which the accident out of which the said matter arose occurred, without prejudice to any transfer in manner provided by rules of court." Now, if that clause had read in this way, "the county court of the district in which all the parties concerned reside, or, if they do not all reside in the same district, the district in which the accident occurred," the matter would not have been so difficult. The particular form of expression chosen by the Legislature is, "or if they reside in different districts"; they have put the affirmative form instead of the negative form, "if they do not reside in the same district"; and that creates the difficulty. Looking at this Act of Parliament and its scope, it seems to me that it would be going a great deal too far to say that a different intention was disclosed by the particular way in which the absence of jurisdiction of a particular county court or sheriff's court is referred to, and I think that the real substantial effect of that provision means that, if the parties are not all subject to the jurisdiction of one county court contemplated by the Act, then the jurisdiction is to be where the accident occurred. That takes us the whole way, subject to the point whether there is a limit to be put upon the word "district"—whether, as the Act is referring primâ facie, so to speak, to a county court, the word "district" means county court district. I think that if that had been the intention of the Legislature we must have had in the Act the definition of the word "district" in reference to Scotland and in reference to Ireland. The framers of this Act probably thought that, when they had made the courts of Scotland and the courts of Ireland for this purpose equivalent to county courts, it was not necessary to define this expression "district." Therefore I think that for the purposes of this particular case we find two sets of courts contemplated by the Act—one, the court for the place in which the plaintiff resides; the other, the court for the place in which the defendant resides; one an English court and one a Scotch court. In my opinion, these parties did reside in "different districts" within the meaning of this Act, and it would be too narrow a construction of the Act to say that the whole jurisdiction is defeated because districts are confined in clause 9 of this schedule to English districts and do not include the districts of the Scotch courts already referred to. Therefore I think we are quite right in construing the word "district" for this purpose as meaning the district of a court which has jurisdiction under this Act. We were pressed by counsel who showed cause against the rule with regard to the difficulties which might arise in the very improbable case of a French owner or employer liable in respect of an accident happening somewhere within the jurisdiction of a district of a court, and also the not so improbable case of a British subject resident out of the United Kingdom and being still liable as an employer. But sufficient for this day is the evil we have to contend with in this case; though certainly I can see answers in connection with subjects of foreign nationality which would raise an entirely different set of objections on much broader grounds. Whether the difficulty which has been referred to of effecting service out of the district of the county court is got over in the case of a British subject in England, Scotland, or Ireland I do not wish to consider now, and we have not to decide the point. Without deciding the more difficult case, I myself am clearly of opinion that where the parties are resident in different districts, so that the first branch of clause 9 does not apply, then it was intended under this Act that the court which has the jurisdiction in the place where the accident happened has jurisdiction in the matter, and then the procedure as to the service being effected by registered letter, and so on, applies to the area which is within the ambit of the Act. As the case is down for hearing by the Court of Appeal, we should in such a case give leave to appeal—if appeal be necessary—and, if we are not right in this decision, then we should be set right by the Court of Appeal, who would then be able to deal with our decision on the ground that it is wrong, or with the decision of the learned county court judge on appeal from him under their original jurisdiction which they have by virtue of the Act. For the reasons given I think this rule should be made absolute.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question arises from the use in clause 9 of these words: "Where the parties reside in different districts." The difficulty is in applying those words to a case where one of the parties does reside in an English county court district and the other party does not reside in an English county court district at all, but in this case does reside within the area, whatever it may be called, of the sheriff's court in Scotland. The question therefore is, does the word "district" in that part of the clause mean merely "county court district"? The effect of the decision we are giving is this, that we hold that the word "district," where it is used in clause 9, does not mean—though it does in other places—merely county court district, but that it also includes the area over which a sheriff's court has jurisdiction; and I think the reasoning goes this length, that it includes the area over which a county court, or the court which in Scotland or Ireland is equivalent to a county court in England, has jurisdiction. It does not go the length of deciding what counsel really contended for, that the word "district" is used with regard to one of the parties as a county court district, and with regard to the other party who does not live in a county court district, as the area, whatever it may be, in which he lives and in whatever country. We limit ourselves, as I understand, to saying that the "district" means, with regard to one of the parties, the county court district in which he resides. "District" means, with regard to the other party, the district in which, if he is a Scotchman or an Irishman, he is subject to the jurisdiction in Scotland or Ireland respectively, equivalent to the jurisdiction of the county court in England. If the parties reside in "different districts" within that meaning, then the county court of the district where the accident happened is the place where the litigation is to be. We do not for a moment affect to say that "district," with regard to the other party to the litigation, means the area in which a foreigner might live; for example, that it might mean a department in France, or a province or county in some other foreign country. We say nothing about that, and when that difficulty arises it will then be sufficient to say whether the argument of counsel expressed upon that point was well founded or not. But for my own part I express no opinion about it.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think when the case is fully examined, though it struck me quite the other way before the argument, it seems to come out very clearly. We start with the first section of the Act, which gives the right to compensation and creates the liability. That first section gives the right to the employed and it creates the liability of the employer, and it clearly applies both to subjects domiciled in England and to subjects domiciled in Scotland. According to ordinary principles it would so apply to both, unless Scotland was excluded, and, instead of Scotland being excluded, there are in other parts of the Act expressions to show that it was intended to be included. We have not, therefore, to deal with any of the difficulties which might have arisen if this were the case of a foreigner. The question in that case would be very arguable, and I do not desire to say anything about it one way or the other; but, in the case of the workman or servant in England and the employer domiciled in Scotland, it is perfectly clear that the right is created on the one hand, and the liability is created on the other hand, by the first section of the Act. Passing on to section 2, I think it is important to look at it for one purpose and for one purpose only. That section makes a condition precedent to the recovery of the compensation by enacting that a notice of injury shall be given, and the importance of that section for our present purpose is simply that it includes a service of the notice by post by registered letter. Inasmuch as we have arrived at the conclusion that the Act applies to Scotland as well as to England, it is perfectly clear that that provision about serving the notice by registered letter, which is a new enactment about service of the notice, applies to a person in England or to a person in Scotland to which the registered letter can go as well as to a place in England. Therefore we have that established as the construction of that second section. Then the remainder of the Act practically deals with and refers to two schedules, and to certain matters which it is not necessary to refer to. The first schedule relates to the amount of compensation that the workman is to get. There is nothing material in that for our present purpose except that it again shows that the case of Scotland and the case of Ireland is contemplated, because when we get to certain expressions used in that schedule, the meaning of which might be doubtful when applied to either Scotland or Ireland, there are definitions to say what is to be understood by those expressions when referring to a case in Scotland or Ireland. There is therefore nothing important in that schedule. Then we get to the most important schedule for our present purpose, the second schedule, which provides for the way in which the workman is to get his compensation. That is provided for by an arbitration. I think that the scheme of arbitration has not been acted upon quite in the way in which it was expected by the Legislature that it would be acted on. They seem to have contemplated mainly arbitrators appointed by the parties; but they also provided, very properly and reasonably, for what was to happen if the parties did not agree as to the arbitrator. In that case in substance in England the matter came to the county court judge; in Scotland it came to the sheriff, who is a judge of a similar position to that of the county court judge in England. Then we have next to consider the question as to which court is to deal with any particular case, and then it is that we come to clause 9 of the second schedule. That is intended to deal with the question of the particular court which is to deal with the matter, and for myself I entertain no doubt whatever that in point of fact the Legislature forgot the case of an accident happening in England where the employer was a person domiciled in Scotland or Ireland; otherwise the case would have been provided for, either expressly in this schedule or possibly in rules of court, which there would be power to make for carrying out the schedule, or probably by rules of court of both countries so as to clear away any difficulty as to which country ought to make the proper rules. That, however, has not been done, and the only question is whether we can get enough out of the paragraph to show which court ought to deal with the case. We have in clause 14 of this schedule "county court judge" defined as meaning, when we are dealing with Scotland, "sheriff." We have not got "district" defined as meaning "sheriffdom," which seems to be the technical expression in Scotland for what in England is called "county court district." If we had that definition, one difficulty would be removed. But is it a substantial and real difficulty? The word "district" is not a very technical word; it is a word of general application, and I might say it is common to the languages of both countries. Some of the words or technical expressions of the Scotch law we should perhaps not understand; they are not familiar to English lawyers any more than our technical expressions are familiar to Scotch lawyers. But such a word as "district" is not so technical as to make it absolutely necessary to have a definition of it, and it seems to me that there is no real difficulty in holding that "district" is a word of general application, and means the area over which the judge previously referred to—who is not only the county court judge, but also by definition the sheriff—has jurisdiction. If that can be fairly held, the difficulty in reference to the use of that word is removed. Counsel in support of the rule admitted against himself that he had to use the word "district" in the second place where it is mentioned in this schedule in a different sense to that in which he uses it in the first and third places where it is mentioned. If we only had a definition of the word with the mercantile expression "and/or" to it, we might use that expression or its equivalent, as a short definition, then "county court judge" would mean "and/or" sheriff, according to the usual meaning of that expression. It would then mean one or other as the context required, and if we can put some such similar meaning to "district," and especially if we can use it as a general word, it does not seem to me that the difficulty, which was to some extent admitted by counsel to be in his way, really arises. There is, however, as my lord has pointed out, no real difference between the words "or if they reside in different districts" and the words "or if they do not reside in the same district"; and, seeing what it follows—namely, "the district in which all the parties concerned reside"—"if they reside in different districts" clearly means if they do not reside in that same district. The result, therefore, is, so far as the court which has to entertain the matter is concerned, clear, and when the thing is carefully examined there is not any real difficulty. Then we come to what I thought at first was the real and the great difficulty in the case, which in fact was the difficulty put forward in the first instance by counsel who showed cause against the rule. That was, that the county court has no power to serve out of its jurisdiction, at any rate unless that power is expressly given, and although we have arrived at the conclusion that this particular county court was the right county court in which proceedings ought to have been taken, there would have remained the difficulty as to how the proceedings in that court were to be initiated and brought on. That difficulty is met by what I may call an accident, because in all probability it was not intended to meet such a case by the words I am going to refer to. But I think the difficulty is met. Having regard to the extensive powers as to making rules incorporated in this Act and schedule, the proper way to provide for the difficulty would have been by rules of court. We therefore turn to the rules of court to see whether we can there get the necessary power to serve out of the county court jurisdiction. Rule 15, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, deals with service on respondents, and provides that "Service may be effected either in accordance with the rules as to service of default summonses, or by registered post in accordance with the provisions of sub-sections 4 and 5 of section 2 of the Act with reference to service of notice in respect of an injury, and the provisions of those sub-sections shall apply to such service." I have already pointed out that that service by registered post of the notice of injury clearly may be made in Scotland if the accident happens in England, and vice versâ in England if the accident happens in Scotland. Therefore we have an enactment here which shows that the necessary process for initiating procedure in the county court may be made by registered letter—by registered post—as the notice under section 2 of the Act. That seems to me, as I have said, almost by an accident, to meet sufficiently for these purposes the difficulty as to how the proceedings are to be initiated in the county court. Upon the whole, therefore, having regard to the fact that it is always desirable to carry into effect the obvious intention of the Act of Parliament, which was to apply this liability and this right of compensation to English and Scotch workmen and employers, and that it never could have been intended that there should be any difference when either of the parties did not happen to be domiciled in the same country, and that it was by a mere oversight that such a case was not provided for, it seems to me that when the thing is worked out we are justified in putting this interpretation upon the words used, and in holding that this jurisdiction existed.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Aug. 5.—Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The question in this case is of little consequence as regards the money value of the claim. It is important in its bearing on a rule of practice which has prevailed with underwriters and average staters in this country for a long period.

Ship, cargo, and freight have had to contribute to general average and salvage charges. For the purpose of contribution the values of the ship, cargo, and freight at risk were ascertained. There is no question as to the value of the cargo or the freight. The value of the ship was taken to be £40 000, being the amount at which it was valued in the salvage proceedings. Contribution from the ship in respect of general average and salvage charges works out at £530 8s. 8d. This amount is claimed from the underwriters. The underwriters say: "That may be the proper amount of contribution as between ship, cargo, and freight, but as between us and you the policy on the ship was a valued policy. It was stipulated that 'for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers' the ship, with its machinery and everything connected therewith, was valued at £33,000. As the value in the policy is so much less than the contributory value we are only bound to pay a proportionate amount, or thirty-three-fortieths of the ship's contribution." To this the shipowners answer: "You are opening the policy. The ship was fairly valued at £33,000. That value as between you and us must hold good for all purposes. You have nothing to do with the value put upon the ship at a different time and for a different purpose. It is impossible to determine with any degree of accuracy the value of a thing which is not an article of commerce. The agreed value in the policy is, or was at the time of the agreement, just as truly the "real value" as the value arrived at somehow or other in the salvage proceedings. The ship was fully insured, and you must make good the loss just as you would have to reimburse the cost of repairs made necessary by sea damage."

Many authorities were cited, and all available text-books were referred to. But, speaking for myself, I must say that I think little help is to be obtained from text-books or reported cases. No case was cited which has more than a very remote and indirect bearing upon the question. Mr. Phillips, who upholds the English practice as against the New York practice, for which the appellants contend, puts the case very fairly when he says, section 1410, "There is nothing in the policy that favours one of these modes of construction in preference to the other, each being consistent with the language of the instrument." His conclusion is that the question must depend upon the application of "the general principles of insurance."

But I do not think one gets rid of the difficulty by referring it to the general principles of insurance. It seems to me that there is as much to be said on the one side as on the other. And although I think, if the matter were res integra, I should prefer the English rule, my preference would be based on this consideration, that the law of marine insurance in this country, although anomalous in many respects, is eminently practical. Just as the agreed value of the ship is disregarded when the question is whether a prudent uninsured owner would repair or abandon, so where there has been a value put upon the ship by a competent authority or adopted by a competent authority, or treated as binding in a business transaction, it seems to me that that value, whether it has or has not the better right to the title of "the real value," cannot be left out of consideration. And I think it is a salutary rule and not unreasonable that the underwriters' liability under the policy should be adjusted with regard to it.

However that may be, I do not think that Mr. Hamilton, in his able argument, succeeded in proving that the English rule is contrary to principle. That being so, there is, in my opinion, an end of the case, and discussion on the comparative merits of the English rule and the New York rule becomes academical.

The rule that prevails with English average staters is a rule that has been long established. It is well known, and it must have helped to form the basis of a vast number of contracts which are still running, and some of which may run for twelve months to come. In that state of things it seems to me that if the English rule is to be altered it must be altered by Parliament and not by a decision of this House. It would be open to Parliament, if it should see fit to enact a new rule, to fix a date for its coming into operation, and so avoid any semblance of injustice to those who have contracted on the footing of the old rule.

Stirling, L.J., in his judgment in the Court of Appeal, expresses an opinion that, theoretically, the sum recoverable would be that which would be payable if the agreed value in the policy had been employed in the average adjustment. I venture to think so too. The mode of calculation adopted by the average staters seems rather too favourable to the underwriters. Suppose the value of the ship in the policy, and also for the purpose of contribution, to be £16,000, the value of the cargo and freight to be £12,000, and the total amount required to be £840, the ship would then pay four-sevenths, or £480. Then suppose the ship, for the purpose of contribution, was valued at £18,000, the value of cargo and freight remaining the same, the ship would pay three-fifths, or £504—that is, £24 more than if the value for the purpose of contribution had been the same as the value in the policy. But if you reduce the ship's contribution in the proportion of eighteen to sixteen, the underwriters have only to pay eight-ninths of £504, or £448—that is, £32 less than would have been payable if the contributory value had been the same as the value in the policy. But there again the rule is well understood, and, though I do not think it is quite accurate, I do not think it ought to be disturbed.

Though the rule only speaks of general average, it has always been treated as applying to salvage expenses also. I do not think that any distinction ought now to be made between these two heads of expenditure.

The first part of the rule, which says that the insurers are not to pay more than the ship's contribution, although the contributory value be less than the value in the policy, seems to me to be unobjectionable, as the contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity.

In the result, therefore, I move your lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, and the judgments of Bigham, J., and the Court of Appeal affirmed with costs. I confess I think the case a very clear one, and the ground of my judgment may be stated very shortly.

The policy of insurance provides that the ship, for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy, is and shall be valued at, say, £33,000. In all questions of indemnity, therefore, the parties to the policy, insurers and insured, have agreed that, though the ship may in truth be much more valuable, her value is to be taken at £33,000 only. There is no exception. The agreement is to apply in all cases of indemnity which may arise. So if the question were one of principle merely, and the rule of custom and practice, which has been so much referred to, had never existed, the House must give effect to this stipulation or agreement between the owner of the ship and the underwriter or insurer, who asks that the terms of his special contract shall receive effect.

An owner may insure so as to cover his whole risk, or he may insure only to cover part of his risk, and prefer to be his own insurer in part, or, to put it in other words, to leave his ship in part uninsured. This he does if he insures his ship below her true value. Thus, having a ship worth £40,000, he may insure her for £20,000 only, with a clause such as that above quoted, declaring that he has agreed that between him and the underwriter the ship shall be taken to be of that value only. What is the effect of this? Not only that the owner becomes his own insurer for one-half of the value of the ship, but he gets a present benefit. He pays only one-half of the premium which he must have paid had he insured his ship at her true value, and, on the other hand, the underwriter undertakes only the risk corresponding to the reduced premium on one-half of the real value of the ship.

In questions of salvage and general average, which at once give rise to claims of indemnity under an insurance policy, the value of the ship is necessarily a material element, for the value of the ship will, with the circumstances in which the salvage services have been given, enter deeply into the question of the remuneration to be given. Of course that value in a question with salvors must be the real value at the time when the salvage services are rendered. Accordingly, in this case the ship was taken at her full value, and the owner had to pay a larger sum than if the value had been £33,000 only. It seems to me that when he claims full relief by way of indemnity, the underwriter in his defence is simply asking that effect shall be given to his stipulation in the policy than in all questions of indemnity the ship shall be valued at £33 000 only. It follows that he is liable to pay only the proportion which the value in the policy bears to the actual value on which the statement has been made up.

I therefore agree with Bigham, J., in holding that the rule or custom founded on it, is in accordance with sound principle; but even if that were open to question, the rule has been so long recognized and acted on that I am further of opinion with your lordships that effect should now be given to it, and it should continue to receive effect unless altered by legislation.

Lord BRAMPTON.—The steamship Balmoral, by a marine policy dated the 20th of December, 1898, and underwritten by the respondent, was insured for twelve calendar months against all ordinary perils of the seas. By the policy it was agreed that, for so much as concerned the assurers and the assured, she should be valued at £33,000.

In June, 1899, while on a voyage from Philadelphia to London, when near the Isle of Wight, The Balmoral met with so strong a gale, and so heavy and irregular a sea, that her tail shaft was fractured, and it became necessary to accept the voluntary assistance of the steam trawler Amroth Castle to tow her, as she did, during two days, when two tugs, which had been engaged and hired for that purpose, took her in charge in the Downs and towed her to the Millwall Dock, London.

The cost of these two tugs was £100, and formed the item in dispute of general average, and the owners of The Amroth Castle were awarded by the Admiralty Court as salvage the sum of £500.

In the course and for the purposes of the salvage action it was proved that the contributory value of The Balmoral was £40,000, so that, having regard to her agreed policy value, she was under-insured to the amount of £7,000. In adjusting these two items as between the owners of the ship, cargo, and freight, the adjuster, taking the contributory value of the ship to be £40,000, assessed the amount to be contributed by the owners for general average at £58 6s. 8d, and for salvage at £472 2s., making a total of £530 8s. 8d. payable by The Balmoral.

The question has now arisen between the shipowners and the underwriters—the shipowners claiming that the whole of those amounts is payable by the underwriters, as insurers of a fully insured ship, the underwriters contending that their liability is limited to such proportion of those sums as the agreed value of the ship bears to the contributory value proved in the Admiralty Court. This would reduce their liability to thirty-three-fortieths of the plaintiffs' claim, which they have always been prepared, and are willing, to pay.

Before Bigham J., it was proved by a very experienced average adjuster (Mr. Danson) that for many years a custom had existed—which certainly in and since 1874 had been adopted as a rule at Lloyd's—that when a ship is insured for less than the contributory value, the underwriter pays on the insured value. It was proved also that such custom applied to salvage as well as general average, and that salvage had until recently been always adjusted as part of a general average. The owners of the ship contended that the rule was inconsistent with the terms of the policy, for that The Balmoral was a fully insured ship, being valued as a whole at £33,000; and being so insured they were entitled to a full indemnity against the claims.

Bigham, J., overruled that contention, and refused to disregard the rule, on the basis of which, as he stated, policies for many millions had been made, and acting upon it he gave judgment for the underwriters. In that judgment I entirely agree.

I can well understand that in one sense, but in one sense only, The Balmoral may be said to have been fully insured as a ship; that is to say, every part of her structure forming a complete ship was in fact covered by the policy, but not to her full value, for it was expressly agreed in the policy that for all purposes of it her value should be limited to £33,000, being only thirty-three-fortieths of her contributory or real value, in respect of which the salvage was awarded. In adjusting the liability of the underwriters, therefore, the amount of salvage payable by them was properly arrived at, having regard to the proportion which the agreed value of the ship bore to the contributory value as proved in the salvage court. This was in exact accordance with the custom and rule proved by Mr. Danson.

Based, as the amount of a salvage award invariably is, upon the true contributory value of the ship, and the property saved, I cannot conceive anything more unreasonable or unjust than that an owner should seek to recover from an underwriter salvage based upon a value far in excess of its insured value, and so get the benefit of an insurance without paying the premium largely in excess of the smaller value which as between themselves they have agreed to treat and be bound by for all purposes of the policy.

Another consideration presents itself to me. It cannot be denied that, the ship being for all purposes of the insurance insured for £33,000 only, the property of the owners saved by the salvors was worth £7,000 more than the insured amount.

What sound or just reason can possibly be urged in support of the claim of the owners to be so indemnified by the underwriters, who have received from the owners no consideration for such indemnity? I can see none.

Let me suppose that the owners, having insured with the defendants in £33,000 on the ship valued at that sum, had effected another insurance with other underwriters, valuing the ship at £7,000, to make up its full value. Would anybody question that the salvage payable on the full value of the ship would be rightly claimed and payable by contributions from both sets of underwriters in the proportions which the sum insured by each bore to the whole value of the property salved—namely, £40,000? If the assured, whether with a view to save the premiums or for any other reason, preferred to leave the £7,000 uninsured, they became their own insurers to that amount; and I see no reason in law or good sense why they should not bear the burden they now seek, as I think improperly, to fix upon the underwriters.

I have considered carefully the very able arguments of the learned counsel for the appellants and the cases cited in support of them, but they have not substantially affected the views I have expressed and entertain.

The rule and custom of Lloyd's, upon which Bigham, J., acted, is, in my opinion, sound, sensible, and legal, and I am therefore content to rest my judgment upon it, and agree that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON concurred.

Lord LINDLEY.—This case turns on the effect of expressing, in an ordinary marine policy, an agreed value at which the ship insured by it is to be taken as between the assured and the underwriter. The effect has to be considered with reference to two losses sustained by the assured—namely, first, his share of a general average loss; and secondly, his share of a loss sustained by reason of salvage services for which payment had to be made. The assured's share of these two losses is £530.

The ship was valued in the policy at £33,000. In ascertaining the amount payable by the assured for general average and for salvage the ship was valued at £40,000. The underwriters thereupon contend that they are liable to pay thirty-three-fortieths of the above-mentioned £530. The assured, on the other hand, say that they are entitled to be paid the whole of this sum, as it does not exceed the limit of £33,000. The underwriters contend that their view is correct in principle and is in conformity with a long-established custom or practice at Lloyd's invariably followed in this country. The assured do not deny that the last statement is true, but they contend that the custom or practice is contrary to principle, and ought not to be judicially recognized. Bigham, J., who tried the case, and the Court of Appeal have both decided in favour of the underwriters, and your lordships are asked to reverse their decision.

Let us consider the principles applicable to the case independently of any custom or practice at Lloyd's or amongst underwriters.

The sum of £33,000 mentioned in the policy is a sum agreed upon between the assured and the underwriter. No one else is in any way bound to value the ship at that sum. If, as here, a general average loss has been sustained and has to be borne by the ship, freight, and cargo, according to their respective values, it is plain that the value of the ship must be ascertained in order to apportion the loss between them, and that the conventional value of £33,000 be disregarded, unless the parties concerned choose to adopt it. So as regards salvage: the salvors are in no way affected by the fact that the ship has been valued at a particular sum in her policy of assurance. The value of the ship saved must be ascertained, because the amount awarded for salvage depends, inter alia, and to a great extent, on the benefit which accrues to the owner of the ship, and this benefit can only be measured in money by the value of his property saved.

But, whatever the value of the ship, when the amount payable by the underwriter to the assured has to be ascertained, her value must be treated as £33,000; and if the owner makes any claim on him based on the ship being worth more, the underwriter is entitled to say the claim is not in accordance with the bargain between them. I confess I see no answer to this argument. It seems to me to follow from the decision of your lordships in Irvine v. Manning, 1 H. L. C. 287, where the true effect of a valuation clause in a policy was carefully considered and finally settled. For the sake of avoiding all disputes in settling what the underwriter has to pay, the value of the ship is to be taken at an agreed sum.

In order to prevent abuses by over-insuring, this principle may require qualification; but where, as here, the ship is under-insured, no qualification is necessary.

The notion prevalent at one time, and supported by the high authority of Mr. Benecke, that, although the valuation in a policy is conclusive in the case of a total loss, yet that in the case of a partial loss the valuation may be opened, has long been exploded: see 3 Kent's Com. 274; 1 Pars. Marine Ins. 272; 1 Arn. Ins. 299 and 2 ib. 939 (6th ed.). There are numerous decisions showing this to be the case in valued policies on goods and freight (the most recent being The Main, [1894] P. 320); and I am unable to discover any reason for applying to ships a doctrine repudiated as unsound when applied to goods or freight. At the same time, I have not discovered any direct decision on this point. The principle that the valuation in a policy on ships is to be regarded in cases of partial loss was assumed to be correct in Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co., 30 W. R. 906, 9 Q. B. D. 192, and was not questioned on appeal. The owners, however, contend that the underwriters have no concern with the mode in which the amounts payable for losses insured against are arrived at. The owners say they are fully insured up to a certain limit, and that if that limit is not exceeded all losses insured against must be fully paid. This appears to me to ignore the difference between valued policies, as understood in this country, and open policies, and to be erroneous according to English law. The introduction of the word "fully" occasions the fallacy in the plaintiffs' reasoning. It is not true to say that the plaintiffs are fully insured. If the word "fully" is introduced, it must be qualified so as to show its true meaning—that is, fully for a ship of the value mentioned in the policy. If in this case the ship had been totally lost, the owners would have found themselves uninsured to the extent of the ship's ascertained value—over £33,000. To say that the whole value, as fixed in the policy, is insured, and then to treat the assured as fully insured, appears to me misleading. The contract is not fully to insure the shipowner up to a certain limit, but to insure him on the footing that his ship is to be taken to be of the value of £33,000 for the purpose of ascertaining what is payable under the policy.

The foregoing observations are as applicable to losses owing to salvage as to ordinary general average losses. There is more difficulty in dealing with salvage losses, as the sum awarded for salvage services is arrived at by considering the risks and dangers encountered by the salvors as well as the value of what is saved; but this value is always a very material matter for consideration; and, other things being the same, it may for all practicable purposes be fairly regarded as regulating the amount awarded when the sum payable under a valued policy has to be ascertained. So the matter stands on principle.

Let us now consider the custom or practice or rule on which the underwriters also rely. The rule is set out in the appendix. As printed, the rule does not mention salvage; but it was proved at the trial that the rule is always applied to losses occasioned by salvage as well as to ordinary general average losses, and I have endeavoured to show that this is correct in principle.

The rule, as framed, treats over-insurances and under-insurances differently. It first deals with over-insurances, and says: "If the ship or cargo be insured for more than its contributory value, the underwriter pays what is assured on the contributory value." If this rule is applied to a valued policy, it infringes the principle of taking the agreed value for better and for worse in ascertaining what the underwriter has to pay. This deviation from that principle may perhaps be justifiable in cases of over-insurance, on the ground that it avoids all danger of fraud and endless disputes between over-insured owners and underwriters. But this part of the rule is inapplicable to the present case, and it is unnecessary to say more about it.

The second part of the rule applies to under-insurances and to the present case; and there being no danger of fraud, the rule says, "But when insured for less than the contributory value the underwriter pays on the insured value." The rest of the rule is consequential on this This rule is, in my opinion, not wrong, but right in principle, and is calculated to save infinite trouble. The actual method of working out the rule adopted by underwriters may not be arithmetically accurate, but it is simple and convenient, there is nothing unfair in it, it has long been adopted, and there is no justification for disturbing it.

It is true that in New York the practice appears to be in favour of the appellants, but in this respect I believe New York stands alone; and although uniformity in these matters is greatly to be desired, your lordships cannot, in my opinion, judicially do otherwise than dismiss this appeal. So far as the actual words of the policy go, they appear to me consistent with both rival contentions; but the English rule is more consistent than the other with the interpetation which has for years been put on valued policies in this country.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Decision of Farwell, J., reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J.

The facts were as follows: By his will, made in 1861, E. A. Lloyd devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to trustees on trust for payment of the rents, interest, and dividends to his wife for life or widowhood, and from and after her death or second marriage on trust for sale and division among his children who had attained twenty-one or married in equal shares.

The testator died in 1862.

One of his children was Francis Lloyd, who, having attained a vested interest, mortgaged in 1867 by grant and assignment all his part or share in the testator's real and personal estate, or the stocks, funds, moneys, or securities for the time being representing it, to secure a loan of £500 and interest at 5 per cent. The mortgage, in addition to the usual covenant for payment, contained a provision that the mortgagee, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, should by and out of any real and personal estate which should be received by him and them in pursuance of the grant and assignment pay all costs and expenses, and the moneys for the time being owing on the security, and pay or transfer the remainder or surplus (if any) to F. Lloyd.

F. Lloyd died later in 1867, and the mortgagee in 1887.

The testator's widow died in 1900, and this action was then commenced for the administration of the testator's estate, and his real and personal estate was sold under orders made in it, the share of F. Lloyd being carried over to a separate account.

The summons on which the present question arose was then taken out by F. Lloyd's representatives, asking for payment out of the balance of the fund after payment of the mortgage debt and six years' interest. The representative of the mortgagee, who was made a party to the summons, claimed to be entitled to full arrears of interest from the date of the security.

A conflict of authority existing on the question, Farwell, J., followed the authorities deciding that six years' interest only was payable, and made an order accordingly.

The mortgagee's representative appealed.

Butcher, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the appeal.—Where the interest is reversionary the statute does not run. But even assuming that section 42 applies so as to restrict us to six years' interest if the fund was entirely proceeds of realty, still two-thirds of it is the proceeds of pure personalty, and there is nothing in the statute to prevent us recovering full interest as against that. The case is analogous to a redemption action, in which a mortgagor can redeem only on the terms of paying all that is due under the security. Section 42 does not intervene to deprive us of our legal right, nor will equity give more right to the mortgagor and less to the mortgagee. If the property were not in court we could sell and pay ourselves, and the fact that it is in court makes no difference. Many of the conflicting decisions were cases where it was thought that a foreclosure action was not one for the recovery of land, but one to recover money, but Pugh v. Heath, 30 W. R. 553, 7 App. Cas. 235, decided that it is an action to recover land. [STIRLING, L.J., referred to Hunter v. Nockolds, 1 Mac. & G. 640.] That has not been followed in redemption actions.

definition of land in the interpretation section (section 1). The Act is a statutory alteration of contracts, and if the law says that only six years' interest can be recovered by action equity will follow it in imposing conditions of redemption. There is no magic in the fact that the legal estate becomes absolute in foreclosure; there is no difference between foreclosure and redemption in this respect, and if a redemption action is dismissed the result is the same as if there had been a decree for foreclosure. The definition of "land" extends to any share, estate, or interest in corporeal hereditament. Proceeds of a trust for sale of land are an interest in land; they are therefore "land" within section 42, and the mortgage is a mortgage of land, and this is money charged on or payable out of land. Why should the mortgagee, because he has been saved the necessity of bringing an action, be in a better position than he would have been in if he had brought his action?

They also referred to section 25 of the Act, and to In re Bell, 44 W. R. 99, [1896] 1 Ch. 1; Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511; and Greeaway v. Bromfield, 9 Hare 201.

Butcher, in reply.—"Land" in section 42 means land of some tenure, not proceeds of sale of land. If included there would be no need for section 40. Nor is this a distress action or suit to recover an interest in land, even if this be such an interest. We are not enforcing a remedy.

Dec. 6.—STIRLING, L.J., read the judgment of the court, which, after stating the facts, continued as follows: The question is, whether section 42 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, applies to the case. It was admitted at the bar on behalf of the respondents that, if the fund in court represented personal estate of the testator only, this section could not apply, and it was contended on behalf of the appellants that, even although the fund consisted to a large extent of the investments of proceeds of real estate, nevertheless they were entitled on various grounds to full arrears of interest. In the view which we take, it is necessary to consider only one of these grounds. It was said that the arrears of interest were not being recovered "by any distress, action, or suit," that the enactments in 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 and c. 42, only destroyed the remedy for the arrears of interest, and not the debt itself, and that the court ought not to accede to the application of the legal personal representative of the mortgagor, except on the terms of payment out of the fund of all arrears. In considering whether effect ought to be given to this contention it is necessary to pay somewhat close attention to the course of decision on the provisions of the statutes of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 and c. 42, with reference to mortgages. The material enactments are the following: 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40, No action or suit or other proceeding "shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage judgment or lien or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent at law or in equity . . . but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same"; section 42, "No arrears . . . of interest in respect of any sum of money charged upon or payable out of any land and rent . . . shall be recovered by any distress action or suit but within six years next after the same respectively shall have become due"; 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, "All actions of covenant or debt on any bond or specialty . . . shall be commenced and sued within the time and limitation hereinafter expressed and not after; that is to say, the said actions of covenant or debt on any bond or other specialty . . . within twenty years after the cause of such actions or suits but not after." In Dearman v. Wyche, 9 Sim. 570, decided in 1839, it was held by Shadwell, V.C., that a foreclosure suit was a suit for the recovery of the money secured by the mortgage within the meaning of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40. Of this decision Lord St. Leonards expressed his approval in Henry v. Smith, 2 Dr. & War. 381, see p. 387, decided in 1842, but subsequently in Wrixon v. Vize, 3 Dr. & War. 104, see p. 121, decided later in the same year, he found himself unable upon further consideration to take this view, and held that the true nature of a foreclosure suit was for the recovery of the equity of redemption of the mortgaged property, and consequently that the provisions of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, applicable to foreclosure suits were to be found, not in section 40, but in the early clauses of the Act. It has now been decided in Pugh v. Heath, both by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords, that the opinions expressed by Lord St. Leonards in Wrixon v. Vize are well founded in law. In the meantime, however, the view taken by Shadwell, V.C., was adopted by other judges in England, and in particular by Wigram, V.C., in Du Vigier v. Lee, 2 Hare 326, see p. 334, and by Lord Romilly, M.R., in Sinclair v. Jackson, 17 Beav. 405, see p. 410, and influenced their decisions with reference to the meaning and effect of section 42 of the same Act. In Du Vigier v. Lee, decided in 1843, it was held that, under the statutes 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42, and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, a mortgagee of land, whose mortgage debt and interest were also secured by a bond or covenant, was entitled in a foreclosure suit to charge the mortgage estate with the full arrears of interest accruing on the mortgage debt within twenty years before the institution of the suit. The accuracy of this determination came to be considered in 1850 by Lord Cottenham, L.C., in Hunter v. Nockolds. This was a suit instituted for the purpose of establishing an encumbrance on the estate of Sir Francis Vincent, in which a petition was presented by persons claiming to be entitled to an annuity charged on the estate, subject to the encumbrance. On the petition an order was made by which it was referred to the master to inquire whether the petitioners were entitled to any and what annuity and charge upon the estate in question and, in case he should find they were so entitled, what was due in respect of such annuity. The master found that the petitioners were entitled to an annuity of £111 charged upon the estate, and that there were due to the petitioners twenty-four quarterly payments of the annuity during the period of six years previously to the date of the order, and no more. The petitioners, however, claimed the whole of the arrears of the annuity from the 5th of February, 1829, the date of the deed by which the annuity was created, to the 5th of May, 1848, and excepted to the master's report. The exceptions were allowed by Wigram, V.C., and from this decision an appeal was brought. The Lord Chancellor held that the object of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, was to relieve land from arrears of charges beyond six years, and that its provisions were applicable only to land, while the provisions of the later Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, related only to the personal remedy in actions upon covenant or debt upon specialty, and held that the petitioners were entitled to only six years of the annuity against the land. A similar decision was given by Lord St. Leonards in Hughes v. Kelly, 3 Dr. & War. 482, as to which it is to be observed that the encumbrancer was a defendant to the suit, who neither presented any petition, nor took any active steps to enforce his charge. This charge, however, was one created, not by way of mortgage to secure a debt, but by a voluntary settlement conferring benefits on the settlor's children. In Sinclair v. Jackson, decided in 1853, it was held by Lord Romilly, M.R., that a mortgagee of a reversionary interest in land could only recover six years' arrears of interest as against the land mortgaged, although he might recover twenty years' arrears on the covenant to pay. In Shaw v. Johnson, 9 W. R. 629, 1 Dr. & Sm. 412, decided in 1861, Kindersley, V.C., held, on the authority of Hunter v. Nockolds, that a mortgagee cannot in a foreclosure action have an account of arrears of interest for more than six years, although the mortgage deed contained a covenant to pay the principal and interest. In Round v. Bell, 9 W. R. 846, 30 Beav. 121, also decided in 1861, the same point was decided by Lord Romilly, M.R. From that time down to the present it has been the uniform practice in foreclosure actions to confine the plaintiff to six years' arrears of interest. It was suggested that this practice depended on the view of the nature of a foreclosure action, which was held to be erroneous in Pugh v. Heath. Although some judges were influenced by this view, we think that the practice was really governed by the decision of the Lord Chancellor in Hunter v. Nockolds, and it is impossible for this court to depart from the rule which was thereby established. Still, all that the statute does is to take away from the mortgagee his remedy "by distress, action, or suit"; and the general rule is that, where the remedy of a creditor for his debt is barred by statute, but the right remains, he may enforce that right by means of any lien or right of retainer that is available to him: see Higgins v. Scott, 2 B. & Ad. 413, and Courtenay v. Williams, 3 Hare 539. It was, however, held by Lord Romilly in Mason v. Broadbent, decided in 1863, that, where a sale of a mortgaged estate had been made by the mortgagee under a power of sale, and the mortgagor instituted a suit to recover the surplus remaining after satisfaction of the mortgage debt, the mortgagee could not retain more than six years' arrears of interest out of the purchase-money which he had received. In Edmunds v. Waugh, decided by Kindersley, V.C., in 1866, the proceeds of sale of mortgaged property, sold under a power of sale in the mortgage by the trustees and executors of the will of of the mortgagee, were paid into court in a suit for the administration of the mortgagee's estate, and the trustees and executors petitioned for payment out of the fund to satisfy nearly twenty years' arrears of interest. It was held that if there had been no suit and the money had remained in the hands of the mortgagees they would have been entitled to retain out of it all the interest which they claimed, that the fund in court was still constructively in their hands, and that the petition was not a suit to recover interest within the meaning of section 42 of the statute. With respect to Mason v. Broadbent, the Vice-Chancellor said that he could not concur in the conclusion that a bill by the mortgagor to recover the surplus money comes within the terms of section 42, as being a suit by which arrears of interest are sought to be recovered, and he made these observations: "The intention of the Legislature, I think, was that if a man chose to let interest run into arrear for more than six years and then come to a court of justice to recover the interest, he should only be entitled to recover six years' interest; but it does not follow that the Legislature intended that a mortgagor who has lost his legal right, and comes to the court insisting on his equity to redeem, should be allowed—although he has failed to pay the interest which he ought to have paid for more than six years—to redeem on payment of only six years' interest. There would be no justice in such a construction of the statute. Is the omission of the mortgagor to pay the interest, which he ought to have paid, less culpable than the omission of the mortgagee to demand and enforce payment of it?" In In re Marshfield, decided in 1887, it was held by Kay, J. (then a judge of first instance), in accordance with the reasoning of Kindersley, V.C., in Edmunds v. Waugh, that first mortgagees of land who had sold the mortgaged property under their power of sale and received the proceeds were entitled as against the second mortgagees to retain more than six years' arrears of interest. In Dingle v. Coppen it was held by Byrne, J., that a mortgagor seeking to redeem could only do so on paying all arrears of interest from the date of the mortgage. In our opinion the reasoning of Kindersley, V.C., in Edmunds v. Waugh is sound and the decisions in that case and in In re Marshfield and Dingle v. Coppen are in accordance with law. Not one of these decisions, however, precisely covers the present case, in which the mortgagees have never had in their hands the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property. Nevertheless, the mortgagees are not at the present time seeking to recover arrears of interest by "distress, action, or suit"; they have taken no step whatever for the recovery of arrears of interest. They claim under a mortgage deed by which the mortgagor assigned to them all his interests, subject to a proviso for redemption on a day long since gone by, and, according to the terms of the deed, their title has long since become absolute. No doubt the representatives of the mortgagor are entitled to redeem, but on redeeming they would, according to the cases just mentioned, have to pay all arrears of interest. They do not in form seek to redeem; they ask for repayment to them of the surplus of the fund after deducting the principal and six years' arrears of interest only. Under the mortgage deed the representatives of the mortgagee have an interest in the fund to the extent of their principal and all their arrears of interest; but it is said that, if the representatives of the mortgagee applied for payment to themselves of the whole fund, the court would refuse to hand it over to them, and would pay only the principal and six years' arrears of interest, and in support of this contention In re Bell is relied on. That case shows that the court will not hand over the whole of a mortgaged fund to first mortgagees where that fund is more than sufficient for payment of what is due to the first mortgagees, in face of the opposition of subsequent encumbrancers, but it does not show that the court, merely in order to deprive a first mortgagee of interest for which he had lost his remedy, would withhold from him a fund his title to which remains unextinguished. But, however this may be, the mortgagees (as has already been remarked) are not proceeding by "distress, action, or suit." On the contrary, the pending proceeding is taken by the legal personal representative of a mortgagor, against whom the mortgagee's title has become absolute, and on whom a court of equity has the power to impose terms as the price of the relief which it may see fit to give. We think that the representatives of the mortgagor ought only to be allowed to recover the fund as against the mortgagees upon the same terms as if they had brought an action for redemption. This does not, in our opinion, conflict with the decision in Hughes v. Kelly already referred to, because, although in that case the encumbrancer was not taking active proceedings, still he was not a mortgagee whose title to the mortgaged property had become absolute, but was only entitled to an equitable charge, which had been created by a voluntary settlement, and carried with it no right of foreclosure: see Sampson v. Pattison, 1 Hare 533; Jenkin v. Row 5 De G. & Sm. 107, and In re Owen, 43 W. R. 55, [1894] 3 Ch. 220. Two cases have still to be considered. The first is In re Stead's Mortgaged Estates. There money was paid into court under the Lands Clauses Act for the purchase of land which was subject to an equitable mortgage by deposit, with a memorandum undertaking to give a legal mortgage. The mortgagee petitioned for payment out of the fund. It was held by Malins, V.C., that the petition was analogous to a suit for recovery of the land, and, therefore, that the principal and six years' interest could alone be recovered. Whether this decision be well founded or not, it does not govern the present case, inasmuch as the mortgagor, and not the mortgagee, is here applying to the court for payment. The other case is in In re Slater's Trusts. There a petition was presented by one of several mortgagors for payment out of a fund in court which was subject to a mortgage, the mortgagee being made a respondent to the petition. It was held by Bacon, V.C., that the mortgagee was entitled only to six years' arrears of interest, on the ground, as I understand it, that if he had taken proceedings of his own he could have recovered six years' interest and no more. This appears to us to overlook the terms of section 42, and the difference in the position of a mortgagee who is proceeding actively himself and one who is simply resisting proceedings by his mortgagor. That decision is in point, but, in our opinion, it ought not to be followed. We think, therefore, that in the circumstances of this case, notwithstanding the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42, the appellants are entitled to receive their full arrears of interest out of the fund in court before the representatives of the mortgagor receive anything, and that the appeal accordingly ought to be allowed, with costs.

Appeal allowed.

BICKMORE v. DIMMER. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Covenant not to make alterations—Shop—Fixture—Advertising sign.

A tenant who occupied certain premises as a place of business under a lease, which contained a covenant by the lessee not to make any alteration to the premises without the consent of the landlord, erected on the front of the premises a clock some four feet in diameter and fastened into the stone of the front of the premises by iron bolts as an advertising sign without the consent of the landlord.

Held that the covenant ought not to be so construed as to extend to any alteration which did not affect the structure or form of the premises, and at the same time was reasonable and proper for carrying on the business of the lessee in an ordinary way.

This was an appeal against a decision of Farwell, J.

The plaintiffs were the owners of certain premises known as 24 and 26, Sandon-buildings, Church-street, in the city of Liverpool, and by a lease dated the 5th of May, 1898, they demised part of these premises to Frederick Heath for a term of twenty-one years from the 1st day of January, 1899. The lease contained covenants by the lessee that he would within twelve months from the commencement of the said term expend the sum of £400 at least in alterations to the shop-fronts on the ground floor of the said premises and otherwise in such substantial improvements, internal structural alterations, and decorations of the said premises, and in such manner as the surveyor of the lessors should approve; and that he would not make or suffer to be made any alteration to the said premises except as therein expressly provided without the consent in writing of the lessors first had and obtained. The lease also contained a covenant by the lessee against assigning the same without the consent of the lessors. The lessors covenanted with the lessee that they would, within twelve months from the commencement of the term, expend the sum of £700, or some part thereof, in improvements to the staircase and lift in the said premises in accordance with the plans prepared by the lessors' architect, and in case the whole of the sum of £700 should not be required for that purpose would apply the balance in or towards the execution of the alterations and improvements thereinbefore covenanted to be executed by the lessee so as to relieve the lessee pro tanto from expending the whole of the said sum of £400 under the said covenants. This lease was assigned to the defendant by an indenture dated the 11th of December, 1900. The consent of the landlords was not obtained to this assignment, and they commenced an action against the defendant to recover possession of the premises. This action was compromised, on terms set out in an agreement dated the 7th of March, 1901, and made between the plaintiffs and the defendant. By this agreement the defendant agreed to restrict his business of a watchmaker and jeweller to a certain part of the demised premises and not to advertise or indicate in any manner in, upon, or over any portion of the restricted premises any such business. By a subsequent agreement dated the 27th of June, 1901, the defendant was allowed to make alterations to the premises in accordance with plans signed by the parties or their surveyors, but the agreement was not to prejudice or affect the covenant against alterations contained in the lease. The alterations in question were alterations to the front of the shop. After this the defendant erected outside the premises, though not on the restricted portion, a large clock contained in an iron circular frame four feet in diameter and fastened by iron bolts driven into the stone wall of the premises. The clock had two faces on which the defendant's name and business appear, and is lighted by electricity. This clock was not among the alterations mentioned by the agreement of the 27th of June, 1901, but was erected without the consent of the plaintiffs and in spite of their protests. The plaintiffs alleged that this constituted an "alteration" of the premises in breach of the covenant. They accordingly claimed a declaration that the erection of the clock was a breach of the covenant and a mandatory injunction for its removal.

Farwell, J., held that there had been a breach of the covenant not to make any alteration to the premises without the consent of the lessors, and granted a mandatory injunction for the removal of the clock.

The defendant appealed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This case depends upon the construction of a short covenant in a lease. It is never so easy to construe a covenant in a particular lease as it is to decide a question that depends upon a general principle. The whole of the lease and its purposes must be taken into consideration, and then you must see what, taking all these matters into consideration, is the proper construction of the particular covenant. In this case, the premises in question, though not originally demised as premises upon which the business of a jeweller and watchmaker was to be carried on eventually in the hands of the assignee came to be occupied for that purpose. The original assignment was made without the licence of the landlords, and the landlords took action to forfeit the lease by reason of the assignment being without their leave. That action was compromised substantially on the terms that the assignee was to be accepted as a tenant and allowed to carry on his business on the premises, subject only to this, that he was to be restricted from doing so on a certain part of the demised premises, and in respect of that part of the demised premises, he was, as appears by the words of the agreement, not to "advertise or indicate in any manner in, upon, or over any part of the restricted premises any such business"—that is, the business of a jeweller and watchmaker. On that primâ facie the parties contemplated that in respect of the rest of the premises he might carry on his business and in particular advertise or indicate his business in or upon the portion of the premises to which the restriction did not apply. I do not say that that casts much light, if any, upon the construction of the covenant in the original lease, but I do think it is a piece of evidence which goes to show what both parties here—the landlords and the tenant—were contemplating as being ordinary incidents of the business of a watchmaker and jeweller. That being so, I will now read the words of the convenant in respect of which this mandatory injunction is asked. [His lordship read the covenant in the lease, and continued:] Now we have to construe this word "alteration." I feel strongly that, having to construe this word "alteration," and note it is "alteration to the said premises," it is quite impossible to hold that every addition to the premises, whether it alters the form or structure of the premises or not, is within the meaning of this word "alteration." If we were so to hold, this tenant would be unable to put a fixed blind outside his windows or a lamp outside in front of his door or even a knocker on the door, upon which people might knock if they wanted to come in. It seems to me that that is an impossible construction, and the passage I have read from the agreement shows that the parties recognized that business people would, even with regard to the outside of the building, do all sorts of things which would come within this prohibition, if the word "alteration" is so widely construed. We are not entitled to make a new agreement for these parties, and it is therefore necessary to draw a line somewhere in construing this covenant. I do not, however, think it necessary to draw the line with reference to questions which do not arise in this case. We have to say here, "Does or does not this clock come within the words 'alteration to the premises'?" I think we would be justified in simply saying that, wherever the line is drawn, we do not think this clock comes within the words "alteration to the premises." But I prefer to draw the line more clearly than this. I was very much struck with this when it was put to counsel for the respondents in the course of the argument, that the word "alteration" could not include every addition fixed to a building, whether or not it altered the form or structure of the building; they did not stand out for such a contention, but they said "We do not complain of the clock. It may be that the addition of the clock, if it could be made to adhere to the building by some strong cement, would not be an alteration to the demised premises, but we do complain of the holes which have been made in the stones which form the front of the house." And they pointed out that the surveyor of the lessors said that in order to repair the structure of the house it would not be sufficient to plug these holes but it would be necessary to put in a fresh stone, which would cost £15 or £20. But, however that may be, I am trying to see whether this word "alteration" extends beyond alterations to the structure of the premises. Although I took a different view of the first covenant of this lease when I first heard it read, I was impressed with the argument of counsel for the appellants, and I do think that this covenant is a covenant for the expenditure of money upon permanent alterations which affected the structure of the house, and that consideration goes to confirm the view I take of the covenant which we now have to construe—namely, that the word "alteration" only applies to such alterations as affect the form or structure of the premises. That, if right, would get rid of any question whether the exception in the covenant sued on would stand in the way of the argument of counsel for the appellant. But whether I am right or wrong in drawing the line just where I have drawn it, I wish to add that we clearly ought so to draw the line defining the meaning of this covenant, that the covenant shall not operate to prevent a lessee who is intending to carry on business on these premises from doing those acts which are convenient or useful for a tradesman to do in the ordinary conduct of his business. To say that the covenant is to receive such a construction that a tradesman could not fix lamps to the front of his shop, or, as in the present case, a clock, if he thought it necessary to do so for the purposes of his trade, seems to me to be adopting a construction of the covenant which the parties could never have intended. I think that the judgment of Farwell, J., was wrong, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am sorry to say I cannot agree with the view taken by Farwell, J. The whole question depends upon the construction of a particular covenant in this lease, and really upon the construction of one word, "alteration," in that covenant. [His lordship read the covenant, and continued:] Now the exception of what is expressly provided refers to the earlier covenant under which the lessee gave an obligation to expend £400 at least in alterations to the shop-front, &c. It might have thrown some light upon the true construction of the second covenant if we had known what alterations were approved by the surveyor at the commencement of the lease, but as to that there is no evidence. I may observe, however, that on the face of the lease the alterations there contemplated must have been such as were suitable for the enjoyment of the demised premises as a place of business by the then intending lessee. The lease has been assigned and a subsequent agreement entered into between the defendant and his lessor, and under that agreement the defendant is to occupy the premises as a watchmaker and jeweller. It was admitted by counsel for the respondents that the word "alteration" could not be read without some limitation. They proposed to read it as meaning such alterations as were necessary to give effect to the enjoyment of this portion of the demised premises by the lessee as a jeweller's shop. I think counsel were right in making that concession. I think it could not have been intended by the parties that the lessee should be bound to get the landlord's consent to every alteration necessary to adapt the premises to the purposes of a jeweller's shop. So far I go with counsel for the appellants, but I think their definition is too narrow. In my opinion the limitation ought not to be confined to things which are essential to the carrying on of the business in the sense that without them the business could not be carried on at all. I think it ought to be extended to alterations which are reasonable and proper for carrying on the business in an ordinary way. That being so, in my opinion the erection of this clock was a reasonable and proper method of giving notice to the public that the lessee was carrying on the business of a watchmaker and jeweller. On this ground I think the appeal ought to be allowed, and the mandatory injunction discharged.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree with Farwell, J., that if there had been a breach of the covenant it was right to grant a mandatory injunction. If a man enters into such a covenant and then deliberately commits a breach of it, and there has been no laches by the other party, it would be a very dangerous doctrine to hold that a mandatory injunction ought not to be granted. But as to the construction of the covenant, I am unable to take the same view as Farwell, J. Some limitation must be put upon these words. They could not apply to the papering of a room or the putting up of gas brackets or electric light apparatus, even though in so doing holes must be made in the walls. It has been argued that the abstraction of a few cubic inches out of the stone surface of the wall is an alteration within the meaning of the covenant. I cannot accede to that view. I think "alteration" must mean an alteration to the form or structure of the building and that on this ground the appeal ought to be allowed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

By his will dated the 5th day of June, 1891, John Scott, the testator in the action, bequeathed to each of his six daughters £5,000 to be retained in trust for them and their issue, and after a devise of freehold premises in the City of London the testator devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate not thereby otherwise disposed of to his trustees upon trust for conversion and investment and to stand possessed thereof in trust for all his, the testator's, children who might be living at his decease in such proportions that the shares of each of his sons should be double the amount of the shares of each of his daughters, and that the shares of his daughters should be equal, and the testator further declared that the sum of £5,000 given by him to each of his married daughters on their respective marriages, and the like sum of £5,000 recently given by him to each of his unmarried daughters, was not in any way to be brought into account in ascertaining the share of his same daughter of and in the residuary trust funds, but was to be retained and enjoyed by her in addition to such share. Provided always, and the testator declared that if any child of his should die in his lifetime, leaving a child or children who should survive him and being a son should attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry under that age, then and in every such case the last mentioned child or children should take, and if more than one equally between them, the share which his, her, or their parent would have taken of and in the residuary trust estate if such parent had survived the testator. Prior to the date of the said will the testator had given to each of his six daughters a sum of £5,000.

On the 3rd of August, 1892, the testator wrote to his son Alfred Scott that he had placed to his order £5,000 with the testator's firm, and he hoped that his son would find this sum useful, and something to lean on and call his own. According to an affidavit of two of the testator's daughters, the testator used to refer to this sum of £5,000 as being on precisely the same footing as the sums of £5,000 given to his daughters.

The testator made a codicil dated the 7th of June, 1894, to his said will. In the codicil he made no reference to the gift of £5,000 to Alfred, but concluded by confirming his said will. The testator had in the year 1866 taken his son John into partnership with him in his business as a shawl maker and warehouseman. For many years the profits of the business were very good, but for some time preceding the year 1897 they had materially diminished. The son John Scott originally brought no capital into the business, and none was advanced him by the testator, but a proportion of the son's share of the profits was accumulated as capital. Owing to the diminution of the profits of the business the son was compelled to encroach on his capital.

In August, 1897, he applied to the testator for assistance, with the result that the testator transferred £5,000 from his account to the account of the son in the books of the partnership. The testator also gave him a further sum of £1,500 to reduce the mortgage on the son's house. This further sum of £1,500 was transferred from the account of the testator to the account of the son in the partnership books on the 21st of September, 1897. John Scott, the son, died in the lifetime of the testator on the 22nd of January, 1899, leaving one daughter him surviving, who on the 19th of May, 1900, was married to H. L. Bland. The testator died on the 12th of May, 1899.

The present summons was taken out by the trustees of the testator's will for the purpose of ascertaining whether the sum of £5,000 given to Alfred and the two sums of £5,000 and £1,500 given to John ought to be brought into account by way of hotchpot in the division of the testator's residuary estate.

Kekewich, J., held that the sums in question ought not to be brought into hotchpot. His lordship was of opinion that the sums in question were advanced for temporary purposes by way of gift and not in any way in satisfaction of the provision made for the testator's sons by will. He was also of opinion so far as the sums given to John were concerned that the daughter being substituted for her father could not in any case be compelled to bring these sums into hotchpot.

The testator's daughters appealed.

Younger, K.C., and Whitehead, for the appellants.

Warrington, K.C., and C. James, for Mrs. Bland.

Renshaw, K.C., and E. S. Ford, for Alfred Scott.

Whitehead replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We think that the judgment of the learned judge must be supported in respect both of John and Alfred, but I may say, although I do not know that it is material for the purpose of dealing with this appeal, that we cannot agree with the conclusion that the learned judge arrived at about the daughter because we think that it is quite plain that the daughter could only take that which her father would have taken, and it is impossible to arrive at the conclusion that the result would have been different in the case of the father and in the case of the daughter who took in the event of his death. The real question here is whether either of these two sons by the receipt from the father of the sums of money which they respectively received brought the case within the rule against double portions so that the sons would now, when the residue comes to be distributed under the father's will, which was made before the payment to either of the sons of these sums of money, have to bring them into account or into hotchpot.

I think that the case is not within the rule against double portions.

I will deal with the case of the son John first, and I shall attempt to deal with that case exactly upon the basis which is pointed out in Lacon v. Lacon as being the right basis. I will take the statement of the law in Bowen, L.J.'s, judgment in Lacon v. Lacon, [1891] 2 Ch. at p. 498, the passage which Mr. Whitehead read to us in the course of his very cogent argument a few minutes ago. I begin here, "in the first place both of the suggested gifts or donations must be gifts in the nature of a portion." So every gift will not do to bring you within this rule against double portions, you must have two portions and in order to make the second portion the gift which follows the will must be a gift in the nature of a portion. "The first presumption here comes under discussion: it is said that whatever gifts are made by the father, which it may be supposed will have to be distributed among the children, or which are given by the father to one child with a view to establishing him in life, are presumed to be portions within the meaning of the rule." That is, not every gift is to be taken to be a portion within the meaning of the rule, but gifts which show those characteristics are to be within the meaning of the rule. "We have, therefore, to ask ourselves in the first place were these two shares which were received during the lifetime of the father received under such circumstances as to justify their being treated and considered as a portion?"

Now, with regard to the son John the payment of this gift or whatever it may be called—of this sum of £5,000, a large sum of money—is a gift which so much bears the characteristics of a portion that I think that in the absence of anything to rebut the conclusion we ought to assume the first of those presumptions which is mentioned by Bowen, L.J., in his judgment. Then he goes on: "But supposing both gifts are gifts in the nature of portion, then comes a further question for the solution of which a further presumption is invoked. That question is whether it was intended that the former gift or portion should take the place of an advancement of the gift which is given by the will, and then the second presumption which is invoked has to be dealt with—a presumption to the effect that the former gift, the gift inter vivos, was intended as an advancement pro tanto of the gift under the bequest—a presumption, it is said, which ought to be made in favour of equality amongst children, it being the view of the law that equality is what the father in dealing with his children would in most cases presumably intend."

Now it seems to me that according to that judgment of Bowen, L.J., we are entitled and have the duty to consider the circumstances of this case and see whether this presumption is rebutted or not, and when dealing with that I want to call attention to something which occurs in the judgment of James, L.J., in Fowkes v. Pascoe, L. R. 10 Ch. App. At p. 350 he says: "The principle is that the will shows the distribution which the father thinks just and expedient for his children, and if, after having made such a scheme for distribution, he advances one of his children on marriage, or going out to establish himself in the world, or the like, it is to be presumed, as a presumptio juris et de jure, that the advancement is an anticipation of the testamentary provision, just as under the Statute of Distributions an advancement is to be brought into hotchpot." I do not think by that James, L.J., meant in any way to say that these presumptions are irrebuttable presumptions. It seems to me that to so read his judgment would be inconsistent with all the cases. It is not necessary that I should go through them one by one, but amongst cases which have been cited to us in the course of the argument there have been plenty of cases in which the circumstances were such as to raise a primâ facie presumption which was afterwards rebutted. Cozens-Hardy, L.J., reminds me that Lacon v. Lacon itself, from which I have just read this passage, is an instance of that.

That being so, what I have to really consider here is whether this particular £5,000 was intended by the father as something on account of the son's share of the family fund which he was distributing by his will. I think it was not so intended. I do not propose to base that conclusion upon any one fact alone; one has to take the whole matter into consideration. Before one can come to the conclusion that the £5,000 was so intended one must ask oneself whether there was a payment which, taking all the facts into consideration, was intended for the establishment of the child in life or for any one of those sort of purposes which are detailed by Sir George Jessel in

Taylor v. Taylor. When one asks oneself that question one finds that as a fact the sum of £5 000 was a sum which the testator had given to all his children. He had given it to his daughters. He makes an express provision in the case of the daughters that these sums of £5,000 are not to be brought into account. Then what happens? The son is in partnership with him, the son has overdrawn his capital account, which was a matter which could be complained of by the father and by the father only; and in those circumstances, when they are brought to the notice of the father by the son, he deals with the son in the same way that he has dealt with the daughters—that is, he gives him a gift of £5,000, and in my judgment, the sum being identical is itself a matter which must not be left out of consideration when one has to consider whether this is a gift or an advancement of a portion. But more than that, one sees that the father, who is, as I have said, the only person who could complain, in effect is releasing the debt of the son to him. He is in fact, according to my judgment, extricating the son from the difficulties in which the son then found himself, and it seems to me that really for this purpose it makes no difference whether the debt was a debt due to the father or whether it was a debt due to someone else; the ultimate object of the father was to relieve the son of his embarrassments, and if one looks at Taylor v. Taylor one finds there that the father, who had paid a large sum, £650, to extricate his son from debts of honour in India, was treated by Sir George Jessel as having made a gift to his son and not an advancement by way of portion. Taking all these circumstances together I think that there is sufficient here, even assuming that the amount of the payment was such as to raise a primâ facie presumption that the £5,000 was an advancement, to displace that presumption and leave the £5,000 a gift.

I have dealt now with the £5,000, but there was a further sum of £1,500. With regard to the £1,500 it seems to me that that payment clearly falls within the rules laid down by Sir George Jessel which I have just called attention to. It was a plain payment to relieve the son from a debt which might have been enforced by the mortgagees against the son unless the father had come forward with his assistance.

Having dealt with the case of the eldest son, I will pass to the case of the son Alfred. With regard to the son Alfred, here again the amount which was given to Alfred was just the same as had been given to the daughters, and primâ facie it would seem to me that that payment is to be treated as upon the same basis—that is, as a sum which was not to be brought into hotchpot, but in the case of Alfred you have got the additional fact that after the gift there was a codicil which confirmed the father's will in all respects. In these circumstances I think the conclusion of the learned judge as to Alfred was right also, and therefore this appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question arises here with regard to certain sums which were given by a testator after he had made his will to his two sons. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] I shall assume that primâ facie the gift of £5,000 to Alfred, being a large sum, would in an ordinary case—in the case of an ordinary estate—be taken as an advance within the rule against double portions; but I think it is a circumstance which in this particular case must be taken into consideration and have considerable weight given to it that the testator had given the large sum of £5,000 to each of his daughters, and yet he had expressly stated by his will that those sums were not to be deemed advancements. So that we are dealing with a testator who had given six sums of £5,000 and yet did not dream of those sums being brought into account in the ultimate distribution of his estate. But the matter as regards Alfred does not rest there. Two of the daughters have made an affidavit in which they state the conversation which after this event took place on the subject between themselves and their father; and we have this general result, that in his conversations with the daughters, in speaking of what he had given to the daughters and of what he had given to this particular son, the testator dealt with them on the same footing. The reasonable inference from that would be that his intention in giving this sum of £5,000 was to put this son, who was not in business with him, on the same footing as the daughters.

Lastly, there is this circumstance to be observed—that after he had made this gift, and before he made the gift to his other son, the testator made a codicil to his will. He does not expressly refer to the gift he had made to Alfred, but he does in express terms, after making certain dispositions which it is unnecessary to mention, in all other respects confirm his will. In Jones v. Ravenscroft it is laid down by Knight-Bruce, L.J., that that is a circumstance which is to be taken into consideration, and looking at all the circumstances together I think that Kekewich, J., has come to the right conclusion with respect to the sum of £5,000 given to Alfred.

With respect to the son John the case is not the same, and it is one perhaps of more difficulty. Two of the elements upon which I have rested my judgment in the case of Alfred do not occur here, for there is no evidence of any such conversation with reference to the gift to John as there is in reference to the gift made to Alfred, and the testator made the gift to John after the codicil. Nevertheless, looking at all the circumstances I come to a similar conclusion in this case. [His lordship referred to the position of the son John in the partnership in 1897, and to the fact that he had drawn out of the business in excess of that which he was entitled to draw. He continued:] The position, in fact, was that the son's capital had been reduced, and legally he was under an obligation to his father to pay his excess of drawings if the father chose to insist upon it. In these circumstances he approached his father on the 31st of August, 1897.

No doubt the advances which had been made to the daughters and to Alfred were perfectly well known to John. They seem to have been no secret in the family, and the application which John made to the father is partly based on the ground that he had had nothing, as his brothers and sisters had. The result was that the father dealt with him in this way. He transferred £5,000 capital from his own account to the account of the son, and he gave him £1 500 in cash to pay off the mortgage on his house. The question is whether these payments ought to be treated as advances within the rule or no. I have come to the conclusion that they ought not. I think that the distinction which was taken by Sir George Jessel in Taylor v. Taylor is sound. In that case the father amongst other things had paid the debts of the son for him, and Sir George Jessel deals with that in this way: "Sums paid for debts in India appear to be in the nature of temporary assistance; thus if a child were in business and required further capital a sum given for that purpose would be an advancement, but a sum given merely to assist him temporarily would not." It was said that in form this fell within what is laid down by Sir George Jessel with reference to a son engaged in business and requiring additional capital, for it is perfectly true that the form this transaction took as between father and son was a transfer of £5,000 from the father's capital to the son, but it will be observed that no further capital was brought into the business by that transaction, and it seems to me that it is not really the case of further capital being required for the business but of a debt from the son to the father in the business being wiped out by means of the £5 000 which was so transferred. As regards the £1,500 which was advanced to pay the mortgage, it seems to me that it also was a temporary assistance. The whole thing was done with the view of enabling the son to keep the position which he had acquired by means of the partnership originally entered into between the father and the son without the son bringing in any capital, and to tide over the difficulties which had arisen from the small amount of profits earned during the three or four years preceding the transaction. I think, therefore, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with counsel for the appellants that if nothing more had been known than that a large sum —£5,000—was given by a father to a child in the interval between the date of his will and the date of his death there would be a presumption, which in that case would not be rebutted, that it was to be taken by way of partial ademption. I think, however, that it is clear, as was said by Knight-Bruce. L.J., in Ravenscroft v. Jones, that all the circumstances and the manner of the gift must be looked at, and if I come to the conclusion, as the Lord Justice did in that case, that the testator in making the gift had not his will or his testamentary disposition in his mind, then I think that the presumption is one which is not binding and which ought to be rebutted. I do not propose to go over the facts again. We are dealing here with a very wealthy man, with an estate worth £200 000 or £250,000 He had before his will given £5,000 to each of his daughters, and he gave this £5,000 to his son Alfred—identical in amount. The terms of the gift we know from the letter, and we also have evidence—the evidence of two of the appellants in this case, which alone, I think, would be quite sufficient to negative the presumption. They say they were told that the gift by their father to Alfred was of the same kind substantially as the gift of their own £5,000—that is to say, it was given in circumstances which would not require it to be brought into hotchpot. Then there is the codicil, to which I attach also considerable weight because it is a confirmation of the will with regard to the gift of the £5,000.

As to John, there is, no doubt, more difficulty, but for the reasons which have been assigned by my brethren I agree that in this case also the presumption is rebutted. Our decision, no doubt, involves this—that in so far as there is a difference between the view expressed by Sir George Jessel in Taylor v Taylor on the one hand, and that expressed by Wood, V.C., in Boyd v. Boyd and by Pearson, J., in Blockley v. Blockley on the other hand, we adopt the view of Sir George Jessel and not the view of Wood, V.C., and Pearson, J. I think in so doing we are really following, not perhaps the decision, but the indication of view of the Court of Appeal in In re Lacon, Lacon v. Lacon. For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

In re GARWOOD'S TRUSTS.
GARWOOD v. PAYNTER. (a.)

Partnership—Assignment of share—Agreement between partners to pay each other salaries—"Management or administration of partnership business"—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), s. 31.

If, after the assignment by a partner of his share in the partnership, the partners in good faith agree to give themselves salaries, such an act is an act done in "the management or administration of the partnership business," and cannot, under section 31 of the Partnership Act, 1890, be called in question by the assignee of such share.

Action with witnesses.

This was an action brought by Mrs. Garwood, one of the beneficiaries under a deed dated the 21st of February, 1889, against Captain Garwood, her husband, and a Mr. Paynter, two of the trustees of that deed, asking for the construction of that deed and for certain relief.

Various questions were argued, but the only one which calls for a report was as to the rights of an assignee or mortgagee of the share of a partner in a partnership.

At the date of that deed the defendants Garwood and Paynter and a Mr. Dunn were partners in equal shares for thirty-one years under a deed of the 21st of November, 1870, as colliery owners. The partnership deed contained no affirmative words defining the duties of the partners and no provision for the payment of a salary to any partner.

By the deed of 1889, which was a separation deed between the defendant Garwood and the plaintiff, the defendant Garwood charged his share in the partnership business and assets (subject to certain mortgages) to trustees, of whom the defendant Paynter was one, on certain trusts which were mainly for the benefit of the plaintiff.

Down to 1893 the business did not engage the active attention of the partners. In 1893 and 1894 arrangements were entered into under which the defendant Garwood became the manager of the London agency at the salary of £150 a year. That arrangement lasted only for a year and three-quarters, and no question arose as to that. The arrangement as regards the defendant Paynter was that he was to give up one day a week to go up to the colliery and be the acting manager at the salary at first of £100 and later at £150 a year. It was also arranged that Mr. Dunn was to go to the colliery, look after the stores, inspect the books, and check the sales at the pit's mouth. There was evidence that the salaries had been paid bonâ fide—that is to say, without any intention of injuring the plaintiff, and that work had been done in respect of them. In 1897 there had been a settlement of accounts, under which a balance of £20 had been paid to the plaintiff, on the footing that the salaries had been charged. The plaintiff now complained of these salaries.

Buckmaster, K.C., and A. C. Clauson, for the plaintiff. —No partner is entitled to remuneration for acting in the partnership business: Partnership Act, s. 24 (6). After the assignment the defendants had no right to agree to pay each other salaries, and thus diminish the amount of profits payable to the plaintiff, Captain Garwood, because he had assigned his share, and Mr. Paynter, because a trustee has no right to prejudice his cestui que trust.

Astbury, K.C., and Borthwick, for the defendant Paynter.—The salaries were paid to the partners in respect of extra work. The plaintiff has no power to interfere in the management of the partnership business, and must accept the account of profits agreed to by the partners: Partnership Act, s. 31 (1); Watts v. Driscoll, 48 W. R. 521, 49, ib. 146, [1901] 1 Ch. 294, Lindley on Partnership, p. 575. The plaintiff is bound by the settlement of accounts. The action cannot be maintained in the absence of Mr. Dunn.

H. Terrell, K.C., and Sheldon, for the defendant Garwood.

Buckmaster, K.C., replied.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, continued: The question I have to determine is whether, as against the assignees of Captain Garwood's share, the two £150 salaries can be charged at all. Now, section 24 (6) of the Partnership Act provides that no partner shall be entitled to remuneration for acting in the partnership business. So I start with that, that the two partners, Mr. Paynter and Mr. Dunn, were primâ facie not entitled to anything because they did work for the partnership. But under section 31 an assignment by a partner of his share does not now effect a dissolution, nor give to the assignee, during the continuance of the partnership, any right to interfere in the management or administration of the partnership business. The assignee must accept the account of the profits agreed to by the partners. He is entitled only to receive the share of profits to which the assigning partner would otherwise be entitled. The question is whether an arrangement such as that in this case, which, it is conceded, was bonâ fide made in the sense that it was not intended to defeat the rights of Mrs. Garwood in any way, and was not improper or fraudulent, does not bind the assignee, as being something done in the management or administration of the partnership business of which the assignee cannot complain. It seems to me that the conclusion that an assignment prevented partners from arriving bonâ fide at such an arrangement as this would be disastrous. Mark what it means. A., B., and C. are partners; A. assigns, B. and C. cannot say that is a dissolution. The contention involves this, that B. and C. continue bound towards a partner who, by the assignment, is rendered incapable of bonâ fide agreeing with them in a matter of management or administration which otherwise he could have agreed to. I think that would be a very serious result. I think the intention of the Act was to substitute the assignee for the assignor as the person entitled to such profits as the assignor would have received if there had not been an assignment, but to give the assignee no right to interfere at all with anything bonâ fide done in management or administration. Suppose this case, which I put in the course of the argument as an illustration: A house belonging to the partnership is let at a rental, and the partners think it is very desirable that one of the partners should live there because it adjacent to the partnership premises, or because, for some reason or other, it would be advantageous to the partnership that a partner should live there, and so, on the determination of the lease, or by an arrangement that the tenant should quit, the tenant goes and the partner lives there, paying no rent. Could an assignee complain of that? I should say not. In the beneficial management or administration of the partnership the partners agree amongst themselves to do something, which, I agree, will diminish the profits of the partnership, but it is something bonâ fide done for management or administration.

Here, as a matter of fact, what took place was this. The three partners—Captain Garwood, the assignor, no doubt was one—bonâ fide considered that it was beneficial for the partnership that the sales, say, at the pit's mouth, should be checked, so as to stop robbery, and that one partner should go and superintend that work and see that those moneys were properly received, and that he should be paid for his work. I think that is something bonâ fide done in the management and administration of the partnership business. Mrs. Garwood cannot say she has lost the £150, and at the same time take the benefit of the saving which has, perhaps, been effected by stopping the robbery in the sales thus made.

Further, I think this has to be borne in mind, that in 1897 there was a settlement of accounts upon the footing that these salaries were paid, and that all things had been done perfectly honestly and above board, and that the partnership business might have suffered if the additional work these two persons themselves performed had not been done. In 1894 Captain Garwood's office and salary ceased, and, therefore, the real effect was that Mr. Paynter and Mr. Dunn gave their time, Captain Garwood not giving a similar amount of time, and in the result produced profits for the partnership, and for that they received salaries. I think that was an act in the management or administration of the partnership which, under section 31, is binding upon the assignee.

I may say that I feel no difficulty in deciding this in the absence of Mr. Dunn, inasmuch as I am deciding the point in his favour. Mr. Dunn was a partner who was party to arranging these salaries and, of course, I can, in his absence, decide something which is not against him. I therefore hold that the salaries ought to be allowed.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adjourned summons.

The question raised in this case was whether estate duty upon property appointed by will under a general power of appointment is to be borne by the appointed property, or whether it is payable out of the residue.

The facts are given in the judgment.

The Finance Act, 1894, provides: Section 6. (2) The executor of the deceased shall pay the estate duty in respect of all personal property (wheresoever situate) of which the deceased was competent to dispose at his death . . . and may pay in like manner the estate duty in respect of any other property passing on such death, which by virtue of any testamentary disposition of the deceased is under the control of the executor, or in the case of property not under his control, if the persons accountable for the duty in respect thereof request him to make such payment.

Section 8. (3) The executor of the deceased shall, to the best of his knowledge and belief, specify in appropriate accounts annexed to the Inland Revenue affidavit all the property in respect of which estate duty is payable upon the death of the deceased, and shall be accountable for the estate duty in respect of all personal property, wheresoever situate, of which the deceased was competent to dispose at his death, but shall not be liable for any duty in excess of the assets which he has received as executor, or might but for his own neglect or default have received.

Section 9. (1) A rateable part of the estate duty on an estate, in proportion to the value of any property which does not pass to the executor as such, shall be a first charge on the property in respect of which duty is leviable. . . .

(4) If the rateable part of the estate duty in respect of any property is paid by the executor, it shall, where occasion requires, be repaid to him by the trustees or owners of the property.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The question remaining to be disposed of upon the present summons is whether the rateable part of the estate duty payable upon and in respect of one moiety of the Howley-park Colliery over which the testatrix had a general power of appointment, and which she specifically appointed and bequeathed by her will, is to be borne by this moiety, or is payable out of the residue of the estate, which the testatrix bequeathed to the Royal Agricultural Institution. If this appointed moiety passed to the executors of the testatrix "as such" within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, then the duty was properly payable out of residue, and the residuary legatees are not entitled to have the amount so paid recouped out of the specific property. If, however, the appointed moiety did not pass to the executors "as such" within the meaning of section 9, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, then (unless the will contains a direction to the contrary) the duty will be a first charge on the appointed moiety, and must be recouped under sub-section 4 of the same section.

It is clear that the moiety of the colliery in question was "property of which the deceased was at the time of her death competent to dispose" within section 2, sub-section 1, and that estate duty was payable in respect of it. By section 6, sub-section 2, the executor of the deceased shall pay the estate duty in respect of all personal property (wheresoever situate) of which the deceased was competent to dispose at her death. The executors were, therefore, in my opinion, bound to pay the estate duty on this moiety of the colliery. By the same sub-section they are empowered (but not required) to pay the estate duty in respect of any other property (that is, other than personal property of which the deceased was competent to dispose at his death) which by virtue of any testamentary disposition of the deceased is under the control of the executor, or in the case of property not under his control, if the persons accountable for the duty in respect thereof request him to make such payment. A subsequent part of the statute emphasises this distinction; the executor is made accountable for duty which he is required to pay; he is not made accountable for duty which he is only empowered to pay. By section 8, sub-section 3, the executor is (to the best of his knowledge and belief) to specify in appropriate accounts all the property in respect of which estate duty is payable upon the death of the deceased (that is, all property whether real or personal and whether the executor is under any obligation to pay the estate duty or not); the sub-section then provides that the executor shall be accountable for the estate duty in respect of all personal property, wheresoever situate, of which the deceased was competent to dispose at his death; this language is identical with that in section 6, sub-section 2, and undoubtedly extends to and includes all personal property over which the deceased had a general power of appointment; sub-section 3 of section 8 then further provides that the executor shall not be liable for any duty in excess of the assets which he has received as executor, or might but for his own neglect or default have received.

Having regard to the context in which the words are found, following upon an enactment making the executor accountable for estate duty in respect of appointed personal estate, I am of opinion that he is protected from liability, not in respect of all appointed funds (upon the ground that he does not receive them "as executor"), but only in respect of personal estate, whether the testator's own property or subject to his general power of appointment, in excess of the amount received, or which but for wilful default he might have received. In other words, that the expression "the assets which he has received as executor, or might . . . have received," includes appointed personalty as well as the testator's own personalty.

In In re Hoskin's Trusts, 25 W. R. 779, 6 Ch. D. 281, at p. 283, it was treated by the Court of Appeal as established beyond all question—that where a feme covert, or any other person having a general power of appointment over a fund of personalty, makes an appointment of the fund by will and appoints an executor, the executor when he has proved the will is entitled to receive the appointed fund. Nor is it now open to dispute that the executor is bound to apply the fund as assets—equitable assets—in the payment of debts; and on taking the accounts against an executor under a creditor's administration judgment, the executor would be disallowed and held personally responsible for any payments to beneficiaries out of the appointed funds, if the creditors remained unpaid. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that where an executor receives personal property appointed in pursuance of a general power, this property constitutes "assets which he has received as executor" within the meaning of section 8, sub-section 3. A different construction of this sub-section would lead to a very curious result; an executor who received the appointed funds would be "accountable" for the estate duty, but yet not "liable," as the assets would not be received by him as executor; and the person to whom the property passed for a beneficial interest in possession would not be liable for the duty under sub-section 4 of section 8, because the executor would be "accountable." If, then, funds, appointed under a general power, received by the executor are "assets which he has received as executor," within the meaning of section 8, sub-section 3, it cannot properly be held that the same assets constitute "property which does not pass to the executor as such" within the meaning of section 9, sub-section 1. Assets which a person rightfully receives as executor are, in my opinion, assets which pass to him as executor, within the meaning of this statute, even although not strictly speaking assets to which he is entitled virtute officii.

There are conflicting decisions of judges of first instance upon this question of the incidence of estate duty in respect of appointed funds. Kekewich, J., in In re Treasure, Wild v Stanham, 48 W. R. 696, [1900] 2 Ch. 648, and In re Maddock, Llewelyn v. Washington, 50 W. R. 54, [1901] 2 Ch. 372, and Byrne, J., in In re Power, In re Stone, Ackworth v. Stone, 49 W. R. 678, [1901] 2 Ch. 659, take one view; Buckley, J., in In re Moore, Moore v. Moore, 49 W. R. 373, [1901] 1 Ch. 691, and in In re Dixon, Penfold v. Dixon, 50 W. R. 203, [1902] 1 Ch. 248 takes the other view. I have, under these circumstances, to express my own opinion. Although personal property subject to a general power of appointment, does not pass to an executor by a will containing nothing more than the appointment of an executor (In re Davies's Trusts, 20 W. R. 165, L. R. 13 Eq. 163, at p. 166, In re Thurston, 34 W. R. 528, 32 Ch. D. 508), and in some cases where a power is executed by will and an executor appointed, it has been considered clear that the appointed property did not pass to the executor virtute officii, yet I am of opinion that where such appointed property is received by an executor, he receives it "as executor," and it passes to him "as such" within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894. The result is that in the present case the duty is payable out of residue and not out of the appointed funds.

I am also of opinion that the will itself imposes this duty upon the residue. The testatrix owned one moiety of the colliery and had a general power of appointment over the other moiety. By her will she directed her trustees to pay her funeral and testamentary expenses and just debts, and, after specifically disposing of the Howley-park Colliery and certain lands and hereditaments in the township of Morley, she gave, devised, and bequeathed all her residuary real and personal estate, whatsoever and wheresoever. Her residuary estate is what remains after satisfying the previous dispositions made by her will, one of them being the direction to pay her testamentary expenses. The estate duty is a testamentary expense, as was decided by Kekewich, J., in In re Clemow, Yeo v. Clemow, 48 W. R. 541, [1900] 2 Ch. 182. It is conceded that the estate duty on the moiety of the colliery which belonged to the testatrix absolutely must fall on residue, and I am of opinion that the duty on both moieties is covered by the direction in the will to pay the testamentary expenses, and that, according to the true construction of the will, testamentary expenses fall on residue.

An estate pur autre vie was conveyed to A., his heirs and assigns. By his will A. devised the said estate to trustees in trust for the use of B. when he should attain the age of twenty-five, or at such earlier period as the trustees should decide upon. The estate vested in B., who subsequently died intestate before the cestui que vie.

Held, that, on the death of B. intestate, his interest in the estate pur autre vie devolved upon his administrator as part of his personal estate.

By a settlement dated the 25th of January, 1836, a certain farm, situate at Porchester, in the county of Southampton, was assured upon the death of the survivor of the settlors, William Friend and Elizabeth Friend his wife, and in default of appointment, to the use of trustees, their heirs and assigns, upon trust to receive the rents and divide the same equally between the six daughters of Richard Marden Morey (a brother of the said Elizabeth Friend) and the son of R. M. Morey, and their respective assigns, share and share alike as tenants in common for their respective lives. And after the respective deaths of the said six daughters and the son of R. M. Morey as they should respectively die upon trust to convey the share of such one or more of them so dying unto and equally between their children on attaining the age of twenty-one years and their respective heirs and assigns as tenants in common per stirpes. And it was provided that in default of issue taking vested interests of any of the six daughters and son of the said R. M. Morey, then the share whether original or accruing of him or her so dying in the said hereditaments and the rents thereof should go to the survivors and survivor and their, his, or her issue respectively.

The said Elizabeth Friend died on the 23rd of September, 1836, without having exercised her power of appointment, and the said William Friend died on the 29th of September, 1836, leaving the six daughters and James White Morey, the son of R. M. Morey, him surviving.

By indenture of the 29th of November, 1848, the said James White Morey conveyed to the testator, James Inman, and his heirs and assigns, his undivided seventh share during his life in the said hereditaments.

By his will dated the 15th of November, 1852, James Inman devised (subject to a life estate in favour of his wife Mary Inman) his share in the said hereditaments and in the rents thereof, which he purchased from J. W. Morey, unto his trustees upon trust to receive his share of the rents and apply the same in the manner thereinafter directed. And upon further trusts if the trustees should think it desirable or beneficial to sell his share in the said hereditaments or in the rents thereof and to stand possessed of the proceeds upon trust to invest and apply the interest and until the sale the said share of the rents for the use of his grandson Mathew Inman, the issue of testator's son Mathew Inman and Matilda his wife, in such manner as they should think proper in promoting his education and advancement in life. And upon further trust to pay and transfer the testator's share in the said rents and securities in which the produce thereof should have been invested unto his grandson Mathew Inman as and when he should attain twenty-five years, or if the trustees should deem it desirable to assign the same to him at such earlier period as they might decide on.

The testator, James Inman, died on the 7th of February, 1859, and Mary Inman, his widow, died on the 27th of December, 1870.

Mathew Inman, the grandson, died on the 9th of May, 1886, intestate, and after his death his share of the income was retained by the trustees of the settlement of 1836, and was ultimately represented by the sum of £944 15s. 6d.

J. W. Morey died on the 3rd of August, 1901.

This summons was now brought by the trustees of the will of James Inman to have it determined whether upon the true construction of the will the interests in the nature of an estate pur autre vie of the testator in the above hereditaments devised by the testator to his trustee upon trusts in favour of his grandson Mathew Inman, devolved upon the death of the said Mathew Inman intestate on the heir-at-law of the said Mathew Inman or how otherwise.

W. R. Sheldon, for the plaintiffs, argued that the interest of Mathew Inman in the estate pur autre vie devolved upon his administrator as part of his personal estate. There was no authority in England for the statement that once you had an estate pur autre vie it remained of the same quality however far it descended. The Irish cases might not agree, but they were not binding authorities on an English court. The case of King v. King, [1899] 1 Ir R. 30, was inconsistent with the decision in Earl of Mount Cashell v. More-Smyth, [1896] A. C. 158, 44 W. R. Dig. 11.

Counsel also referred to the cases of Reynolds v. Wright, 9 W. R. 211, 2 De G. F. & J. 590; Doe d. Blake v. Luxton, 6 T. R. 289.

Theobald, K.C., and G. H Paice, for the defendant, argued that the intestate's interests devolved upon his heir-at-law, and referred to the cases of Wall v. Byrne, 2 Jo. & Lat. 118, and King v. King.

Counsel distinguished the cases of Philpotts v. James, 3 Dougl. 425, and Doe d. Lewis v. Lewis, 9 M. & W. 662.

SWINFEN HADY, J.—The question which arises on the present summons is whether the interest of James Inman in the nature of an estate pur autre vie in certain hereditaments devolved on the death of Mathew Inman intestate upon the heir-at-law of Mathew Inman as special occupant or upon his administrator as part of the intestate's personal estate. [His lordship then stated the facts, and proceeded:] It is not disputed that the effect of the testator's will was to pass to the testator's grandson, Mathew Inman, the whole of the estate pur autre vie. But it is contended on the part of Mr. Theobald that it passed to Mathew Inman as freehold so as to have the same legal effect as if devised to him and his heirs; and so on the death of Mathew Inman intestate his heir-at-law was entitled to enter as special occupant. On the other hand, it is contended that there is nothing on the face of the will to show that the heir takes as special occupant, and therefore the rule provides that the interest passes to the executor or administrator of Mathew Inman by virtue of the Wills Act (7 Will. 4 and 1 Vic. c. 26), s. 6. Now, before the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), an estate pur autre vie was not devisable. Then the Statute of Frauds for the first time made estates pur autre vie devisable, but the heir took before the statute as well as afterwards, when he took as special occupant, as such and not by descent, as is clearly shown in Lord Kenyon's judgment in Doe d. Blake v. Luxton, 6 T. R., at p. 291: "These questions on estates pur autre vie do not frequently arise. Such estates certainly are not estates of inheritance: they have been sometimes called, though improperly, descendible freeholds, because the heir-at-law does not take by descent. If an action at common law had been brought against the heir on the bond of his ancestor, he might have pleaded riens per descent, for these estates were not liable to the debts of the ancestor before the Statute of Frauds." So that if the heir entered as special occupant he was not liable for the debts of his ancestor—i.e., for such of the debts of his ancestor as he would have been liable for according to the then state of the law in case he took assets by descent. But he would have been liable for those debts of his ancestor that were secured by bond or covenant expressly provided for by the Act. Section 12 of the Statute of Frauds enacted "that any estate pur autre vie shall be devisable by will . . . and if no such devise thereof be made, the same shall be chargeable in the hands of the heir if it shall come to him by reason of a special occupancy, as assets by descent, as in case of lands in fee simple." I read that as meaning not that before the statute the heir would take those assets as assets by descent, but that after the passing of the Act they should be liable as assets as if they had been assets by descent in the same manner as in the case of lands in fee simple.

Then the statute goes on to say "and in case there be no special occupant thereof it shall go to executors or administrators of the party that had the estate thereof by virtue of the grant, and shall be assets in their hands." Then the subsequent question arose as to whether after the payment of the debts of the intestate the executors took beneficially, and that matter was dealt with by the statute of George II. (14 Geo. 2, c. 20), under which they took after paying the debts for the benefit of the next-of-kin. Now, these provisions are substantially reenacted by the Wills Act, so that I am of opinion that it is not sufficient to show that the intestate Mathew Inman took the whole of the estate pur autre vie which the testator, James Inman, had. It may be that he took it in a certain sense to descend, but the heir-at-law would not have taken it by descent; the heir-at-law must take as a special occupant, and if he has not a sufficient interest under the will as a special occupant then it goes to the executor or administrator. Now, it has been contended on the authority of cases in Ireland that where the whole of the estate pur autre vie is vested by terms of the grant or devise in an intestate, then the heir is entitled to take, and in any case it is said that the cases of Wall v. Byrne and King v. King do go that length. The first was decided before the recent decision of Earl of Mount Cashell v. More-Smyth, but King v. King was decided after.

As decisions of the courts in Ireland they are not binding on me, and if they conflict with English decisions I should decline to follow them, and therefore proceed to consider the English cases. In the case of Philpotts v. James Butler, J.'s, view was that the plaintiff took as heirs of a descendible freehold. In the case of Doe d. Lewis v. Lewis, Baron Parke said: "Now here there is no special occupant, the title of the first lessee having been put an end to by the will, the land has been held under a tenancy pur autre vie to W. J. Lewis, the son, and his assigns; and as he died without creating any assigns, the property goes to his personal representative." Mr. Theobald sought to distinguish this case, but in my opinion the result would have been the same had the word assigns not been mentioned, and, consequently, there being no special occupant, the whole would have gone to the executor.

Therefore, as it appears to me, I have to choose between the Irish and English cases, because certainly the recent case in the House of Lords (Earl of Mount Cashell v. More-Smyth) does not throw any doubt whatsoever on the English decisions. In my opinion there is nothing whatever on the face of the will in question to entitle the heir to claim as special occupant. The whole of the interest is given to Mathew Inman, and there the matter is left at large. Under the Wills Act, as there is no special occupant, the property goes to the administrator. If that were all, I am of opinion that the administrator would be entitled to take. But it is argued further that the administrator would only take from the date of the grant of administration, and that there was an interval between the day of death and the day on which administration was granted. I understand that no legal personal representative has yet been actually constituted. But there is no occupancy here. The trustees under the original deed of 1836 were entitled to hold and enjoy the property, and to receive rents, and, in my opinion, they held a one-seventh share of the rents, and still hold from the date of the death of Mathew Inman in 1896 in trust for the legal personal representative of Mathew Inman when constituted as part of his personal estate.

ORMSKIRK UNION v. CHORLTON UNION. (a.)

Poor law — Settlement — Irremovability — Patient in hospital—Poor Law Removal Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 66), s. 1—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 34.

The word "hospital" in section 1 of the Poor Law Removal Act includes any institution where patients are medically treated. Therefore where an epileptic was sent by his friends to a home, whose object was to cure patients mainly by outdoor exercise and recreation,

Held, that it was a "hospital" within the meaning of the section, and that residence for seven years in the home did not give the patient a settlement in the union where the home was situate.

Case stated by consent and by order of Bucknill, J., in pursuance of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

The special case set out the following facts:

A pauper named H. Coxon was in 1893 sent to a home for epileptics in a township in the Ormskirk Union and remained there for seven years. He then became an inmate of the respondent's workhouse.

On the 10th of January, 1902, an order was made by two justices adjudging his settlement to be in the union of Ormskirk by reason of his seven years' residence there, and ordering his removal there. The home in question was founded by one Henry Cox and endowed by him with the sum of £2,000. Its object was to secure epileptics a home where they would have the benefits of hospital treatment as well as a healthy outdoor life and suitable recreations. Its property consisted of buildings and five acres of land. There was attached to the home a large medical staff. The average number of patients was 120, who were divided into three classes, the third and largest, to which Coxon belonged, paying 7s. 6d. a week, this sum being provided by his relatives.

By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1 it is provided as follows: "That from and after the passing of the Act no person shall be removed from any parish in which any such person shall have resided for five years next before the application for such warrant: Provided always that the time during which such person shall be . . . a patient in a hospital shall be for all purposes excluded in the computation of time hereinbefore mentioned."

And by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34, it is provided as follows: "Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish in such manner and under such circumstances as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein."

F. F. Byrne, for the appellant union.—The question here is, was the home "a hospital" within the meaning of the Act? A hospital is any place where patients receive medical or surgical treatment, and the Maghull Home was a hospital in that sense, and the fact that the patients or their relatives paid subscriptions does not change its character.

Brooke Little, for the respondent union.—The word hospital implies a place entirely or mainly for medical treatment, and does not apply to a home of this description, where the central idea was to cure patients by rational work and recreation. The words "confined in a hospital" must imply some element of compulsion.

He referred to St. Olave's Union v. Canterbury Union, 45 W. R. 302, 529 [1897] 1 Q. B. 438, 682.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is an important point on which we have not had the assistance of authorities. The question here is, not if the pauper has acquired a settlement in the Chorlton Union but whether we ought, on the facts before us, to order him to be removed to the Ormskirk Union. That depends on the terms of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1. I cannot lay down exhaustively the reasons for that section, but speaking broadly it provides that residence for certain specified objects shall not count towards the period of residence necessary to acquire a settlement. In the present case, the man's friends sent him to this home, where he was treated by a competent medical staff. Speaking for myself, I think that the words of this section did not exclude this class of institution. It would be narrowing the word "hospital" down too much to say that a home of this character was not a hospital. There are many undoubted hospitals which receive paying patients. I do not think that there is sufficient for us to order the removal of the pauper.

WILLS, J.—I agree. It is true that the man went voluntarily to the home, but there is in all such cases an element of compulsion. It seems to me that the resident of this man in the home differed from the kind of residence meant by the Act, which is the residence of a man pursuing the ordinary vocations of life. It would, in my opinion, be unfair to the unions where they are situate to make residence in these large homes residence for the purpose of a settlement.

Rule calling on the governor of his Majesty's prison at Holloway to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue directed to him to bring up one Guiseppe Siletti before the court.

The rule nisi for habeas corpus had been obtained at the instance of one Siletti, who had been committed to Holloway prison to await extradition to Belgium.

The ground upon which the rule had been granted was that since the magistrate's decision evidence had been forthcoming which might have affected his mind in favour of the prisoner.

At the hearing before the magistrate the evidence as to the identity of Siletti as the person who was guilty of the alleged fraud—taking property by a trick—in Belgium, consisted chiefly of a photograph, which was sworn to by the witnesses as being the photograph of the person who had committed the fraud.

Since the order of committal was made, however, Siletti had brought forward certain documents for the purpose of showing that at the time when the fraud was committed he was serving in the Italian army, and did not obtain his discharge until some ten days after the fraud was committed in Belgium.

There admittedly was a question to be investigated before the warrant of the secretary of state was drawn up handing over the prisoner to the authorities for trial in Belgium and it was not contended that this might not be a case of mistaken identity.

The prosecution had therefore communicated this circumstance to the Belgium authorities, and a telegram had been received from the Belgium embassy to the effect that they were getting witnesses over who would be able to put the question beyond doubt as to whether there had been a mistake as to the identity of the prisoner.

Meanwhile Siletti had obtained the rule which now came on for argument.

By section 10 of the Extradition Act, 1870, it is provided that "in the case of a fugitive criminal accused of an extradition crime, if the foreign warrant authorizing the arrest of such criminal is duly authenticated, and such evidence is produced as (subject to the provisions of this Act) would, according to the law of England, justify the committal for trial of the prisoner if the crime of which he is accused had been committed in England, the police magistrate shall commit him to prison, but otherwise shall order him to be discharged.

"If the magistrate commits such criminal to prison he shall commit him to the Middlesex house of detention or to some other prison in Middlesex, there to await the warrant of a secretary of state for his surrender, and shall forthwith send to a secretary of state a certificate of the committal and such report upon the case as he may think fit."

Section 11: "If the police magistrate commits a fugitive criminal to prison, he shall inform such criminal that he will not be surrendered until after the expiration of fifteen days and that he had a right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus.

"Upon the expiration of the said fifteen days, or if a writ of habeas corpus is issued, after the decision of the court upon the return to the writ, as the case may be, or after such further period as may be allowed in either case by a secretary of state, it shall be lawful for the secretary of state, by warrant under his hand and seal, to order the fugitive criminal (if not delivered on the decision of the court) to be surrendered to such person as may in his opinion be duly authorized to receive the fugitive criminal by the foreign state from which the requisition for the surrender proceeded, and such fugitive criminal shall be surrendered accordingly."

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G. (H. Sutton with him), for the Crown.—The rule should be discharged, for this is practically an application for the court to review, and if it thinks fit reverse, the decision of the magistrate upon the production of evidence not forthcoming at the hearing before the magistrate. But the court has no jurisdiction to interfere with the order of the magistrate sending a man to prison on such a charge as this except under circumstances which do do not exist here. Once a magistrate has committed the man to prison, the order for his being handed over to the Belgium authorities or discharged rests entirely with the Home Secretary. The court can only review a magistrate's decision where there is a question of jurisdiction involved—for instance, if the offence charged was alleged to be of a political character or it was said that the man was a British subject: Guerin's case, 37 W. R. 269 60 L. T. Rep. 538; Castioni's case, 39 W. R. 202, [1891] 1 Q. B. 149. In Castioni's case the observations of Denman and Hawkins, JJ., relied on by the other side, which appear to suggest that the court might review on grounds other than that of the questioned jurisdiction of the magistrate, are merely obiter, and are opposed to the decisions in Arton's case, 44 W. R. 351, [1896] 1 Q. B. 509; Ex parte Huguet, 29 L. T. Rep. 41; and In re Meunier, 42 W. R. 637, [1894] 2 Q. B. 415.

H. G. Rooth, in support of the rule.—The prisoner's discharges prove that at the time of the crime he was serving in the Italian Army, and great injustice would be done if the order for committal stands unreviewed. [Sir R. B. Finlay.—No, it is not imperative on the secretary of state to make the order, and I will see that the prisoner does not suffer if the rule is discharged.] The court has power to review the evidence upon which a man was committed by the magistrate to take his trial abroad. [BIGHAM, J.—What is your authority for saying so?] By section 11 of the Extradition Act, 1870, the accused can apply for a writ of habeas corpus as of right, and therefore the Act which gives him that right must by implication give the court power to adjudicate upon the writ. That would appear to be the view of Denman and Hawkins, JJ., from the observations they made in their judgments in Castioni's case. That case was decided in 1891 and has not been dissented from, nor has the point been directly raised since in another case. The rule ought, therefore, to be made absolute.

BIGHAM, J.—The rule, I think, must be discharged. The accused in this case has the right which all persons accused before a magistrate have—the right to apply for a habeas corpus. The Extradition Act does not give him that right. He has it already at common law. The Extradition Act merely gives him the right to be informed of the fact that he may exercise the power of applying for a habeas corpus if he chooses to do so. Then, if he applies for a habeas corpus and obtains a rule, the question arises, what points may be taken upon the argument of the rule? For my part I think the only question that this court can entertain is the question of jurisdiction, and applying that observation to this particular Act, all that the accused person may say is that the crime with which he was charged was not a crime within the meaning of the Extradition Act—i.e., that it did not come within the class of offences contemplated, or that it was an offence of a political character, and therefore was outside the Act altogether. He may also say that there was absolutely no evidence upon which the magistrate could exercise his discretion as to whether he would commit or not. These things he may say; but I am clearly of opinion that there is one thing he cannot say, and that is that there is evidence one way or the other, and that this court ought to enter into the consideration as to whether the magistrate has exercised his discretion as to it properly. That he cannot say. It is said that the judgments in the case of In re Castioni show that the court can enter into the question of the weight of evidence and can review the decision of the magistrate. For my part I do not think that the learned judges in that case meant to say anything of the kind. If they mean to say that, I am of opinion that their judgment in that respect was obiter and was contrary to a long course of decisions which have been brought by the Attorney-General to our attention. Therefore I think that this rule ought to be discharged.

DARLING, J.—I concur. With regard to the statement that it is only upon questions of jurisdiction that this court can interfere, I think jurisdiction is not quite the right word to use. It is used by my brother Bigham, as I understand it, to cover a good deal more than is usually meant when we use the word jurisdiction in ordinary cases. It is used to cover want of jurisdiction in the magistrate—that is, want of that which would properly be called jurisdiction. It is also used to cover the case of there being no evidence against the accused at all; and where there was, in the opinion of this court, no evidence against the accused, not even a primâ facie case against him, in such a case as that this court would go into the matter, and on ascertaining that there was no evidence would make the rule absolute for a habeas corpus. The argument in support of the rule which we have heard comes to this—that under this statute we have to discharge an absolutely different duty from that which we should discharge on the argument of a rule for a habeas corpus applied for by a person in respect of committal for a crime committed in England. I do not see anything in the Extradition Act to support that contention. It may be that it might be necessary to go into fresh evidence in some conceivable case, because in these extradition cases it may be necessary to apply foreign law as well as English law, for this reason, that it has to be ascertained that the offence charged is an offence by the law of England as well as by the law of the foreign country which applies for the extradition. If the proposition of counsel for the applicant is carefully looked at it comes to this—that the court has jurisdiction to consider the question as though it was an application for a new trial on the ground that the finding of the magistrate was against the weight of evidence. In my opinion to do so would be to do what the courts have never yet done. For myself I do not think we are overruling what was said by Denman and Hawkins, JJ., in the case of Re Castioni, but if what we are are now deciding necessitates our differing from that case, I think it is because that case necessitates our doing so. I still, however, in that case should hold the opinion which my brother Bigham has expressed, that if our decision is in conflict with that case, then it seems to me that we have authority for what we are now deciding in the passage which was cited to us in Arton's case, where Lord Russell, L.C.J., said: "We are not a court of appeal on questions of fact from the magistrate. We have only to see that he had such evidence before him as gave him authority and jurisdiction to commit." Here it is plain the magistrate had authority to commit. It is not alleged that he had not. He had jurisdiction to commit, and we have only to see whether he had such evidence before him as justified him in exercising that authority and jurisdiction. It is really not contended that he had not. What is contended is that if he had had something else before him, then he would not have committed. It seems to me that, when the matter is put in that way, it is perfectly plain that this rule ought to be discharged.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 19, 20.

BOOTH v. NEW AFRIKANDER GOLD MINING CO. (a.)

Company—Sale to intermediary company—Resale to new company— Commission— Underwriting agreement— Offer to public—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 8 (1) (2).

A company sold its undertaking on the terms that the purchasers should form a new company to repurchase the property. The consideration for the sale to the purchasers was to be shares in the new company, and the consideration for the resale to the new company was to be the same number of shares together with a sum in cash. The purchasers were to take up all shares that were not taken up by members of the old company.

Held, that the proposed cash payment was a payment by way of "commission, discount, or allowance . . . in consideration of . . . subscribing . . . for . . . shares" of the new company within sub-section 2 of section 8 of the Companies Act, 1900, and that as such payment was not authorized by the articles of the new company it was not validated by sub-section 1 of the same section.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J.

As the action was originally constituted, the plaintiff, who held 1,000 fully paid up shares in the New Afrikander Gold Mining Co. (Limited), applied for an injunction to restrain the carrying out of an agreement for the sale of the business undertaking and assets of the company, on the ground that such agreement provided for the payment of commission for underwriting shares in violation of the provisions of section 8 (2) of the Companies Act, 1900.

The original defendants to the action were the New Afrikander Co., its liquidator, and the Associated Guarantors (Limited). The capital of the New Afrikander Co. was £250,000 in £1 shares, of which 205,014 had been issued and were fully paid up.

The agreement in question was made between the New Afrikander Gold Mining Co. and the Associated Guarantors, and was dated the 11th of July, 1902. It provided for the sale of the undertaking, business, and assets of the New Afrikander Co. to the Associated Guarantors. The purchasers undertook to form a new company, which has since been incorporated under the name of the Afrikander Gold Mining Co. (1902), to repurchase the subject-matter of the sale on the terms provided in a draft agreement scheduled to the first agreement. The Associated Guarantors undertook to procure that the new company would allot such number of its shares, to be of the value of £1 each with 12s. paid thereon, up to 205,014 as the old company or its liquidator should require, to satisfy all liabilities of the old company, including the costs of a proposed liquidation. Shareholders who refused to take shares were to be entitled to no compensation. All shares allotted to the old company or its liquidator which members of the old company declined to accept were to be taken up by the Associated Guarantors.

The scheduled agreement fixed the price to be paid by the new company to the Associated Guarantors at £205,014 in £1 shares, with 12s. paid up, out of a total of 250,000 of such shares, and £12,300 in cash.

The plaintiff asserted that the provision for this cash payment was in effect a provision for payment of commission by the proposed new company, and was obnoxious to section 8 of the Companies Act, 1900, and that it invalidated the whole agreement.

Swinfen Eady, J., was of opinion that the agreement did provide for the payment of an illegal commission; and, though that payment might be legalized by being authorized in the company's articles of association and disclosed in the prospectus when issued, he could look only at the existing state of things. He thought, therefore, that a case was shown for granting an interlocutory injunction.

The defendant company appealed.

On the hearing of the appeal it was agreed that the appeal should be treated as the trial of the action, and for the purpose of deciding the whole question the new company of 1902 was by consent added as a defendant, and a shareholder of the new company was, also by consent, added as a plaintiff suing on behalf of himself and all other shareholders in the company, and the statement of claim was treated as if amended accordingly.

Haldane, K.C., and Sargent, for the appellants.—This case is one of a sale and re-sale. If the view taken by Swinfen Eady, J., is correct, no sale can be made for shares if there is any consideration added to induce the vendor to the company to accept payment in shares. The present transaction being a sale is not one of underwriting at all. Consequently section 8 of the Companies Act, 1900, does not apply. But if it should be held to apply, then it is submitted that this payment is protected by sub-section 1 of section 8.

They referred to Hilder v. Dexter, [1902] A. C. 474; Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, 34 W. R. 749, 33 Ch. D. 85.

Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, K.C., and Sargent, for the Associated Guarantors.

Eve, K.C., and Beddall, for the plaintiffs.—This is not a simple case of sale and re-sale. The Associated Guarantors cannot deal with the property except in a certain way. They are bound to contribute the 8s. per share so far as it is not contributed elsewhere. The cash payment is a payment to them for doing this, and is illegal by reason of sub-section 2 of section 8 of the Companies Act, 1900.

Sargent, in reply, cited Postlethwaite v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co., 38 W. R. 246, 43 Ch. D. 452.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case, if it were possible, having regard to the alteration made in the whole question, I should like to say that I affirm the decision of Swinfen Eady, J.; but, really, the matter as it now comes before us is so utterly different from that which came before Swinfen Eady, J., that I do not know that the word "affirm" would be appropriate. In these circumstances I think perhaps the better way of expressing myself is to say that as the claim is now framed, having regard to the addition of a plaintiff, the addition of a defendant, and the alteration of the statement of claim, I think that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction. Having said that, I will state shortly what the nature of the case is.

There was the 1898 company, which wanted £65,000 more capital. It did not see its way to getting the capital, and the suggestion was made that there should be formed a new company, and the shareholders in the old company should be entitled to take shares in the new company with a liability of 8s. per share, 12s. being paid. Then it was suggested, and very properly suggested, that shareholders do not like to come in in that sort of undertaking unless they are sure that the whole of the shares thus offered are, somehow or other, going to be taken up. It would obviously be a rash thing to come in and take your proportion of shares if it were likely that a great number of shares would not only not be taken by your co-shareholders in the old company, but also not by anybody else. In those circumstances it was proposed that the taking up of the shares in the new company—205,000 odd shares—should be made a certainty. One very natural way of making that a certainty would have been by getting gentlemen of position and solvency to come in and guarantee the taking up of the whole lot of these shares. Of course, people will not do that without being paid a commission for the risks that they are undertaking, and very often the risk is of such a nature that the ordinary brokerage will not at all meet the case. Now it has by the 8th section of the Act of 1900 become lawful on the conditions therein mentioned to pay such a commission; and the question that we have to determine here is whether this particular payment comes as a commission, discount, or allowance within the 2nd sub-section of section 8; and supposing that we do so hold, then, we have to go on and say whether this payment would come within the 1st sub-section?

As the action was originally brought it was an action by a Mr. Booth, a shareholder in the 1898 company, and he wanted an injunction granted which very probably through the absence of the new company he was not entitled to have; but since everybody here is anxious to get a decision on this section, a shareholder in the new company whose assent it has been undertaken shall be given in writing has been added as a plaintiff and the new company has been added as a defendant—that is, the 1902 company—and the claim is to be treated as if it included amongst other things a claim by the plaintiff, who is a member of the 1902 company, on behalf of himself and the other members of the company against that company or its officers to restrain them from paying out the sum of money which is the subject-matter of this discussion—that is, the £12,000 odd.

The first question that we have to determine here is whether this particular payment comes within the 2nd sub-section—that is, comes within the prohibition. Now I have no manner of doubt that it does. There is a sum of £12,300 and it is being paid by the new company, and being paid by the new company out of the capital which is raised at the time of the formation of this company by way of commission to certain persons or a certain company. I am not sure whether it is the intermediary company or the guarantors—but it is really paid to the intermediaries in consequence of their undertaking to take up so many of a block of shares allotted to the liquidator of the old company as the members of that old company decline to accept in specie; and whatever the amounts may be which are rejected in that way the guarantors undertake to take those shares, and this £12,000 odd is to be paid to them in consideration for so doing. The question is, whether or not that payment comes within the prohibition in the 2nd sub-section of section 8. I have already said I think it does. I think one only requires the facts to be thus stated to show clearly that it is a payment by this new company of "commission to persons in consideration of their subscribing."

The real ground upon which it is suggested that this does not come within sub-section 2 is that the persons to whom the money is paid are really, it is said, purchasers, and the sum of money which they are to receive is not commission, but is the profit upon a resale to the 1902 company. I think if one looks at the facts of this case it is impossible not to see that this is not a profit upon resale, for there is in substance no resale at all. The guarantors—the intermediaries—never had any right or power to distribute the assets in any way but by assigning them—the subject-matter of the purchase that is—to the new company to be formed, and when one looks at the difference of the considerations between the so-called intermediate sale and purchase and the sale to and purchase by the 1902 company, I cannot doubt that the £12,000 odd was commission, and really a commission for underwriting. I think, therefore, this payment clearly falls within sub-section 2.

Then it is said that it is saved by sub-section 1. The words of the sub-section are: "Upon any offer of shares to the public for subscription it shall be lawful for a company to pay a commission to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any shares in the company or procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any shares in the company if the payment of the commission and the amount or rate per cent. of the commission paid or agreed to be paid are respectively authorized by the articles of association and disclosed in the prospectus, and the commission paid or agreed to be paid does not exceed the amount or rate so authorized." Now, taking that sub-section line by line, in my judgment there has never been here any offer of shares to the public for subscription. I do not think that these shares which were agreed to be allotted by the 1902 company to the liquidator of the old company for distribution amongst the old shareholders were in any sense offered to the public. I agree that the payment was a payment of a commission to persons agreeing to take up these shares, but that is not justified in every case. It is only authorized in cases where the payment of the commission and the amount or rate per cent. of the commission paid or agreed to be paid are respectively authorized by the articles of association or disclosed in the prospectus.

Now, I am of opinion that the payment of this £12,000 odd is not authorized by the articles of association. The article which it is said authorizes this is the 9th article. That article says: "If the company at any time shall offer any of its shares to the public for subscription the directors may pay a commission at a rate not exceeding 50 per cent. to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any shares in the company, or procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any shares in the company."

First, I doubt very much whether there has ever been an offer to the public within the meaning of this article 9. But, even assuming that there has been, it is only authorized by article 9 when such commission takes the form of a rate not exceeding 50 per cent. In my judgment this agreement—the agreement which appears in clause 5 of the scheduled agreement, which has now, I understand, been executed by the new company—does not come within the terms of that article. Clause 5 runs, "as the balance of the consideration for the said sale"—that is, the sale by the intermediary to the new company—"and purchase, the purchasing company shall pay to the vendors the sum of £12,300 in cash." That amount of £12,300 in cash is exactly what I think is contemplated by the words of sub-section 1 of section 8, and the amount and the rate may either or both of them be authorized by the articles, but it is only in so far as the articles authorize and determine the form in which the commission may be paid that advantage can be taken of sub-section 1. In my judgment this amount of £12,300 mentioned in clause 5 of the scheduled contract does not fall within the word "rate" as it is employed in article 9 of the articles of association.

Having said that, I really do not know that there is anything more that it is needful to say here, but I should like to mention two points that were made upon the question whether the whole agreement, having regard to the memorandum of association, was or was not ultra vires. Speaking for myself, so far as the provisions contained in the memorandum are concerned, I am inclined to think that the sale of the undertaking and the payment for it in partly-paid shares does fall within those provisions; but I have not really, in the view that I have taken of this case, to decide that, and I do not propose to decide it. All that I have to decide is, first, does this payment fall within sub-section 2 of section 8? Yes it does. Therefore it is prohibited unless it is saved by sub-section 1. Is it saved by sub-section 1? I think not. I have already been through the section line by line and pointed out the respect in which I think this payment does not fall within the provisions of sub-section 1. I think, therefore, that an injunction will now have to be granted.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. There are really two points which have been seriously argued and arise in this case. The first is whether the sum of £12,000 odd which is mentioned in what I may call the scheduled agreement is a payment of capital money by way of commission, discount, or allowance to any person in consideration of subscribing or agreeing to subscribe for shares in the company. That must in each case be a question of fact, and I do not, in coming to the decision which I am now giving, in any way affirm the proposition which was put forward in the course of the argument, that if the decision of the learned judge in the court below is upheld it would be impossible to make a sale of property partly in consideration of shares and partly in consideration of cash. The question in each case whether the case is or is not in the nature of a commission must, in my judgment, be a question of fact, and I have simply to say in the present case that, reading the agreement between the company of 1898 and the Associated Guarantors and the further agreement—which has now become an actual agreement—in the scheduled form annexed to that agreement by the light of the circular of the 14th of July, 1902, which is in evidence in this case, I come to the conclusion as a matter of fact that the payment of the £12,000 odd is a commission within the terms of sub-section 2 of section 8 of the Act of 1900.

Now, that being so, it follows that the new company cannot pay any portion of that sum unless they bring themselves within the provisions of sub-section 1 of the same section. That sub-section only applies upon an offer of shares to the public for subscription—which means, as it appears to me, an offer by the new company of shares to the public for subscription. I think that is the meaning of the section, but in any case, if it were doubtful, one of the conditions of the validity of the payment is that the payment of the commission and the amount or rate per cent. of the commission paid or agreed to be paid are authorized by the articles of association. The articles of association, as has been already pointed out, only authorize the payment if the company shall at any time offer any of its shares to the public for subscription. The offer, therefore, either by the terms of the statute itself or by the terms of this article, must be an offer by the company. At the present moment really no offer has been made of any kind; but there has been put in evidence the terms of a proposed offer which has not yet been actually made. I assume that what is contemplated by the new company is that an offer shall be made on the terms of that document. Then if my opinion is asked whether that is such an offer as is contemplated by the articles of association of the company, I say no. Plainly upon the terms of that document that offer is not one made by the new company, but an offer by the liquidator of the old company in his right as liquidator and as dealing with the assets of the old company. In my judgment that is not such an offer as is authorized by sub-section 1. It does not follow, however, that the company may not be able in some shape or form to bring themselves within sub-section 1. In the first place it is possible to alter the articles of association and to frame them in a different manner. It is also possible for them to make their offer when they do make it in a different form from that contemplated by the circular which has been put in evidence. It seems to me, therefore, that in any injunction that is granted there ought to be an opportunity left to the new company of considering their position and taking such steps as may bring them within sub-section 1 of section 8.

Those are the two principal questions which have been dealt with. A third question, which is one of some importance, has also been argued, which the Lord Justice has briefly mentioned. I do not propose to go into it at this period of the day at length, but simply to state that in my judgment the proposed sale of the undertaking of the old company in consideration of partly paid up shares of the new company is not beyond the powers of the old company as defined by the memorandum of association.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and at this hour I do not propose to occupy much time in stating the reasons why I concur. The fundamental point seems to be this: that there are not here two contracts of sale and purchase. There is really only one. There never was a moment of time in which that which has been called the intermediary company could become owner of the property and deal with it as it thought fit, for when you look at the contract you find that the intermediary company could only pay the old company by means of an allotment of shares in the new company, which they could only get by transferring all that they were said themselves to have purchased. In short, I think we are shutting our eyes to all the manifest inferences from the documents and facts if we did not see that this sum of £12,300 was plainly a remuneration for underwriting, and that this arrangement of the intermediary company and the two agreements was merely a complicated and involved mode of receiving the requisite underwriting. If so, it seems to me to follow necessarily that the transaction falls within sub-section 2 of section 8. The £12,300 was the consideration given for subscribing or agreeing to subscribe for shares in the new company.

It only remains, then, to consider whether it falls within the protection conferred by sub-section 1. In my view it does not, and I think so for several reasons. In the first place there is, in my view, here no offer of the shares to the public by anybody. Certainly there is no offer of the shares to the public by the new company, which I think is implied by the language of the section. The only offer, if there be any offer, to the public is by the liquidator of the old company. And, lastly, but by no means of the least importance, this commission is one which is not authorized by the articles of association of the company. The event has not happened in which the payment is authorized and the rate mentioned in the articles has not been complied with.

For all these reasons it seems to me that the payment cannot be justified. It is prohibited by subsection 2; it is not protected by sub-section 1. As to the precise form of relief, the declaration which is suggested is this: "Declare that the contract of the 11th of July, 1902, so far as it provides for the payment of £12,300 by the 1902 company out of the capital money of the company is prohibited by section 8, sub-section 2, of the Companies Act of 1900, but this is without prejudice to such right, if any, as the new company may have to claim the benefit of sub-section 1 of section 8." It will be understood that the court is not expressing any opinion one way or the other whether it can be brought within sub-section 1 of section 8. We wish to keep that open. There will be an injunction on the footing of the declaration, and the defendants must pay the costs of the action.

WRIGHT v. CARTER. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Fiduciary relationship—Gift by client to solicitor—Purchase by solicitor from client—Competent and independent advice—Avoiding deeds as against solicitor and upholding gifts to client's children in same deeds.

W., being at the time under considerable financial liabilities, executed in 1900 two deeds settling property in favour of his children, B. and N., and his solicitor, C. The deeds were settled in C.'s office, but were, before execution, inspected and explained to W. by another solicitor, A. In 1901 W. executed a further deed, by which he assigned all his property in favour of B. and N. and C., they covenanting to pay him an annuity. This deed was prepared by another solicitor, T., but C. made alterations in it before execution.

Held, on the evidence, that W. had not competent and independent advice on either occasion, and that all the deeds must therefore be set aside as against C., and that the deed of 1901 must be set aside altogether; but that the deeds of 1900 ought not to be set aside so far as they conferred benefits on W.'s children, B. and N.

The rule laid down by Lord Eldon in Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292. applied.

Observations of Farwell, J., in Powell v. Powell, [1900] 1 Ch. 243, 48 W. R. Dig. 168, as to the duty of a solicitor advising a client who wishes to confer a gift on a person in a fiduciary relation, approved.

The conditions necessary for the upholding of gifts by a client to his solicitor and purchases by a solicitor from his client respectively, discussed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 46 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 216, 50 W. R. Dig, 176).

The facts were as follows: In and previous to 1898 Colonel Charles Ichabod Wright was a member of a banking firm carrying on business at Nottingham. In 1898 the business was sold by him and the other partners to the Capital and Counties Bank for £110,000. The agreement for purchase, however, gave the Capital and Counties Bank the right to reject any of the assets of the banking business they were purchasing which they should consider to be below the value at which they stood in the books of the firm. Such rejected assets were to be realized; and the amount by which, on realization, they fell short of that value was to be deducted from the purchase-money, while, if the amount of the deficiency exceeded that of the purchase-money, the members of the firm covenanted to make good such excess. The Capital and Counties Bank in fact rejected assets to the value of £350,000, and Colonel Wright and the other partners were thus placed under a heavy liability to them; while Colonel Wright also had personal liabilities under settlements and otherwise. Colonel Wright was possessed of considerable property both at Nottingham and at Torquay, and in 1897 he began to consult on matters of business a solicitor at Torquay named Francis John Carter, who acted as his solicitor in all his affairs from 1899 till the end of August, 1901, and was employed in realizing the assets rejected by the Capital and Counties Bank.

On the 15th of May, 1900, Colonel Wright executed two indentures, both expressed to be made between himself of the one part and Carter and Nevill Wright (a son of Colonel Wright) of the other part. By the first of these indentures Colonel Wright conveyed to Carter and N. Wright all his freehold hereditaments (subject to certain incumbrances) on trust for Colonel Wright for his life and after his death on trust for sale and conversion. He also assigned to them by the same deed the benefit of the purchase agreement with the Capital and Counties Bank, and all the moneys payable to him thereunder and all his share in the rejected assets, on trust for conversion and investment and to pay the income to Colonel Wright for life. At his death certain liabilities of Colonel Wright were to be discharged, and subject thereto the proceeds of sale of all the property comprised in the deed were to be held in trust as to nine-twentieths for Blanche T. Wright (a daughter of Colonel Wright), as to nine-twentieths for N. Wright, and as to the remaining two-twentieths for Carter. By the second indenture of the 15th of May, 1900, Colonel Wright assigned to Carter and N. Wright all the furniture and chattels in and about his houses, on trust to allow him to enjoy the same during his life, and after his death on trust to sell and out of the proceeds to pay £500 to Carter and divide the residue equally between Blanche and Nevill Wright. The provisions in favour of Carter were expressed to be in consideration of services rendered by him.

The drafts of both deeds were prepared in Carter's office, and settled by counsel instructed from Carter's office, but Carter handed them to Colonel Wright in order that he might obtain the advice of another solicitor upon them.

Colonel Wright accordingly took them to another solicitor named Almy, who acted as clerk for a firm of solicitors at Paignton and Torquay, and managed their Torquay office.

Almy explained the deeds to Colonel Wright and also consulted one of the partners in the firm, and finally came to the conclusion that Colonel Wright could safely be advised to execute the deeds. He had, however, no knowledge of the position of Colonel Wright's affairs, or of the exact relationship between him and Carter; nor had he knowledge of the affairs connected with the Capital and Counties Bank.

Early in 1901 the bank commenced proceedings against Colonel Wright in respect of an overdraft which he had guaranteed, and the trustees of a settlement also commenced proceedings against him in respect of a liability under covenant.

In consequence, Carter suggested the execution of a further deed to be prepared by another solicitor named Tarbet, and this was done, and the document executed by Colonel Wright on the 13th of March, 1901.

Tarbet handed it to Carter, who made certain alterations in it, and returned it to him for re-engrossment and re-execution by Colonel Wright, who in fact re-executed it on the 14th of March, and stated that he was under the belief that it was merely a duplicate of the document which he had executed on the 13th of March.

The deed of the 14th of March was made between Colonel Wright of the first part, N. Wright and Carter of the second part, and Blanche Wright, N. Wright, and Carter (therein called "the reversioners") of the third part, and was expressed to be supplemental to the first indenture of the 15th of May, 1900. By it it was declared that in consideration of the joint and several covenants of the reversioners thereinafter contained the trustees should stand possessed of the trust premises comprised in the principal indenture freed and discharged from the trusts declared thereby in favour of Colonel Wright and the reversioners, on trust for the reversioners in equal shares, and Colonel Wright also assigned to N. Wright and Carter all the real and leasehold hereditaments not comprised in the principl indenture to which he was beneficially entitled, all moneys owing on certain mortgages, and the real and leasehold hereditaments comprised in such mortgages, and all personal effects which he Colonel Wright might then be or might thereafter become entitled to or acquire, on the trust declared by the principal indenture and this indenture. The reversioners on their part covenanted to pay Colonel Wright during his life an annuity of £500, to be increased to £800 in a certain event.

Finding that Colonel Wright's furniture was not covered by this document, Carter obtained from him a further document dated the 13th of July, 1901, under which Colonel Wright was to receive £200 out of the sale moneys of the furniture in consideration of his life interest, Carter was to receive £425, and the remainder was to be divided equally between Blanche and N. Wright.

Colonel Wright afterwards commenced this action, claiming that all four deeds should be delivered up to be cancelled, reconveyance of all property passing under them, and an injunction against dealings with such property. He also asked for a receiver and for damages for fraud and conspiracy, but this plea was abandoned at the trial.

Almey and Tarbet were made defendants to the action, but were not parties to the appeal.

Kekewich, J., held that the deeds of May, 1900, were originally voidable by Colonel Wright, but that he had now lost his right to set them aside because by the deed of March, 1901, he had agreed that they should be treated as a nullity, and that the deed of March, 1901, could not be set aside.

Colonel Wright appealed.

Warrington, K.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the appellant.—On the evidence, Carter has not shown that the transaction was a fair one and that the appellant had competent and independent advice. All that Almy and Tarbet did was to say that the appellant knew what he was doing and was not at the time under the actual persuasion or influence of Carter; but the court will presume the existence of influence from the general relation of solicitor and client. Almy and Tarbet had not sufficient knowledge of Colonel Wright's affairs to enable them to advise him. And the advice must be as to whether the gift should be made; here Colonel Wright's mind was already made up. As to the gifts to Blanche and Nevill Wright, the deeds were voluntary ones; and if a voluntary transaction be attacked successfully in any one particular the whole of it falls with that part. If part of it be gone, the transaction cannot be carried out as a whole, and the intention of the settlor cannot be inferred from what remains. The intention of the settlor must be established, or he must consent to the reformation of the settlement. [STIRLING, L.J., referred to Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292.] At all events the deeds must be set aside as against Carter. A solicitor cannot take gifts while the relation subsists.

Badcock, K.C., and Marcy, for Nevill Wright, submitted to any order the court should make, and took no part in the argument.

Warrington, K.C., and Christopher James, for Carter.—It is not illegal for a client to make a gift to his solicitor even during the continuance of the relationship; there is merely a presumption of influence which is rebuttable, and is rebutted by the evidence here. The idea of benefiting Carter originated, not with him, but with Colonel Wright. Colonel Wright had competent and independent advice, and Almy's view of his duty as adviser satisfies the requirements of the law as laid down by Lord Eldon.

Duke, K.C., and Hon. F. Russell, for Blanche Wright.—Because the deeds are bad as against Carter they are not necessarily bad as against Colonel Wright's children. They do not claim through Carter at all; the gifts to them are totally independent gifts from a father to his children.

They cited Bridgman v. Green, 2 Ves., sen. 627.

Warrington, K.C., in reply.—It is not enough for the solicitor to say that another adviser was called in if the relationship of solicitor and client continues. With regard to the deed of March, 1901, Carter has not shown that the transaction was a fair one, and this deed must be set aside altogether.

He referred to Powell v. Powell, [1900] 1 Ch. 243, at pp. 245-6, 48 W. R. Dig. 68, and Harris v. Tremenheere, 15 Ves. 34.

Nov. 5.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., after stating the facts, continued: Dealing first with the two deeds of 1900 alone, I agree with Kekewich, J., that they cannot stand, and I desire to state shortly the ground on which they cannot stand. A great many authorities have been cited, and I do not say that they have not all a direct bearing on the question, but I propose to deal only with certain landmarks in the current of authorities. I will begin with Hatch v. Hatch, decided by Lord Eldon in 1804, and I will read his words in 9 Ves., at p. 296: "This case proves the wisdom of the court in saying it is almost impossible in the course of the connection of guardian and ward, attorney and client, trustee and cestui que trust, that a transaction shall stand, purporting to be bounty for the execution of antecedent duty. There may not be a more moral act, one that would do more credit to a young man beginning the world, or afford a better omen for the future, than if, a trustee having done his duty, the cestui que trust, taking it into his fair, serious, and well-informed consideration, were to do an act of bounty like this. But the court cannot permit it, unless quite satisfied that the act is of that nature, for the reason often given; and recollecting that in discussing whether it is an act of rational consideration, an act of pure volition, uninfluenced, inquiry is so easily baffled in a court of justice that instead of the spontaneous act of a friend, uninfluenced, it may be the impulse of a mind misled by undue kindness or forced by oppression, and the difficulty of getting property out of the hands of the guardian or trustee thus increased; and, therefore, if the court does not watch these transactions with a jealousy almost invincible, in a great majority of cases it will lend its assistance to fraud, where the connection is not dissolved, the account not settled, everything remaining pressing upon the mind of the party, under the care of the guardian or trustee." I do not say that that judgment of Lord Eldon stands in all its stringency at the present day, having regard to the subsequent authorities; but, on the other hand, I do not think that as regards the application of that judgment to the facts of this case it has been altered or modified by the subsequent authorities. Lord Eldon was dealing with the case of a gift, and it is perfectly clear that in the case of a gift the rule applied by courts of equity is much more stringent and absolute than that applied in the case of a bargain or contract. I understand Lord Eldon to be affirming the principle that whenever you have a fiduciary relationship (in the present case that of solicitor and client), the moment the relation is established there arises a presumption of influence which continues as long as the relation continues, or at all events until it can clearly be inferred that the influence has come to an end. I am not saying that the presumption of influence affecting or avoiding the gift is an irrebuttable one, nor do I think Lord Eldon meant to lay down this. I think he only means that as long as the fiduciary relation continues it will be very difficult to support the gift, and the court will refuse to go into nice discussions as to whether the gift—here a gift by a client—was advantageous to the client or not. I do not say that if the gift is manifestly one which a prudent man would not have given if the relation of solicitor and client had determined in hac re you may not take such a fact into consideration as showing that, notwithstanding the determination of the actual relation in the particular matter, the influence of the solicitor has not ceased, but still continues. I cannot find in the later authorities anything which in terms qualifies or disapproves of Lord Eldon's judgment in Hatch v. Hatch. There are, however, later authorities in which, even with regard to a gift, the fact that the donor had competent and independent advice seems to have been considered a material matter; and though I think that in one of the earlier cases the view was taken that Lord Eldon regarded the having competent and independent advice as immaterial in the case of a gift, I do not understand him as having said so; I think he considered that, at all events where there is no continual employment in hac re, the existence of competent and independent advice would be relevant and lead to the inference that the influence had ceased.

Applying Lord Eldon's rule to this case, I think Colonel Wright's desire to execute these deeds was very much promoted by the pressure under which he was from the Capital and Counties Bank. It is clear that he was feeling very much his present shortness of money, and the prospect of its continuing for the rest of his life. At all events, I cannot conceive that any prudent man, professional or other, who was asked by Colonel Wright to advise him whether he should make these gifts to his solicitor would have failed to say, "I cannot advise you as to that unless I know what your means and prospects are, what is your present income, and whether you have any reason to suppose that it will be larger when these gifts take effect. I should also like to have a full list of your property," which in this case would of course include a full account of the rejected assets and equities of redemption. [His lordship then held on the evidence that Almy had not a sufficient knowledge of Colonel Wright's affairs to make him a competent and independent adviser.] It does not seem to me that the solicitor here has in the slightest degree discharged the onus thrown on him by Hatch v. Hatch, and he has failed to satisfy the court that these deeds were executed free from any influence of his. He was advising Colonel Wright in the whole matter, and the very fact that he was a party to the deeds being carried through was in itself a fact from which Colonel Wright might reasonably suppose that his solicitor, whom he trusted so much, approved of this transaction and thought it a reasonable and proper thing for him to do. The influence need not take the form of a direct persuasion to make the gift, nor is there any evidence of this in the present case, though, on the other hand, there is no evidence that Carter advised Colonel Wright that there was no reason why he should make the gift, and that he had better not make it. The judgment of Wigram, V.C., in Edwards v. Meyrick has been cited, and deserves great attention. It is suggested that he laid down that Lord Eldon's rule has no application unless the solicitor is employed in hac re. But Wigram, V.C.'s, decision was dealt with afterwards by Lord Cranworth and Turner, L.J., in Holman v. Loynes, where Turner, L.J., says (4 De G. M. & G. 270, at p. 283): "Gifts from clients to their attorneys can be maintained only when not only the relation has ceased but the influence may rationally be supposed to have ceased also." In my view Carter never, from first to last, ceased to be Colonel Wright's solicitor. He was the solicitor advising him in all his affairs, and particularly in regard to his dealings with his property, including the rejected assets; with the bank, who were his most pressing if not his only creditors; and with the settlements which he was to make on his children and the deeds by which they were to be made. Under these circumstances, I think he continued his solicitor in hac re, and it cannot possibly be said, at all events, that his influence can reasonably be supposed to have ceased. I think, therefore, that as against Carter these deeds of the 15th of May, 1900, cannot stand.

With regard, however, to the position of the other beneficiaries under these deeds I regret to say that I cannot agree with Kekewich, J. It seems to me that the gifts to the children and the gifts to the solicitor were entirely different and might just as well have been made by a separate deed. The reason which seems chiefly to have induced Colonel Wright to make these gifts to his solicitor was not the reason which induced him to make a provision for his children, and I think it cannot be said that the gifts to the solicitor and the provision for the children and wife were one and the same transaction induced by the same motives, and that the wife and children claim in any sense through the solicitor. I think, therefore, that except as regards Carter these deeds must stand. [His lordship then held on the evidence relating to the deed of March, 1901, that Tarbet was not in a position to give Colonel Wright competent and independent advice on the matter, owing to his insufficient knowledge of Colonel Wright's affairs.] I am not prepared to lay down that in every case of purchase by a solicitor competent and independent advice is necessary, for it may be that a particular transaction of sale appears so manifestly fair that such advice is not necessary. But there is no evidence to show that this transaction was a fair one. As far as I can draw inferences from the circumstances of this case, it seems to me highly probable that it was not a good bargain for Colonel Wright; at all events we have not sufficient evidence that it was so, nor had Mr. Tarbet the material to form a judgment. In my opinion, not only is this deed one which does not show that it was a fair bargain, but there is a good deal to show that it was a bargain which a prudent person would never have entertained. As against Carter I have no doubt that the transaction cannot stand, for under it he gets a new consideration and he and his co-covenantors do not take over the whole liabilities of his client, whose whole property they were taking. With regard to the other two beneficiaries, Blanche Wright and Nevill Wright, I think that they are for this purpose in the same position as Carter, and that the consideration coming from them cannot be separated. The earlier deeds were deeds of gift, but this is a bargain which in my judgment was entered into under such circumstances that it is not binding on Colonel Wright. In my opinion Carter was acting throughout the transaction in concert with Blanche Wright and Nevill Wright, and under these circumstances it would be against conscience for them to attempt to take advantage of a bargain so obtained. It was said that the rule in Huguenin v. Basely only applies where fraud has been proved, and that we must take it that none has been proved here. I do not agree with that at all. It is established here, to my mind, that this deed was executed by Colonel Wright under the influence of Carter, without fully understanding what was being done and without competent and independent advice. Not only cannot Carter enforce this deed, but it is in my opinion against conscience within the rule in Huguenin v. Basely that any of the parties to the bargain should be able to enforce their rights. I think, therefore, that the deed of the 14th of March, 1901, must be set aside as against all these defendants, but the agreement of the 13th of July, 1901, which was supplemental to the second deed of the 15th of May, 1900, is, like that deed, void as against Carter only.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion; and after the exhaustive manner in which the case has already been dealt with by Vaughan Williams, L.J., I think I need not go very deeply into the case. I desire, however, to state more particularly the grounds on which I consider that the deeds of 1900 must be set aside as against Carter, and that the deeds of 1901 must be set aside altogether.

The two sets of deeds have been treated, and ought to be treated, in different ways. The deeds of 1900 were deeds by which gifts were conferred on a solicitor by his client, and it is stated in them that the motive and consideration for them consisted of services rendered by the solicitor to the client.

That being so, the transaction is brought within the very terms of the rule of the court as laid down by Lord Eldon in Hatch v. Hatch. I have always understood that Lord Eldon's judgment in that case contained an accurate statement of the law as it then stood, and that it continues to be an accurate statement of the law as it stands now. At all events, I think it is a clear authority for two propositions—the first being that transactions of gift between client and solicitor are watched and sanctioned by the court with the utmost jealousy; and the second, that the presumption against them is not entirely irrebuttable, though extremely difficult to rebut. As to the first, the rule so laid down is grounded on important reasons of public policy. The court has laid down that before such a gift can be upheld it must be satisfied that, in Lord Eldon's words, "it is an act of rational consideration, an act of pure volition, uninfluenced"; in other words, that in dealing with such a transaction the court starts with the presumption that undue influence exists on the part of the donee, and throws on him the burden of satisfying the court that the gift was uninfluenced by his position as solicitor. As for rebutting the presumption, Lord Eldon says that it is "almost impossible" to uphold such a gift in the case of the relations which he specifies, one of them being that of solicitor and client. Now, it has been laid down in recent cases, particularly in two cases in this court—Mitchell v. Homfray and Liles v. Terry—that in order to support a gift of this kind the donee must have competent and independent advice in conferring the gift. That may, in my opinion, be laid down in a negative form—that is to say, the transaction cannot be upheld unless that condition is satisfied; but it still remains the rule that the court must look at all the circumstances of the case, and the introduction of a new solicitor, though a highly important element, does not conclude the case; the court still requires to be satisfied that the influence arising from the relationship of solicitor and client can no longer be supposed to exist, and I think also that the new solicitor called in to advise in such a case takes upon himself no light or easy task. The duties of the adviser have been considered by Farwell, J., in the recent case of Powell v. Powell. In the course of his judgment he says ([1900] 1 Ch. 243, at p. 247): "The solicitor does not discharge his duty by satisfying himself that the donor understands and wishes to carry out the particular transaction. He must also satisfy himself that the gift is one that it is right and proper for the donor to make under all the circumstances, and if he is not so satisfied, his duty is to advise his client not to go on with the transaction, and to refuse to act further for him if he persists." With this view of a solicitor's duty I agree. I think a solicitor would fail in his duty if he neglected to inform himself of the circumstances under which the transaction was taking place. It might turn out, for example, to be one in which a poor man was divesting himself of all his property in favour of the solicitor, and in such a case it would be impossible, I think, to uphold the transaction, whatever the advice might have been.

After these remarks on the general state of the law applicable to such a case, I will make a few observations on the position regarding the deeds of 1900. Without going into detail, I may point out what seems to me the salient feature of the transaction. In the first place, though a new solicitor was called in, he was not called in at the inception of the transaction. The terms of the gift had been defined and draft deeds had been prepared in Carter's office before Almy's services came into operation. It is true that nothing to bind Colonel Wright had been done, but still the advice which he received was not given until the transaction had progressed to a certain extent. In the second place, the relationship of solicitor and client continued to exist between Colonel Wright and Carter in regard to every transaction except that of the settling and completing of the proposed deeds. I have already pointed out that the motive and consideration for the deeds appear, on the face of them, to be the services rendered by Carter to his client; and these services had been rendered with reference to many very important matters, particularly Colonel Wright's position as regards the Capital and Counties Bank and the dealings which were taking place between him and the bank. In regard to these matters Carter's services continued to be given. Thirdly, with regard to Almy's advice to Colonel Wright, I come on the evidence to the conclusion that Almy took no steps to inform himself of the propriety of the gifts, or whether Colonel Wright's circumstances were such as would justify a prudent man in his position in doing what he did. He gave Colonel Wright no advice on this subject at all. He merely told him that if he intended to benefit Carter it was essential that he should be free from his influence; and he says that Colonel Wright gave him to understand generally that he was entirely free from that influence and that he merely desired to give Carter a benefit in return for services rendered. If that is all that need be done to establish such transactions, there will in reality be very little substantial difficulty in dealing with them, instead of their being very difficult and almost impossible to uphold. Speaking for myself, I can only say that I am not satisfied that the undue influence which must be attributed to Carter did not continue to exist at the time when these deeds were executed, and therefore, in my opinion, they ought to be set aside as against him.

Then arises the question whether the provisions in favour of Colonel Wright's wife and children are also vitiated; and on this point I entirely agree with what Vaughan Williams, L.J., has said. The case does not fall within the rule laid down by Lord Eldon in Huguenin v. Basely, and I do not think that the benefits conferred on the wife and children have in any way been derived from Carter's undue influence. It is clear on the evidence that quite apart from this intention to confer a benefit on Carter, Colonel Wright intended to confer substantial benefits on his wife and family, and under those circumstances I think they are entitled to retain the benefits conferred on them by the deeds.

I will now consider the deed of the 14th of March, 1901. That deed can no longer, I think, be treated in this court as a transaction of gift pure and simple; it has been treated in argument as a transaction of sale, and I am prepared so to regard it. Here I am differing from the opinion of Kekewich, J., but with the utmost respect I confess I cannot agree with him in his view that this was a good deed. An onus is here also thrown on Carter, but one of a different kind. In a transaction of sale in which the solicitor is a purchaser the court requires it to be proved, first, that the client was fully informed; secondly, that he had competent independent advice; and thirdly, that the price given was a fair one; and the onus of proving all this lies on the solicitor. Now, without dwelling on the first two requisites, I think in this case the third entirely fails. This is a sale of all the property, real and personal, of the client; it is described in general terms in the deed, and he executed the deed without Mr. Tarbet, the solicitor who was advising him, being informed of what the property included in the deed consisted or of its value. How, then, is it possible to say that the full consideration was given for the property? I am not satisfied that any one of the three requisites to which I have referred is established as regards this deed, which is open to still further observations; but I think it must fail as against Carter on the ground laid down in Holman v. Loynes, that he has failed to prove that the full value was given. Then comes the question, How does that affect the two children of Colonel Wright, Nevill Wright and Blanche Wright, who joined with Carter in executing this deed for an annuity secured only by their personal covenants? It seems to me that if the transaction is bad as against Carter they are so mixed up with it that it cannot be separated, and that the deed must be set aside as against them, on proper terms, no less than as against Carter. It is one single transaction, and as it fails as against him it fails as against them also. For these reasons I think Colonel Wright is entitled to the relief which he claims.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I wish briefly to state my own view without attempting to recapitulate the facts or to discuss the authorities. I think that the deed of March, 1901, cannot stand, and I do not regard it as in any real sense a transaction of sale and purchase. Colonel Wright's guiding object was not to obtain the best price for his property, but to obtain a means of defeating the bank. It is true that we cannot in this action decide whether the conveyance was for the purpose of defeating his creditors; but I think we are entitled and bound to ask whether this was a real bargain between vendor and purchaser or mere device by which the so-called vendor divested himself of all his property, present and future, without reference to its value. Having regard to the evidence of Tarbet, I think only one answer can be given to that question; but assuming that the transaction is to be treated as a sale by Colonel Wright to Carter, his solicitor, and to Blanche and N. Wright, I am clearly of opinion that it rests on Carter to justify the sale, and to show that "the transaction was perfectly fair, that the client knew what he was doing, and that a fair price was given." These are the words of Kindersley, V.C., in Tomson v. Judge, and so far as I know that statement of the law is consistent with all the authorities. Carter has utterly failed to show this; perhaps it would be more correct to say that he has not attempted to do so; but it was argued that he did all that the law required when he saw that Mr. Tarbet, a respectable solicitor, was called in to advise Colonel Wright. Mr. Tarbet is not now a party to the action, and I desire to avoid needlessly saying anything which may prejudice him, but I am bound to ask for what purpose he was called in to advise. It was not as to the sufficiency of the consideration nor as to the propriety of the transaction, but only to do what was necessary to carry out the scheme previously arranged. It seems to me that against Carter the transaction of March, 1901, cannot stand, and it has scarcely been contended by counsel for Blanche Wright that, on that assumption, she can hold her share. The consideration was the joint and several covenant of the three combined to pay an annuity, but Carter was really at law the most responsible person. The contract of purchase was one and indivisible, and the deed must be set aside as a whole. I may add, though it is not necessary for the decision, that the circumstances attending the preparation and execution of this extraordinary deed are such that I doubt whether it could be supported if no fiduciary relation had existed between Colonel Wright and Carter. With regard to the transaction of 1900, that was one of pure gift, without any covenant of pur chase. It was one of gift to Carter, Blanche Wright, and N. Wright. As regards Carter, I agree with Kekewich, J., that the transaction cannot stand. His view was that in this case the circumstances precluded the possibility of competent and independent advice being given to Colonel Wright. Assuming, as I do, that the presumption of undue influence in the case of a gift by a client to his solicitor during the continuance of the relationship is not irrebuttable, I hold that something beyond what was done here is essential to rebut it. Almy had not the materials necessary to him to advise, and he seems, moreover, to have taken a somewhat incorrect view of his duties, for he says that he understood that the relation of solicitor and client continued as to other matters. I doubt whether any competent and independent advice can be given to a man who says that he has arranged to make a gift to his solicitor, except that he had better not do so, and it is difficult to see what bearing such advice, if ineffectual, can have upon the validity of the gift. In my opinion the deeds of 1900 and the supplemental agreement of the 13th of July, 1901, must be set aside as against Carter, and a resulting trust declared of the benefits taken by him under them; but I see no reason for impeaching any of them as against Colonel Wright's children. They do not claim through Carter, and on the evidence it is not shown that the benefits that they take were procured by him, or were due to any influence exerted by him. Neither Huguenin v. Baely nor Barron v. Willis touches this point. My view is that the gifts under these instruments are severable, and that as far as the children are concerned there is neither evidence nor presumption of undue influence.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Dec. 12.

In re ALPHA CO.
WARD v. ALPHA CO. (a.)

Practice—Debenture-holder's action—Plaintiff suing in representative capacity—Plaintiff dominus litis—Discontinuance after decree pronounced.

A plaintiff in a debenture-holder's action, although suing "on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders," may discontinue his action after decree pronounced if he has no notice of claim and is not required to continue, by any other debenture-holder of the same class.

Forms of decree in creditors' administration actions and in debenture-holders' actions respectively, compared.

Handford v. Storie, 2 Sim. & St. 196, discussed.

Adjourned summons.

On the 21st of October, 1902, the plaintiff, at that time the holder of one debenture for £1,000 in the defendant company, and suing "on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders" in the company, obtained judgment in usual form and with the usual accounts and inquiries.

On the 19th of November, 1902, the plaintiff received from the liquidator of the company payment in full of all moneys due to him in respect of his debenture.

It appeared—and the evidence was uncontradicted—that there were in fact no other debentures outstanding, and under those circumstances the company took out this summons asking that the action might be discontinued.

E. W. Martelli, for the summons.—This case is analogous to a creditor's administration action, where the rule is that before decree a plaintiff can discontinue proceedings, but cannot do so afterwards if there are others of the same class: Handford v. Storie, 2 Sim. & S. 196. Here there are no such others, and the rule therefore does not apply; the plaintiff is dominus litis and further proceedings are wholly unnecessary.

T. K. Crossfield, for the plaintiff, supported the argument.

KEKEWICH, J., stated the facts, and continued: The question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to discontinue after judgment. The action has been compared to a creditor's administration action, but in my opinion that is not a correct analogy. In a creditor's administration action, so soon as the plaintiff creditor obtains his judgment, if it is a proper judgment, he cannot stop proceedings, for this reason—viz., that a proper judgment in such an action not only directs inquiries as to debts, &c., but also that the assets shall be applied "in a due course of administration." It is settled that if there is not such a direction as that, the decree is not a full and proper administration decree, and in its absence an action at law against the executor or administrator cannot be restrained; but if that direction is given creditors can be restrained, and for this reason, that the court has assumed the duty of applying the assets, and will not suffer them to be wasted by creditors outside, who must trust the court to administer the estate fairly. In such a case, then, until the certificate is made that all other debts are paid, the plaintiff is not dominus litis: he is, in fact, a trustee of the action for other creditors.

But in my opinion the position of a plaintiff in a debenture-holder's action is entirely different; no doubt he sues "on behalf of all other debenture-holders"—that is because he is one of a class; and there are other cases, too, in which a person may sue as representing a class. He obtains judgment, but he does not undertake, nor does the court undertake, the administration of the estate as in a creditor's administration action. No doubt the court will generally have the supervision, but not as a duty, because there is nothing in the decree in a debenture-holder's action equivalent to a direction for administration in a due course. In Handford v. Storie, (which, although a debenture-holder's action, was not such an action in the modern sense of the term, although in Seton (6th ed.), p. 1396, it is wrongly classed as an administration action), the plaintiff after judgment sought to dismiss the action, and Leach, V.C., said this: "A plaintiff who sues on behalf of himself and all other persons of the same class, as he acts upon his own mere motion and at his own expense, retains the absolute dominion of the suit until decree, and may dismiss the bill at his pleasure. After a decree he cannot by his conduct deprive other persons of the same class of the benefit of the decree if they think fit to prosecute it." No more can this plaintiff, but there is no duty on him to proceed himself. He cannot prevent another debenture-holder coming in and claiming the benefit of the action, but he is not bound to go on simply because some other person may be entitled to such benefit. I am not, therefore, hampered by that language on the part of the Vice-Chancellor; but then he proceeds: "The reason of the distinction is that before decree no other person of the class is bound to rely upon the diligence of him who has first instituted his suit, but may file a bill of his own; and that after a decree no second suit is permitted." No more is it now. When a debenture-holder's action has been commenced no other debenture-holder is allowed to commence a similar action, and to prevent such a step every action of the kind is now entitled "In the matter of" the particular company, so that search can be made to see whether such an action has been commenced. But if such second action were by inadvertence commenced the court would stay it, not because the court has undertaken a duty, but because of its jurisdiction to prevent unnecessary costs. That was always the case in administration actions before debenture-holder's actions such as this were thought of. I think that is all Leach, V.C., meant—that after decree no second suit could be brought, not because the court had undertaken the duty of administering assets, but because for the prevention of costs the second writ would not be allowed if the first was sufficient for all purposes. I see no reason why this plaintiff, although suing in his representative capacity, not having notice of any other claim and not being required to go on by another debenture-holder, should not now discontinue his action. What would happen if some other debenture-holder applied, I need not say, though I do not see how he could be excluded. But here there is nothing of that kind. The plaintiff remains master of the position and may discontinue proceedings.

In re HETLEY.

HETLEY v. HETLEY. (a.)

Will—Construction—Parol directions as to disposition—Admissibility—Uncertainty.

A testator, after giving all his property to his wife for life, added the following clause, "I desire and empower her to dispose of my estate by her will or in her lifetime in accordance with my wishes verbally expressed by me to her."

Held, that the clause was void for uncertainty, for parol evidence was not admissible to prove what these wishes were.

In re Fleetwood, Sidgreaves v. Brewer, 15 Ch. D. 594, 28 W. R. Dig. 245, distinguished.

By his will, dated the 3rd of December, 1897, the testator appointed his wife the sole executrix of his will, and continued: "I give, devise, and bequeath to her all my real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever for her use, enjoyment, and benefit during her life, and I desire and empower her by her will or in her lifetime to dispose of my estate in accordance with my wishes verbally expressed by me to her."

The testator died on the 13th of March, 1902.

It appeared from the evidence that before February, 1897, the testator had several conversations with his wife as to the disposal of his estate, in which he had expressed in more or less detail his wishes as to its disposal.

The testator's wife had made a memorandum of these wishes and promised that she would carry them out.

The evidence, however, was not quite clear as to whether all these conversations had taken place before the execution of the will or not.

This summons was taken out to decide what interest the widow took under the will—viz., whether she was entitled absolutely, or took only a life interest, and in the latter case whether the residue was disposed of or not.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Greenwood, for the widow.—Under the words of the will my client has a power of appointment amongst the objects mentioned in the trust: Moss v. Cooper, 1 Joh. & Hem. 352, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 114. The court will admit evidence to show whether a trust was created where there is a reference to the testator's wishes: In re Fleetwood, 15 Ch. D. 594, 28 W. R. Dig. 245, this case was recently followed by Farwell, J., in In re Huxtable, 50 W. R. 185; [1902] 1 Ch. 214. [He also referred to 28 W. R. Dig. 245, Riordan v. Barron, Ir. Rep. 10 Eq. 469, 25 W. R. Dig. 343, and In the Goods of Marchant, [1893] P. 254.] [JOYCE, J., referred to Scott v. Brownrigg, 9 L. R. Ir. 246, 30 W. R. Dig. 232.] In In re Boyes, 32 W. R. 630, 26 Ch. D. 531, Kay, J., did not inforce the trust because it was not communicated. A gift for life followed by a general power is equivalent to an absolute gift if it is the best way of carrying out the testator's wishes: Lamb v. Eames, 19 W. R. 659, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 597.

He also referred to In re Hutchinson and Tenant, 26 W. R. 904; 8 Ch. D. 540, In re Adam and Kensington Vestry, 32 W. R. 883; 27 Ch. D. 394, In re Williams, 45 W. R. 519; [1897] 2 Ch. 12.

Hughes, K.C., and George Henderson, for the nephews and nieces of the testator claiming under the trust, supported the widow's claim. The wishes are express and clear, and were communicated before the date of the will, and the court will give effect to them: In re Stead, 48 W. R. 221; [1900] 1 Ch. 237. Parol evidence is admissible to show what the trust is: In re Fleetwood. In re Boyes is distinguishable, but the principle of law is there clearly stated. In McCormick v. Grogan, 17 W. R. 961, L. R. 4 H. L. 82, the wishes were not communicated.

R. J. Parker, for the heir-at-law.—This case is outside of any case cited. The widow has a beneficial life interest with a power of appointment among an undefined class. If there is no trust, evidence is not admissible to show of whom the class consists, for if there is only a power with nothing to indicate a trust in default, there are no persons in whose favour the court could declare a trust.

Hughes, in reply.—Our evidence establishes a trust; it does not define or create a power. The words "I empower her by will or in her lifetime" only indicate the time at which the beneficial interest of the trust created by the words "I desire her" is to be taken.

July 15.—JOYCE, J.—In this case the testator, a gentleman of great wealth, having perfect confidence in his wife, and having probably arranged with her as to how his property should be disposed of, instead of giving, devising, and bequeathing everything to her absolutely with a request framed so as not to impose any obligation that she should dispose of the property as agreed between them, made a will, which, after appointing her sole executrix, proceeded in the following way: [His lordship read the clause in the will, and proceeded:]

Now, according to the true construction of the will, all that is thereby expressly given to the widow is a beneficial life interest; as to everything else she takes by virtue of her appointment as executrix, or otherwise she is trustee, after payment of the debts, &c., for the testator's heir-at-law and next-of-kin respectively. This, however, is subject to the clause, whatever may be its force and effect, "I desire and empower her by her will or in her lifetime to dispose of my estate in accordance with my wishes verbally expressed by me to her." That clause purports to create a special power of disposition in the testator's wife, but not a general power enabling her to do whatever she pleases with the property. Neither the objects of such power nor the limitations under which it is to be exercised are expressed in the will, but in order to ascertain and to find out what these are, we were referred—not to any document which can be identified, and possibly for purposes of probate treated as incorporated with the will, but—to wishes "verbally expressed" by the testator to his wife, and it was only in accordance with these wishes that the power was to be exercised. Nor is it even absolutely clear that the wishes referred to might not be wishes expressed between the date of will and the death of the testator, and unless these subsequently-expressed wishes are excluded by construction, I am of opinion that the clause I am considering is invalid for the reasons appearing in Johnson v. Ball, 5 De G. & Sm. 85. Even assuming that the testator must be taken to have referred only to the wishes expressed prior to the execution of his will, parol evidence is not, in my judgment, any more admissible to show what those wishes were than it would be to fill up a blank or to explain any patent ambiguity in the will. By the Wills Act no will can be valid unless it is in writing, executed by the testator, and attested as by the statute provided. To define or supply by parol evidence that which on the face of the will was left indefinite or unexpressed would be to make a material addition to the written will. Counsel for the parties desiring to support the validity of the power cited and urged me to follow the decision in In re Fleetwood, and it appears that Farwell, J., in a recent case of In re Huxtable, which I am told is under appeal,* felt himself somewhat reluctantly bound to recognise the authority of that decision. But Mr. Parker, arguing on behalf of the heir and next-of-kin, convinced me that the case of In re Fleetwood materially differed from the present, and that I should be extending the principle of that decision if I held that by the mode here adopted the testator created or could create a valid power of disposition on his widow. This is a case of an attempt to create a power and not of a definite trust for particular individuals attaching upon a gift of the subject-matter to a named legatee or devisee. If I held this power to be valid I should be going beyond In re Fleetwood, and introducing, in spite of the statute, what Kay, J., calls a serious innovation upon the law relating to testamentary instruments. I therefore hold the parol evidence to be inadmissible, and the clause purporting to create the form of disposition in question to be void for uncertainty. The consequence is, that subject to the life interest of the testator's widow the testator's real estate is undisposed of. The costs of all parties will be paid out of the estate.

Personalty given upon trust for the person for the time being entitled to the possession of real estate as far as the rules of law and equity will permit vests absolutely in the first tenant in tail at birth, unless there be a clear expression of intention that it shall not so vest, and words declaring the testator's general desire that the income of certain personalty shall go in keeping up the real estate, are not such an expression of intention as will prevent the personalty so vesting.

Adjourned summons for the determination of the questions—first, to whom (subject to the interest of the tenant for life) belonged certain furniture specifically bequeathed by the will of the late Rowland Fothergill; secondly, to whom (subject as aforesaid) belonged a sum of £70,000, bequeathed by a codicil to the will upon the trusts declared in the will concerning the testator's residuary personalty.

The testator by his will, dated the 23rd of February, 1869, devised the freeholds called the Hensol estate to the present tenant for life, and after her death to her sons successively in tail, with remainders over.

He bequeathed certain furniture, &c., then in Hensol Castle (on the said estate) to trustees upon trust to permit the same to go along with and be used and enjoyed so far as the rules of law and equity would permit by the person who under the limitations above mentioned should for the time being be in the actual possession or entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of the Hensol estate, in the same manner as if they had been freeholds of inheritance and had been included in the devise of the Hensol estate. He bequeathed his residuary personal estate to trustees upon trusts for sale, payment of debts, &c., out of the proceeds and investment of the surplus, and proceeded as follows: "Now I declare that the said trustees or trustee shall pay and apply the interest, dividends, rents, profits, and annual income of my residuary estate to or for the benefit of the person who for the time being shall under and by virtue of this my will be entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents of my Hensol estate, and shall otherwise hold my residuary estate upon such trusts that the annual income thereof shall as far as possible be enjoyed in like manner as if it had formed part of the rents and profits of the Hensol estate, it being my wish that the income of my residuary estate shall assist in keeping up and be in augmentation of the rents and profits of the Hensol estate."

By a codicil the testator bequeathed the sum of £70,000—such sum to be considered the first charge by way of legacy on his residuary estate and to be treated as payable on the day of his death—to his trustees upon the trusts declared in his will concerning his residuary estate.

The testator died on the 19th of September, 1871.

The present tenant for life had three children and no more—namely, the late Sir Rose Price; the present tenant in tail; and a third son, still an infant.

Sir Rose Price died on the 9th of June, 1901, a bachelor and intestate, and without having barred the entail, and letters of administration of his estate were taken out by his mother, the tenant for life.

The husband of the tenant for life had died on the 16th of April, 1899.

argued that—subject to the life interest—the furniture, the residue, and the legacy of £70,000 had become absolutely vested in the late Sir Rose Price.

Hewitt, for the present tenant in tail.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The first question raised by this originating summons is whether the pictures, prints, and other chattels at Hensol Castle, specifically bequeathed to go along with the Hensol estate, vested absolutely in the late Sir Rose Price (who was killed in the South African War on the 9th of June, 1901), subject to his mother's interest therein; or whether the defendant, Sir Francis Cardor Rose Price, will become entitled to the same if he shall survive his mother.

This point depends upon the proper construction to be placed upon the will of the late Rowland Fothergill. [His lordship here read the specific bequest. Mr. Borthwick, who appeared for the plaintiffs, one of whom is the legal personal representative of the late Sir Rose Price, stated that, having regard to the expression "actual possession" contained in the will, he could not distinguish the present case from Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 40, 1 Joh. & Hem. 40, and In re Angerstein, Angerstein v. Angerstein, 44 W. R. 152, [1895] 2 Ch. 883, and that as Sir Rose Price died in his mother's lifetime, and without ever having come into the possession of the estate, he could not contend that the specific chattels had become absolutely vested in him.

The other question raised by the summons is whether the trust funds representing the legacy of £70,000 given by the first codicil and the residuary estate of the testator vested absolutely, in the events which have happened, in the late Sir Rose Price. This depends upon the proper construction to be placed upon another portion of the will of the same testator. [His lordship here read the residuary gift in the will and the codicil giving the £70,000.]

The effect of these bequests is that the £70,000 and the residuary estate are held upon the same trusts (as far as possible) as the Hensol estate; the income of the personal estate including the rents of any real estate purchased, is to be applied as if they formed part of the rents and profits of the Hensol estate, and to assist in keeping up, and be in augmentation of the rents and profits of the Hensol estate, and this not for any definite or limited time, but in perpetuity.

The general rule is that a gift of personalty to the persons for the time being entitled to real estate, so far as the rules of law and equity permit, vests absolutely, not in a tenant for life of the real estate, but in the first tenant in tail at birth, whether he comes into possession or not: Foley v. Burnell, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 274, 4 Bro. Parl. Cas. 319; Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon. In Cox v. Sutton, 25 L. J. Ch. 845, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 26, Wood, V.C., affirmed the general rule in the clearest terms, although in that case, upon the special language of that will, he was able to arrive (not without difficulty) at the conclusion that the personalty was given as a contingent gift to a person who should answer a particular description at a particular date. If there be a direction that the personalty is not to vest in a tenant in tail dying under twenty-one, this will prevent the personalty from vesting in a tenant in tail by purchase dying an infant: Christie v. Gosling, L. R. 1 H. L. 279, 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 30; Harrington v. Harrington, L. R. 5 H. L. 87, 20 W. R. H. L. Dig. 25; Martelli v. Holloway, L. R. 5 H. L. 532, 21 W. R. Dig. 278. And if the gift of personal estate be to the person actually seised at the death of the tenants for life or to the person seised of the actual freehold, which is defined as freehold in possession, or if there are other clear words referring to actual possession, a tenant in tail who dies before coming into possession is excluded. In Potts v. Potts, 3 Jo. & Lat. 353, Lord St. Leonards said, at p. 368: "If a plain intention be expressed that no person shall take the chattels absolutely who does not live to become entitled to the possession of the real estate, the court must execute that intention."

Upon a careful consideration of the will and codicil I am unable to find any such intention expressed in the case before me, and as was said by Lord St. Leonards in Potts v. Potts, "It is firmly settled that the court will not introduce in such cases the restrictions which conveyancers know how to introduce with apt words."

The personal estate is given in the present case by reference to the real estate, the income of the personal estate being directed to go for an indefinite period with the rents of the real estate, and in my opinion the £70,000 and residuary personalty vested absolutely in the late tenant in tail, there not being contained in the will any sufficient direction to preclude such vesting, and to carry these interests to the next tenant in tail.

Indeed the present case appears to me to be a stronger one in favour of the first tenant in tail taking an absolute interest than Martelli v. Holloway. There the will contained a proviso that the personal estate should absolutely belong to such persons, &c., as should first attain twenty-one and become entitled to an estate in tail in possession in the real estate, and it was held that a person had become absolutely entitled to the personal estate, although he had only a vested estate tail in the real estate in remainder, expectant on his father's life estate.

The answer to the second question will therefore be that the late Sir Rose Price became absolutely entitled to the legacy and residuary personalty subject to the interest of the plaintiff Dame Isabella Elizabeth Price-Fothergill therein.

This was an action tried by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., without a jury.

The action was brought by the lord mayor, aldermen, and citizens of the city of Sheffield against Messrs. Barclay & Co., bankers, to recover the sum of £11,487 17s. 5d., being the amount of principal and interest of certain corporation stock which belonged to two trustees, and was transferred to a nominee of the defendants under a transfer purporting to be executed by one of the said trustees, but which in reality was a forgery.

The question now raised was as to which of the two innocent parties should suffer for the fraud of the third party.

The facts of the case, as stated in the statement of claim and admitted in the statement of defence, were as follows:

On the 29th of March, 1893, Messrs. Timbrell and Honnywill were the owners and holders of £8,200 3½ per cent. 1883 Stock, redeemable 1915, in the Sheffield Corporation, and as such owners and holders were duly registered in the plaintiff corporation's stock register.

The defendants, with a letter addressed to the plaintiffs, dated the 15th of April, 1893, presented to the plaintiffs a deed of transfer dated the 11th of April, 1893. purporting to be duly executed by Messrs. Timbrell and Honnywill as a transfer by them to the defendant Edward E. Barclay of the stock, and by such letter the defendants requested the plaintiffs to register the transfer and in due course to issue certificates to the defendant Edward E. Barclay as holder and owner of the stock in accordance with the terms of the transfer.

The deed of transfer had not been executed by Honnywill, and in so far as it purported to have been executed by him was a forgery.

In an action brought in 1899 in the Chancery Division (by order of the 11th of January, 1901, transferred for trial to the Queen's Bench Division) by Honnywill against the Mayor, &c., of Sheffield (the present plaintiffs) Honnywill claimed that the defendants (the corporation) should be ordered to rectify their register by inserting therein his name as the holder and owner of the stock or should appropriate or purchase and register in his name the amount of the stock and shou'd pay to him such interest and dividends as had become payable from the date of the transfer, on the ground that he (Honnywill) had not executed the transfer, and that in so far as it purported to have been executed by him was a forgery and null and void.

By a letter of the 13th of November, 1900, the defendants agreed to be bound by the decision in the action of Honnywill against the corporation on the issue whether the signature of Honnywill to the deed of transfer was a forgery or not. The jury found that the signature was a forgery, and the defendants were now estopped from alleging the contrary.

In that action Honnywill recovered judgment dated the 13th of May, 1901, whereby, so far as was now material, it was ordered that the present plaintiffs (being the defendants in that action) should appropriate or purchase and register in the name of Honnywill £8,200 3½ per cent. Redeemable Stock of the plaintiff corporation, and deliver to Honnywill a certificate of that stock in his name, and further, that Honnywill should recover from the present plaintiffs (being the then defendants) a sum of money representing the dividends which from time to time would have accrued due and become payable to him upon the stock, with interest thereon at 3½ per cent., and costs to be taxed.

In compliance with this judgment the plaintiffs in this action, which was commenced on the 23rd of October, 1901, purchased the stock for £8,645 10s., and appropriated the same to Honnywill, and paid to him a sum of £2,524 1s. 2d. in respect of dividends and interest as ordered by the judgment, and also paid £318 6s. 3d., Honnywill's taxed costs of the action, and, further, became liable to pay their own costs.

Under the above circumstances the plaintiffs submitted as a matter of law that the defendants were liable to repay to them the moneys so paid as aforesaid, and to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of the liabilities, and they claimed the above-mentioned three sums, amounting to £11,487 17s. 5d., and a declaration that they were entitled to be indemnified.

In their defence the defendants, while admitting the facts in the statement of claim, submitted that they disclosed no cause of action against the defendants; that the defendants were bonâ fide holders for value of the transfer, and had neither knowledge nor notice, nor any means of knowledge, that any part of the same was forged, but honestly believed that the same was a genuine transfer at the time when they sent to the plaintiffs the letter of the 15th of April, 1893, and that the plaintiffs had better opportunity of judging of the genuineness of the transfer than the defendants; and alternatively that the plaintiffs' claim (if any) was barred by the Statute of Limitations; and they also pleaded, as showing that the plaintiffs were estopped from asserting this present claim against the defendants, that the plaintiffs accepted the transfer to the defendant E. E. Barclay and duly registered him as the holder of the stock, and that he on the 28th of April, 1893, executed a fresh transfer to Messrs Young and Macdonald, and that this fresh transfer was accepted by the plaintiff who duly registered Young and Macdonald as the holders of £8,000 of the stock, and issued a certificate to them accordingly, as well as a certificate to a Miss Cockayne as the holder of the balance of £200 stock; that the plaintiffs took no steps to verify the genuineness of the transfer of the 15th of April, 1893, but continued to act on it as a genuine transfer and continued to pay Messrs. Young and Macdonald and Miss Cockayne the dividends due thereon, and that the defendants were thereby led to believe that the transfer was genuine and lost their remedies against the persons who had forged and delivered the transfer to them.

The Sheffield Corporation Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. lvii.), provides as follows:

Section 27. Subject to the provisions of this part of this Act every corporation stockholder may transfer all or any part of his stock in books or by deed.

Section 29. (1) If and where the resolution for creation of any portion of corporation stock makes the same transferable by deed and not in books the provisions of this section shall apply and have effect but not otherwise. (2) Every transfer of corporation stock so transferable shall be by deed. (4) The deed of transfer when duly executed shall be delivered to and kept by the corporation or the registrar, and the corporation or the registrar shall enter a memorial thereof in a book to be called the Register of Transfers of Corporation Stock, and shall indorse on the deed of transfer a notice of that entry.

Section 30. (1) The corporation or the registrar before allowing any transfer of stock may, if the circumstances of the case appear to them or him to make it expedient, require evidence of the title of any person claiming a right to make the transfer. (2) That evidence shall be a statutory declaration of one or more competent persons or of such other nature as the corporation or the registrar with the approval of the corporation may require.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Bankes, K.C., and H. T. Waddy with him), for the plaintiffs.—The loss caused by the fraud of the third party ought to be borne by the defendants. The sending on of the transfer by the defendants to the plaintiffs was in law a representation by them to the plaintiffs that they believed the transfer to be a genuine transfer, and that they had the authority of the registered owner to do so, and the plaintiffs acted on the representation implied from the act of the defendants. The representation of the defendants was a request to the plaintiffs to do a lawful act. This the plaintiffs acted upon, and thereby sustained the loss which they now sought to recover. There is an implied promise by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs. In Dugdale v. Lovering, 23 W. R. 391, L. R. 10 C. P. 196, Lord Esher (then Brett, J.) said that the implication rested "merely on the fact of the plaintiff having done an act at the request of the defendant which was not manifestly illegal or tortious to his knowledge, but which exposed him to an action." In Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing. 66, the principle is clearly stated by Best, C.J., at p. 73: see also Humphrys v. Pratt, 5 Bli. N. S. 154, and Betts v. Gibbins, 2 A. & E. 57. In Toplis v. Grane, 5 Bing. N. C. 636, Tindal, C.J., at p. 650, says: "Where an act has been done by the plaintiff under the express directions of the defendant, which occasions an injury to the rights of third persons, yet, if such act is not apparently illegal in itself, but is done honestly and bonâ fide in compliance with the defendant's directions, he shall be bound to indemnify the plaintiffs against the consequences thereof": see also American cases, Brown v. Howard Fire Insurance Co., 42 Maryland, 384, and Boston and Albany Railroad Co. v. Richardson, 135 Mass. 473. It is true that in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., 28 W. R. 290, 5 Q. B. D. 188, Lindley, J., at pp. 190-6, expressed his opinion that it is the duty of the company in such cases as this to look after their own register, and that in the case of a forged transfer being innocently presented the loss must fall upon the company. But on that case going up to the Court of Appeal that view was expressly dissented from by both Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ., 28 W. R. 290, 5 Q. B. D., at p. 201. Further, the plaintiffs' claim is not barred by the Statute of Limitations, for the cause of action did not arise in 1893, when the defendants requested the plaintiffs to register the transfer, but only when the plaintiffs were compelled to pay Honnywill: Tunstall v. Bartlett, 14 L. T. Rep. 400, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 121, and Collinge v. Heywood, 9 A. & E. 633. No cause of action arises until the damage or injury arises.

They also referred to Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 8 E. & B. 647, and Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell, 11 App. Cas. 127, 34 W. R. Dig. 108.

Haldane, K.C. (F. R. Y. Radcliffe with him), for the defendants.—The plaintiffs' case can only rest on the doctrine laid down in Collen v. Wright or an implied representation as to genuineness. In Brown v. Howard Fire Insurance Co. no question as to the right to any indemnity was discussed, and Boston and Albany Railroad Co. v. Richardson turned on warranty of authority as based on Collen v. Wright. If the plaintiffs' case comes within the principle of Collen v. Wright, then their claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations, as the time would run from the breach of contract and not from the subsequent damage, and the subsequent damage would not take the case out of the statute: Gibbs v. Guild, 30 W. R. 407, 8 Q. B. D. 296, at p. 302, 30 W. R. 591, 9 Q. B. D. 59; Short v. McCarthy, 3 B. & Ald. 626. The question of indemnity or of a representation subsequently acted upon or fraudulent concealment does not arise here. The corporation were bound to keep their own register of shareholders: In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., 16 W. R. 862, L. R. 3 Q B. 584, per Cockburn, C.J. The defendants never represented that the transfer was genuine. They merely wrote the letter of the 15th of April, 1893, on a printed form enclosing the transfer. The corporation had the discretionary power of making such inquiry as they might think fit. In Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., Lindley, J., says, 5 Q. B. D., at p. 195, "And it appears to me that a duty is thrown on the company to look to their own register . . . and that duty the company owe to those who come with transfers, and I do not see any corresponding or conflicting duty on the part of the person who brings the transfer, except, of course, that of bringing what he believes to be an honest document. I think the true view is this, that there being no negligence in the sense of want of care on either side, but there being a duty on the part of the company to keep the register correct and themselves to look after the transfers between innocent parties, the loss must fall upon the company, and their claim for indemnity . . . fails." The law as to misrepresentation was considered in Leather v. Simpson, 19 W. R. 431, L. R. 11 Eq. 398, at p. 406; Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337; Beattie v. Lord Ebury, 22 W. R. 897, L. R. 7 H. L. 102; Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82; and in Oliver v. Bank of England, 50 W. R. 340, [1902] 1 Ch. 610. A misrepresentation is not actionable unless it is deceitful, or unless there is a special duty or obligation on the party to make it a representation. This action is only maintainable upon the ground of deceit or warranty of authority. It is admitted that there was no deceit; and there was no warranty of authority or any evidence to show that the defendants represented that they had authority.

The case of Robinson v. Reynolds, 2 Q. B. 196, and section 30 (1) of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1883, were also referred to.

Oct. 27.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment: The question raised in this action is one of very great importance. The action was brought by the Corporation of Sheffield against Messrs. Barclay & Co., the well-known bankers, to recover the sum of £11,487 17s. 5d., being the amount of principal and interest of certain corporation stock which belonged to certain trustees named Timbrell and Honnywill, and was transferred to a nominee of the defendants under a transfer purporting to be executed by Honnywill, but which, for the purpose of this action, must be taken to have been a forgery. The facts may be very briefly stated. Prior to the 13th of April, 1893, £8,500 Sheffield Corporation Redeemable Stock was transferred to the names of A. A. Timbrell and A. O. Honnywill, who were, I understand, trustees of a certain estate. The certificate of the stock in these names bearing date the 13th of April, 1893, was produced before me. The stock had stood in the name of Sutcliffe from 1886, but had been transferred, as I was informed, on the change of trustees to Timbrell and Honnywill on the 29th of March, 1893, and on the 13th of April, 1893, a certificate was issued in their names. Upon the 11th of April, 1893, a transfer of £8,200 of this stock to E. E. Barclay, a representative of the defendants, purporting to be executed by Timbrell and Honnywill, was handed to the defendants Barclay & Co. For the purpose of this case it must be taken that the signature of Honnywill to the transfer of the 11th of April was a forgery: see par. 5 of the statement of claim, and par. 1 of the defence. On the 15th of April, 1893, the defendants, Messrs. Barclay & Co., sent the transfer of the 11th to the corporation, enclosed in a letter in the following terms: "54, Lombard-street, London, E.C., 15th April, 1893. Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, Ransom, & Co., present their compliments to the registrar of the Sheffield Corporation and beg to send enclosed the transfer of £8,200 3½ per cent. 1883 stock, and will be obliged by his registering the same in the company's books in the new name of their Mr. E. E. Barclay, sending them the new certificates in due course. Messrs. Barclay & Co. also enclose the amount of the registration fee. The Registrar, Sheffield." This was followed by a letter of the 17th from Mr. Sarkas, the registrar, acknowledging the receipt, but pointing out that the registration fee had not been enclosed, and on the 18th of April Messrs. Barclay & Co. sent the registration fee. On the 28th of April, 1893, E. E. Barclay, the transferee named in the forged transfer of the 11th of April, executed a transfer of £8,000 of the stock to Messrs. Young and Macdonald, and upon the 12th of May, of the balance, £200, to Mary Florence Cockayne. Upon the 1st of June the plaintiffs issued certificates to Young and Macdonald for the £8,000 stock and to Mary Cockayne for the £200. In the year 1901 an action was brought by Honnywill against the corporation, claiming the rectification of the register by inserting his name as the holder of the £8,200 stock transferred to Barclay under the forged transfer and the interest and dividends paid thereon. In that action the jury found that the transfer was a forgery and had not been executed by Honnywill or with his authority, and for the purpose of this action it was agreed that the defendants were bound by that finding. The duties of the corporation in respect of the transfer of stock are controlled by sections 27 to 32 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1883. Reliance was placed by the plaintiffs upon the language of sub-section 4 of section 29, and by the defendants on sub-section 1 of section 30. There was no evidence before me either that the plaintiffs or their agents, or the defendants or the officials, were guilty of negligence, and I find as a fact that there was no negligence either on the part of the defendants or their agents, or on the part of the registrar or of any official of the corporation.

Before considering whether any of the above-mentioned statutory provisions have any material bearing upon the case I had better state my view of the law. The case for the plaintiffs was based on two main grounds which appear to me to involve the same considerations, although possibly somewhat different arguments may be used with regard to each ground. It was said first that the plaintiffs had done a lawful act at the request of the defendants, which lawful act had caused the plaintiffs damage, and that, therefore, the defendants were liable for the damage so caused to the plaintiffs. It was further contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that, even if the defendants were not liable because the plaintiffs had done an act at their request, the sending in of the transfer implied an undertaking by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs, or was a warranty by the defendants that the transferor had a right to transfer. A I have already said, it does not seem to me that the particular form in which the plaintiffs' claim is alleged is of much assistance in solving the question which has to be decided. The real question—and it is to my mind one of the greatest difficulty—is, what is the true nature of the request or representation, either made in fact or implied in law, from the act of sending in a transfer to be registered, or what is the nature of the transaction between the parties, and on whom should the loss fall as between two innocent parties if it turns out the transfer is forged? The plaintiffs relied strongly on the enunciation of the law contained in the judgment of Lord Esher in Dugdale v. Lovering, following Toplis v. Grane, and Betts v. Gibbins, to the effect that when an act has been done by the plaintiff under the express directions of the defendant which occasions an injury to the rights of third persons, yet if such an act is not apparently illegal in itself, but is done honestly and bonâ fide in compliance with the defendant's directions, the defendant is bound to indemnify the plaintiffs against the consequences thereof. As I ventured to point out in the course of the argument before me, there are undoubtedly cases in which our law recognizes that a request so acted upon does involve the party making the request in the obligation to indemnify the party who so acted. Such cases arise in connection with warranty of agency, representations made with regard to the custody of goods, and no doubt other instances might be given. The difficulty in this case is to decide whether the representations made or implied by the sending in of a transfer fall within the rule as enunciated by Tindal, C.J., in Toplis v. Grane or not. For the defendants great reliance was very naturally placed upon the judgment of Lord Lindley, then Lindley, J., in the case of Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., 5 Q. B. D., at p. 195. I have felt very much pressed by that opinion. It is that of a learned judge of very great experience in this branch of the law, and unusually qualified by that experience to lay down the rule. That the bearing of the opinion of Lord Lindley may be understood it will be convenient to make a brief statement of the facts which arose in the case of Simm v. The Anglo-American Telegraph Co. In that case a firm of the name of Burge, who stand in the position corresponding to that of Messrs. Barclay, presented to the Anglo-American Telegraph Co., through Messrs. Spurling and Skinner, acting on their behalf, a transfer purporting to be executed by one Coates, which was in truth a forgery. This transfer was registered by the company and the stock transferred into the names of Spurling and Skinner, who were in fact agents for Burge. The certificate of the stock, though prepared, had never been issued to Spurling and Skinner; so, as was pointed out in the Court of Appeal, no question of estoppel by the issue of the certificate arose, as in the cases of In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., and Hart v. Frontino, &c., Gold Mining Co., L. R. 5 Ex. 111, 18 W. R. Dig. C. L. 57. Before the case went to the Court of Appeal, Burge & Co. were joined as plaintiffs, so that the real question between them and the Anglo-American Co. was whether they could demand the issue of a certificate. The other plaintiffs in the first action, Messrs. Simm and others, had purchased the stock from Messrs. Burge & Co., and claimed that Messrs. Burge, their transferors, should be registered as holders. The other action was brought by the company against Spurling and Skinner, who had acted as agents for Burge in handing in the forged transfer, for an indemnity. Upon these facts the opinion of Lord Lindley, then Lindley, J., was expressed in the following terms: "And it appears to me that a duty is thrown on the company to look to their own register, which involves, of course, the looking after the transfer of stock or shares standing in the names of persons on the register; and that duty the company owe to those who come with transfers, and I do not see any corresponding or conflicting duty or the part of the person who brings the transfer, except, of course, that of bringing what he believes to be an honest document. I think the true view is this—that, there being no negligence in the sense of want of care on either side, but there being a duty on the part of the company to keep the register correct and themselves to look after the transfers between innocent parties, the loss must fall upon the company, and their claim for indemnity against Spurling and Skinner or against Burge & Co. fails. The utmost which the company are entitled to say is this: 'It was your duty not to produce to us, to be acted upon, any transfer which you knew or suspected to have been forged.' I think that the duty of the persons bringing the transfer does not go beyond this. Can the claim against Skinner and Spurling be sustained by looking at it from what I call a broader point of view? The first of these actions is brought against the company, and the second is in reality brought against Burge & Co. Can it be said, even if the question be looked at as between Burge & Co. on the one side and the company on the other, that the loss ought to fall on Burge & Co. rather than on the company? I do not think it can. It appears to me that the case is analogous to the case of a forged cheque, and as a banker paying a forged cheque to an innocent holder for value cannot recover back its amount and is compelled to pay it twice over, so here the company must pay the amount of the stock twice over. The duty being cast upon the company to look after the register and the transfers; it appears to me that between two innocent parties the company are not entitled to claim compensation from Burge & Co., nor to resist at Burge & Co.'s expense the recognition of that title which they themselves have created by their own act. It appears to me that Burge & Co. are entitled to say, 'We did not deceive you; you made inquiries, and you accepted us as stockholders and put us on the register, and you cannot now turn round and say that as between you and us we do not hold that position which you have led us to believe that we are entitled to.'" This is no doubt a very strong expression of opinion, and a very clearly expressed view. It proceeds from one of the most able and distinguished judges that has ever adorned the English bench. If I had thought that that opinion had been delivered after the full consideration of the point raised before me, and if it had not been the subject of further examination in the Court of Appeal, I should have felt bound by that decision, and I need scarcely repeat that in differing from it, as I feel bound to do, I do so with the very greatest diffidence and hesitation. When the case of Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. was considered in the Court of Appeal, the particular judgment in which that opinion was delivered was not reviewed by the Court of Appeal. The action by the Anglo-American Co. was against an agent of the persons who stand in the position of Messrs. Barclay in this case. When, therefore, that case came to be considered in that court, inasmuch as the decision was in favour of the company as against Burge, the person on whose behalf the forged transfer, purporting to be executed by Coates, had been presented to them, the company did not press their appeal in the action they had brought against Spurling; and Bramwell, L.J., at p. 205, dealing with the action against Spurling, said: "I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not express any opinion whether the second action would have been maintainable if any damage had accrued to the company; cogent arguments, no doubt, may be adduced in favour of either view; but the company are willing to pay the costs of the action brought by them rather than have a doubtful question discussed, and they are content that judgment be recorded against them, although technically they do not consent to it so as to preclude themselves from appealing, if it be wished to take the opinion of a higher tribunal." And the other Lords Justices expressed no opinion. I have, however, to consider how far the decision in Simm's case in the action brought by Simm against the company supports the plaintiff's claim in this case, or affords ground for questioning the principle of the decision laid down by Lord Lindley. It seems to me that the decision of the Court of Appeal did decide that as between two innocent parties, one of whom had innocently and without negligence handed in a forged transfer, upon which forged transfer the company were asked to act, the loss was to fall upon the person who handed in the transfer, or, in other words, that they brought that case within the rule to which I have referred, that when one of two innocent persons must suffer, the party who has innocently put forward the request upon which the other one has acted must bear the burden. If I am right in this view, then the opinion of Lindley, J., does not solve the question in this case, because he did not consider the case from the point of view of deciding which of two innocent parties must suffer the loss occasioned by the act done. It is to be noted in this case that, as pointed out by Mr. Bankes in the course of his argument, the damage occasioned by the defendants was not damage caused so much by the forged transfer having been sent in as by the defendants having themselves acted upon it and sent in the subsequent transfers to Macdonald and Cockayne. Simm's case decides that Messrs. Barclay could not have claimed to be registered—see judgment of Bramwell, L.J., at p. 203—so that the corporation were not estopped from denying that Barclay was a transferee until they had issued fresh certificates to Messrs. Young and Macdonald and Miss Cockayne: see In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., and Hart v. Frontino, &c. Gold Mining Co.

I therefore come to the conclusion that in this case, as between the two innocent persons, the plaintiffs and the defendants, the loss should be borne by the defendants, who innocently caused the plaintiffs to act upon an instrument which turned out to be invalid. Reliance was placed by Mr. Radcliffe upon the terms of the letter of the 15th of April. I do not base my judgment upon the express terms of that letter. It seems to me no more than an ordinary request to register, and in the same way the expression "duly executed" in sub-section 4 of section 29 does not, in my opinion, carry the case any further. With regard to sub-section 1 of section 30, relied upon by Mr. Haldane, I do not think it affords the defendants any defence—see the reasoning I have already referred to in the judgment of Bramwell, L.J., 5 Q. B. D., at p. 203—and, except as bearing upon a question of negligence, it does not seem to me that it affects the point which I have to decide. My attention was called by Mr. Danckwerts to two American cases, one that of the Boston and Albany Railroad Co. v. Richardson and Others, and the other that of Brown v. Howard Fire Insurance Co. The first of these cases is an undoubted decision in favour of the view presented by the plaintiffs, but I have not sufficient information as to the American law to say whether it is a direct authority, because it may be that the law as to innocent misrepresentation laid down by the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek, does not apply in that state of America. The case of

Oliver v. Bank of England does not appear to me to afford me much assistance. That case was based entirely on implied warranty, and the rule in Coleln v. Wright is undoubtedly left untouched by Derry v. Peek. Speaking for myself, I should not have decided in favour of the plaintiffs if it had been necessary to rely upon the doctrine of Collen v. Wright.

For the above reasons my judgment must be for the plaintiffs for the sum of £11,169 11s. 2d. As regards the other item, £318, unless some arrangement was made between the parties with regard to the costs of the action brought by Honnywill, I do not see how they can be recovered in this action; if, however, any arrangement was made, this can be set right before the judgment is finally entered.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) Dec. 17.

SMITH v. NORMANTON COLLIERY CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

A workman employed in a colliery was suspended from work for the day and told to go to the bottom of the pit. If he had immediately gone to the bottom of the pit he could not have been taken out of the pit for nearly three hours. Instead of going to the bottom of the pit he went into a "pass-by" and remained sitting there. When he had been there a little more than two hours he was accidentally injured by a fall of mineral. In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act the county court judge held that the workman was not entitled to compensation, on the ground that, though he was not guilty of serious and wilful misconduct, the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment.

Held, that the county court judge was justified in so holding.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Alfreton County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a boy of the age of sixteen, and was in the employment of the respondent colliery company as a gang boy.

On the 2nd of June, 1902, he was at work in the respondents' pit with two other boys under a "corporal" named Taylor.

About 1.15 an altercation took place between the applicant and Taylor, the result of which was that Taylor told him to put his clothes on and suspended him from work for the day.

There was a conflict of evidence as to whether Taylor told him to go to the bottom of the pit.

From the place where the applicant had been working a tramway ran to the bottom of the pit, which was distant about 240 yards.

The applicant went into a "pass-by" to put his clothes on, and then remained sitting in the pass-by instead of going to the bottom of the pit. If he had immediately gone to the bottom of the pit he could not have been taken out of the pit till 4 o'clock. About 1.30 the deputy of the colliery, a man named Lane, saw the applicant in the pass-by, and, on hearing his account of what had happened, told the applicant to go to the bottom of the pit. The applicant still continued sitting in the pass-by till 3 40, when he was accidentally injured by a fall of mineral.

The county court judge found that the applicant had not been guilty of serious and wilful misconduct, for, in his opinion, it was not proved that the corporal, Taylor, had ordered him to the pit-bottom, and, although the deputy, Lane, had done so, still the order had not been given in such a distinct and peremptory manner as to make disobedience to it serious and wilful misconduct considering the nature of the order. But he found that the applicant had no business and ought not, after having been stopped from work, to have stayed in the pass-by, and that as the accident happened to him over two hours after he had stopped work for the day, and in a place where he had at the time of the accident no right to be, the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondents.

The applicant appealed.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion the appeal fails. The applicant, in order to succeed, must show that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment. The applicant was a gang boy employed in the respondents' colliery, and a dispute took place in the pit between him and the corporal, Taylor, which resulted in Taylor's dismissing him for the day. There was a question whether at the same time Taylor ordered him to go to the bottom of the pit, where he would have to wait for between two and three hours before he could leave the pit. He went part of the way in that direction, and then went into one of the refuges made by the side of the tramway and stopped there. After some time he was seen there by the deputy of the colliery, and was told by him to go to the bottom of the pit. Nevertheless he remained there for two hours, when part of the roof came down and injured him.

The county court judge came to a decision in favour of the respondents, having arrived at the following findings of fact. [His lordship read the findings of the county court judge as stated above.] The grounds of that decision are grounds of fact, and inasmuch as there was evidence on which the county court judge could fairly come to that conclusion, and he has not misdirected himself on any point of law, this court ought not to interfere. It must be a question for masters and men to determine when and under what circumstances work shall be considered to have stopped. There must come a time, after a man has been suspended from work, when he cannot any longer be said to be acting in the course of his employment. It may be difficult to draw the line, but it is a question of fact in each particular case. Here the county court judge found that the applicant had received an order which debarred him from remaining where he was, and that at the time of the accident he was loitering in a place where he ought not to have been. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Perks & Son from a decision of his Honour Judge Smyly, K.C., given at the Derby and Long Eaton County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, so far as it declared that they were not entitled to indemnity by the third party.

The applicant for compensation was a plasterer named George Wagstaff, in the employment of the third party, Handel Firth.

Messrs. Perks & Son had contracted to build a house in Acton-road, Long Eaton, and they entered into a sub-contract with Firth for the plastering work of the whole building for a fixed sum, the labour alone to be found by Firth, and all materials and plant to be supplied by Perks & Son. While employed on the plastering work, Wagstaff was engaged in punching the "skimming," a mixture of lime, sand, and water used for a finishing coat, through a sieve, when some of the lime flew up and permanently injured his eye.

Wagstaff took proceedings against Perks & Son to recover compensation under the Act of 1897, and Perks & Son claimed to be indemnified by Firth, whom they brought in as a third party, under section 4 of the Act. At the hearing Perks & Son and Firth were represented, and took part in the proceedings, and in the result the learned judge made an award in favour of the applicant as against Perks & Son for 15s. 7½d. a week, being half his average weekly earnings. Upon the claim of Perks & Son to be indemnified by Firth, the county court judge held that the sub-contractor to be liable to indemnify the contractors must be a sub-contractor for a defined and substantial part of the construction of the building, thereby becoming an "undertaker," and that a person supplying labour alone was not an undertaker. He accordingly held that Perks & Son were not entitled to an indemnity from Firth. From that part of the decision which held the third party not liable Perks & Son appealed.

Hextall, for the appellants.—The decision of the arbitrator was given before Cooper v. Wright, [1902] A. C. 302 (ante, p. 12), was reported. On that authority is it clear that Firth was an undertaker because he had agreed to execute a substantial part of the work of construction, and therefore by section 4 he became liable to indemnify the undertakers of the whole work: Mason v. Dean, 48 W. R. 353, [1900] 1 Q. B. 770; Knight v. Cubitt & Co., 50 W. R. 113, [1902] 1 K. B. 31. The evidence shows that Firth was himself a contractor and not merely a workman. Simmons v. Faulds, 17 Times L. R. 352, and Bush v. Hawes, 50 W. R. 311, [1902] 1 K. B. 216, were also referred to.

The respondent Firth did not appear.

COLLINS, M.R., after stating the facts, said: The point here is whether Firth, the sub-contractor, is in these circumstances an "undertaker" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The claim of the appellants against the third party was made under section 4 of the Act of 1897, and the actual point now to be decided is whether Firth, the sub-contractor, from whom indemnity is claimed, ought to be held to be an "undertaker." That depends upon the definition of an "undertaker" in section 7 (2), which defines undertakers in the case of a building to mean "the person undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition." Having regard to Cooper v. Wright as decided in the House of Lords, Firth was an undertaker within the meaning of that term in the Act. The case of Cass v. Butler, 48 W. R. 309, [1900] 1 Q. B. 777, was overruled by the decision of the House of Lords in Cooper v. Wright. In Mason v. Dean it was decided by the Court of Appeal that the person who contracted with the building owner for the construction of a separate and special part of the building could be an undertaker, but that court stopped short of holding that a sub-contractor could be an "undertaker." Then the House of Lords decided in Cooper v. Wright that a sub-contractor might be an undertaker. Therefore, as to the particular parts of the work sub-contracted for, there might be two or more undertakers. That being so, the question now is, whether what this particular sub-contractor undertook to do constituted him an undertaker, considering he contracted to supply labour and do work in respect of a particular part of the building, though Perks & Son were to supply the materials and plant. I think it would be refining too much upon the decision in Cooper v. Wright if we were to hold that he was not an undertaker in respect of the plastering work. The contractors are therefore entitled to an indemnity over against the sub-contractor, and this appeal must accordingly be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

STUART v. FREEMAN. (a.)

Insurance (Life)—Premium, payment of—Premium payable by quarterly instalments—Instalment becoming due during currency of policy—Payment during days of grace after death of assured—Liability on policy.

The premium on an annual policy of life insurance was payable by quarterly instalments on certain specified days or within thirty days after. One of the conditions in the policy provided that in case a claim should arise during the subsistence of the policy and before all the premiums, whether half-yearly or quarterly, for the then current year should have become due and been paid, the amount of such premiums should be deducted from the sum assured: and the policy should become void if at the time of the death of the assured any of the above-mentioned premiums were more than thirty days in arrear. The assured, having assigned the policy, died after the day on which one of the quarterly instalments for the current year became due, but before the expiration of the thirty days of grace, without having paid the instalment. The assignee, after the death of the assured, paid the instalment within the thirty days, both he and the insurers being unaware of the death of the assured. In an action on the policy by the assignee against the insurers to recover the amount of the policy moneys,

Held, that as the insurance was for a year, subject to a condition for forfeiture if any of the quarterly instalments were not paid within thirty days after they became due, the payment of the instalment within the thirty days of grace during the subsistence of the policy, though after the death of the assured, was a valid payment, and the assignee was entitled to recover.

Pritchard v. Merchants' Life Assurance Society, 6 W. R 340, 3 C. B. N. S. 622, discussed.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Ridley, J., and a special jury.

The action was brought to recover £2,500 upon a policy of insurance granted by the General Life Assurance Co., of which company Mr. Freeman, the defendant, was the manager, upon the life of the Hon. Francis Charles Lawley. The policy, which was dated the 18th of November, 1899, was assigned to the plaintiff as security for a debt due to him. The policy stated that "in consideration of the Honourable Francis Charles Lawley"—describing him—"(hereinafter called the 'assured') having paid to the General Life Assurance Co. (hereinafter called the company) the sum of £105 on account of the premium for one year terminating on the 17th of November, 1900, for an assurance of the sum of £2,500 upon the life of the assured for the whole continuance thereof, the company hereby agree that in case the said assured shall die before or upon that day, or shall survive that day, and there shall be paid to the company a like premium before, upon, or within thirty days after the day above mentioned, and in every succeeding year during which the said assured shall be living, the capital, stocks, and funds of the company shall, according and subject to the provisions of the deed of settlement of the company and the conditions indorsed hereon, be liable to pay to the assured, his executors, administrators, or assigns, after proof satisfactory to the directors of the company of the age and death of the said assured, the sum of £2,500, but the assured shall not be entitled to participate in the profits of the company." The premium was stated to be, if paid annually, £404 11s. 8d. on every 18th day of November; if paid half-yearly, £207 7s. 11d. on every 18th day of November and 18th day of May; if paid quarterly, £105 on every 18th day of November, 18th day of February, 18th day of May, and 18th day of August. The material conditions indorsed on the policy were the following: "(1) The assured has the option of paying the premiums half-yearly or quarterly instead of annually, in which case such half-yearly or quarterly premium, as the case may be, shall be the amount, and be payable, on the days hereinbefore respectively mentioned. Provided nevertheless that in case a claim shall arise at any time during the subsistence of this policy, and before all the premiums, whether half-yearly or quarterly, for the then current year, commencing at a date corresponding with the commencement of this policy, shall have become due and been paid, then and in such case the amount of such half-yearly or quarterly premium so not having become due and been paid shall be deducted from the sum assured by this policy, and the remainder of such last-mentioned sum shall be alone payable to the assured, his executors, administrators, or assigns. Provided also that this policy shall, subject to the condition next hereunder appearing, be null and void and of no effect if at the time of the death of the person upon whose life this policy is granted any of the above-mentioned premiums, as well half-yearly or quarterly as annual, shall be more than thirty days in arrear." "(2) In the event of the lapse of this policy by non-payment of any premium within thirty days of its becoming due, it may be revived as follows: (a) When the surrender value at the time of its lapse shall equal or exceed such premium, the policy shall be revived upon the application of the assured, his executors, administrators, or assigns, within twelve calendar months from the lapse, without medical examination, and notwithstanding the death in the meantime of the person upon whose life the policy is granted, upon payment of the overdue premium, together with interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum, and a fee at the rate of 2s. for each £100 assured, but any moneys owing to the company on the security of the policy shall be considered as a deduction from the surrender value in estimating the same for the purposes of this condition; (b) in cases not falling within the above regulation, the policy may be revived within twelve calendar months upon a medical report on the state of health of the person upon whose life the policy is granted satisfactory to the directors being furnished, and the payment of the overdue premium, together with interest and a fee at the above-mentioned rate." "(6) When a policy has been one year in force, and has had the age of the life admitted thereon, it shall thereafter, subject only to the punctual payment of the ordinary premium and extra premium (if any), be indisputable on any ground whatever, except fraud."

On the 17th of September, 1901, the quarterly premium due on the 18th of August had been in arrear thirty days. On the 18th of September the plaintiff paid and received a receipt for the premium then overdue. It appeared that Lawley died on the 18th of September before the premium was paid, though the fact of his death was unknown to both the plaintiff and the insurance company. The company refused to pay the plaintiff upon the policy, on the ground that at the time of the death of Mr. Lawley the policy had become void by reason of the premium being in arrear, and that the policy could not be revived after the death of the person insured. The jury found that before August, 1900, the plaintiff's clerk told a clerk of the insurance company that it was difficult to obtain the premiums from Mr. Lawley, but that if Mr. Lawley did not pay the premiums within the thirty days' grace he would bring the money on the next day, and the insurance company's clerk assented to this course; and that the clerk had authority from the insurance company to make the above arrangement.

Ridley, J., held, upon the authority of Pritchard v. Merchants', &c., Life Assurance Society, 6 W. R. 340, 3 C. B. N. S. 622, that the payment of the premium after the death of the assured, though upon the findings of the jury it must be taken to have been made within the thirty days of grace, was not a valid payment binding upon the insurance company. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

J. E. Bankes, K.C., and Arthur Powell, K.C., for the plaintiff.—According to the findings of the jury the insurance company agreed to accept the premium if paid on the day next after the expiration of the thirty days of grace as if it had been paid within the thirty days. The instalment of the premium in question must therefore be taken to have been paid within the thirty days, though after the death of the assured. In Pritchard v. Merchants', &c., Life Assurance Society, the premium was paid after the days of grace had expired and after the death of the assured, and in those circumstances the court held that the defendants were not liable. The observations of Willes, J., in that case, upon which Ridley, J., based his judgment, were merely dicta, and were in no way necessary for the decision. The policy in the present case was for a year, though the premium was payable by quarterly instalments. The policy, therefore, was a subsisting policy when the assured died, and there was no question here, as there was in Pritchard v. Merchants', &c., Life Assurance Society, as to the renewal of the policy for another year by the payment of the premium at the end of the year. The judgment was therefore wrong.

Duke, K.C., and Ellis Hill (A. W. Wills with them), for the defendant.—In the event of the assured dying within the days of grace before payment of the premium, the days of grace were gone and the policy lapsed: Simpson v. Accidental Death Insurance Co., 5 W. R. 307, 2 C. B. N. S. 257. Days of grace are allowed with reference to an insurance in the future, and if the assured dies within the days of grace and before payment of the premium there is no life to insure. The dicta in Pritchard v. Merchants', &c., Assurance Society are directly in the defendants' favour.

They also referred to Want v. Blunt, 12 East 183, and Tarleton v. Staniforth, 5 T. R. 695.

A. Powell, K.C., in reply.—Simpson v. Accidental Death Insurance Co. was the case of an accident policy, and totally different considerations apply. That case has no application to the present.

COLLINS, M.R.—The jury have accepted the evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses as to the circumstances in which the premium came to be paid on the day in question and rejected that of the defendants' witnesses. The facts of the case are peculiar, because the premium was paid on the thirty-first day after it became due—that is to say, on the day after the expiration of the thirty days of grace—and the assured died on that very day before the payment was made, though this fact was not known at the time of payment either to the plaintiff or the insurance company. The question is whether in the circumstances that is a good payment of the premium so as to keep the policy alive. In my opinion there was evidence upon which the jury might reasonably find that the payment in question, which was the last of the quarterly instalments of the annual premium, was received by the insurance company's clerk on the thirty-first day under an arrangement with the plaintiff with the authority of the company. That makes the payment on the thirty-first day equivalent to payment within the thirty days of grace. That raises the question of law whether such a payment can be a valid payment, the assured being dead at the time.

Ridley, J., held, upon the authority of Pritchard v. Merchants', &c., Life Assurance Society, that it was not a valid payment. That case, so far as it touched upon this point, is not a decision of the court, but the observations are merely dicta, though no doubt very weighty dicta. The case, however, did not decide the point now before us. In that case there was an annual premium payable for an annual insurance at the beginning of each year of insurance, and one of the annual premiums was paid after the days of grace had expired and at a time when the assured was dead. The point was put most clearly by Willes, J., where, after stating the contention that the allowance of thirty days of grace was absolutely to extend the period for the payment of the premium, so that if the assured should die within the thirty days the company were bound to accept the money though the assured was dead at the time of payment, he proceeds (3 C. B. N. S., at p. 643): "The inclination of my opinion—if it be necessary to express one, and perhaps it is, for it has an important bearing on the case—is that the thirty days are given only with reference to insurance for future years, and that, notwithstanding the life has become less valuable, the company are bound to go on insuring future years provided the future premiums are paid within thirty days after the expiration of each period of insurance." Therefore the learned judge was there dealing with a premium payable annually for an annual insurance which had run out. There the provision in the policy as to the payment of the premium in future years entitled the assured to insure for the ensuing year at the same rate of premium. That, the court thought, did not get rid of the suggested fundamental condition that the assured must be alive at the time when the premium was paid. That was not decided in that case, but was merely the opinion of some of the learned judges. Those remarks, however, whether well founded or not, have reference to the payment of an annual premium for an annual insurance.

In the present case there is an annual premium payable by quarterly instalments, and the question arises here in respect of the payment of a quarterly instalment in the course of the year when some of the instalments for that year had already been paid, and not in respect of the first instalment of the premium for the insurance for the coming year. The introduction of the system of quarterly payments of the premium does not in any way affect or qualify the annual insurance. It was not, as in Pritchard v. Merchants', &c., Life Assurance Society, a premium paid for the renewal of the insurance for another year, which the court in that case seemed to think presupposed an existing life. The policy here is an annual policy, and the premium is an annual premium payable for that annual insurance by quarterly instalments. The scheme of the policy is that the insurance should continue for the year unless there was some default creating a forfeiture. In any ordinary case a policy runs out at the end of the year of insurance, and the premium is paid for the purpose of renewing the policy for the ensuing year, and not for the sake of avoiding a forfeiture of the policy during the current year of an existing policy. In the present case the policy had not run out, and the payment of the quarterly instalment of the premium within the days of grace was made in order to avoid a forfeiture of the policy, and not for the purpose of renewing the policy for another year. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The findings of the jury, which we ought not to disturb, make the payment of the quarterly instalment of the premium as if it had been made within the thirty days. The question thus arises whether the insurance company are free from all obligation to pay the insurance moneys. For my part I prefer to decide this question upon the wording of the policy. I by no means say that the reasoning upon which I base my judgment may not be applicable to other policies. In my opinion the moneys have become payable under the very words of the policy, and I can see no reason why the words should not be adhered to. There is an express provision in the policy for the payment of the renewal premium on or before the last day of the first or any succeeding year or within thirty days after that day, and in that case the policy is to continue in force. The first condition in the policy seems to me to be decisive of this case. By that condition the assured has the option of paying the premiums half-yearly or quarterly instead of annually, and the proviso at the end is as follows: "Provided also that this policy shall, subject to the condition next hereunder appearing, be null and void and of no effect if at the time of the death of the person upon whose life this policy is granted, any of the above-mentioned premiums, as well half-yearly or quarterly, as annual, shall be more than thirty days in arrear." Presumably, therefore, the policy was to be continuing and valid, covering the case of the assured dying within the thirty days of grace, even though the half-yearly or quarterly premium had not been paid. I refer now to a most important provision immediately preceding that which I have just read: "Provided, nevertheless, that in case a claim shall arise at any time during the subsistence of this policy, and before all the premiums, whether half-yearly or quarterly, for the then current year, commencing at a date corresponding with the commencement of this policy, shall have become due and been paid, then, and in such case, the amount of such half-yearly or quarterly premium so not having become due and been paid shall be deducted from the sum assured by this policy, and the remainder of such last-mentioned sum shall be alone payable to the assured, his executors, administrators, or assigns."

I have already pointed out that the policy was a subsisting policy during the whole of the thirty days of grace. A death occurs during the thirty days before the premium, whether half-yearly or quarterly, has been paid. In such a case there is an express provision that there shall be deducted from the moneys payable under the policy the amount of the unpaid half-yearly or quarterly premium, and the balance shall be payable to the assured's representatives. The case comes within the very words of the policy, and the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It has been said that the true effect of the clause allowing the premium to be paid within thirty days after the day on which it becomes due is that it is merely an offer by the insurance company to renew the policy upon payment of the premium within the thirty days. That point seems to have been glanced at rather than decided in Pritchard v. Merchants', &c., Life Assurance Society. The policy in the present case was for a year, and the premium in question was a quarterly instalment of the annual premium which fell due during the currency of the policy. I am unable to accept the suggestion that the provision as to the days of grace merely amounts to a continuous offer by the insurance company to renew the policy upon payment of the premium within the days of grace. Not a single case can be found in the books in which this contention has been set up by an insurance company. In my opinion the true meaning of the days of grace is that if the premium is paid within that time it must be taken to have been paid on the day when it fell due. This appeal must be allowed.

Action for infringement of two trade-marks; motion by defendants to strike trade-marks off the register.

The plaintiff and the defendants in the action were ladies' outfitters, and dealt in corsets.

The plaintiff was the registered proprietor of two trade-marks used in connection with corsets. One of these was a device, the other consisted of the word "Swanbill."

It was alleged that the defendants had infringed both trade-marks.

The defendants gave notice of motion to rectify the register of trade-marks by striking out both marks. The action and the motion were tried together.

At the trial the defendants abandoned their motion so far as it related to the device, but persisted in it so far as regarded the word "Swanbill."

The facts in regard to the "Swanbill" mark were as follows: Some time before 1875 the plaintiff's predecessor in title introduced into this country a corset with a particular shape of busk. He gave this corset the name of "Swanbill" as being descriptive of the shape of the busk, and in 1876 he registered this name as a trade-mark.

Certain fees payable in respect of this registration remained unpaid for many years, and in the course of 1892 the Comptroller of Patents addressed a communication to the plaintiff calling his attention to the fact and to the provisions of section 79 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, under which the comptroller is empowered to remove a mark from the register when fees remain unpaid fourteen years after registration.

By some mischance this letter never came into the plaintiff's hands till some months later, and in the meantime the comptroller had removed the mark from the register.

When at last the comptroller's communication came to his notice, the plaintiff went immediately to the Patent Office desiring to pay the fees and protect the registration of his mark, but was informed by the comptroller that the only course now open to him was to effect a fresh registration of the word "Swanbill" as an old mark under sub-section 3 (ii.) of section 64 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, as amended by section 10 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1888.

The plaintiff accordingly so registered the word "Swanbill" on the 13th of December, 1892.

The last-named provision of the Patents, &c., Act, is as follows: "Any special and distinctive word or words . . . used as a trade-mark before the 13th day of August, 1875, may be registered as a trade-mark under this part of this Act."

There was evidence that, notwithstanding the original registration of the word "Swanbill" in 1876, the word had in 1892, and for some years previously, come to be used and understood in the trade as descriptive of a particular shape of corsets, and not as distinctive of corsets manufactured or sold by the plaintiff. This, however, was disputed.

The defendants had for some time before the bringing of this action been aware of the registration of the word "Swanbill" by the plaintiff, and had in no way asserted a right to have the register rectified.

Upjohn, K.C., and Sebastian (T. F. C. Tomlin with them), for the defendants in the action.—The evidence shows that the word "Swanbill" was not at the time of the registration in 1892 "special and distinctive"—that is, distinctive of the plaintiff's goods.

Jenkins, K.C., and Peterson, for the plaintiff in the action.—The evidence shows the contrary. But in any case such a motion must be made as "speedily as possible": per Jessel, M.R., in In re Hyde & Co.'s Trade-Mark, 26 W. R. 625, 7 Ch. D. 724, cited by Bacon, V.C., in Ransome v. Graham, 51 L. J. Ch. 897, 31 W. R. Dig. 198.

R. J. Parker, for the Comptroller of Patents.—The power of the court to remove an entry from the register is a power to be exercised in the interests of the public and not of the individual applicant.

Upjohn, K.C., in reply.—The passage cited from the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Hyde's case is obiter dictum. The contention of the Comptroller of Patents is supported by the expressions of Lindley, M.R., in In re Batt & Co.'s Trade-Mark, 46 W. R. 459, [1898] 2 Ch. 432, and by Eno v. Dunn, 15 App. Cas. 252, 30 W. R. Dig. 200. This being so, "the merits or demerits of the applicant are irrelevant," as was said by Chitty, J., in In re Hill's Trade-Mark, 10 Rep. Pat. Cas. 113. Moreover, the applicant's delay in such a case is no hardship to the person whose mark is to be removed from the register. So none of the reasons why delay is in certain cases made a bar to equitable relief apply in this case.

Jenkins, K.C., replied to R. J. Parker.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, said: In re Wood's Trade-Mark, 32 Ch. D. 247, 34 W. R. Dig. 199, makes it clear that section 64 of the Patents Act must be taken as requiring that the word or words to be registered shall be "special and distinctive" at the date of the registration, and shall not merely have been "special and distinctive" at some previous time. Now, in this case, on the evidence before me, I have no difficulty in finding that the word "Swanbill" was not, at the date of registration in 1892, and for some time previously had not been, "special and distinctive." As one of the witnesses put it, the name signifies the shape—that is, it does not signify the maker. It is, therefore, however much I regret it (for the plaintiff has been very unfortunate), imperative on me to hold that he did not fulfil the requirements of the Act, and that the registration cannot be supported. Indeed, it is doubtful whether a word which, like this, is admittedly invented to describe a shape, can ever be also special and distinctive of one person's manufacture: see per Fry, L.J., in In re Leonard & Ellis's Trade-Mark, 32 W. R. 530, 26 Ch. D. 288. It has been said, however, that the applicant is disentitled to this relief through his delay. Now, delay might in such a case as this be sufficient to prevent an applicant from succeeding, but only when the respondent had thereby been put at a disadvantage in bringing evidence to prove his title. But in this case the respondent has been at no such disadvantage. Moreover, the success of the application is in this case not the applicant's own affair alone, but the affair of the public, whose interests ought not to be prejudiced by his delay. The considerations of general principle which have been adduced in this connection relate to cases which have no true analogy with this case. They apply to cases where the auxiliary jurisdiction of courts of equity is invoked. When an application for specific performance is refused for delay, the claimant has still his common law remedy. Moreover, in such cases a consideration of the position of third parties comes in, but here that consideration tells only against the respondent. I have, then, no option but to rectify the register by directing that the plaintiff's registered trade-mark of the word "Swanbill" be struck out as regards corsets. Under the circumstances, however, and having regard to the defendants' delay, I shall not give them costs. But the comptroller is entitled to his costs, and these, I understand, the other parties agree to divide between them.

The action then proceeded with regard to the alleged infringement of the plaintiff's remaining trade-mark.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Jenkins, K.C., and Peterson, for the plaintiff.

Upjohn, K.C., and Sebastian (T. F. C. Tomlin with them), for the defendants.

Jenkins, K.C., in reply.

FARWELL, J.—The plaintiff, Mr. Addley Bourne, is the registered proprietor of a trade-mark—namely, a swan swimming with two cygnets with a background of bulrushes. He used this trade-mark in connection with the sale of ladies' corsets. He brings this action to restrain Messrs. Swan & Edgar from infringing this trade-mark. The alleged infringement is contained in an advertisement of a corset which appeared in the Ladies' Field and in a catalogue issued by the defendants, and consists in a representation of a lady not otherwise than comely wearing a corset with her back to a mirror and with two swans holding in their bills a scroll with the words "Swan Corset" imprinted on it. The question which I have to determine is whether these swans are calculated to mislead customers into buying goods of the defendants under the impression that they are the goods of the plaintiff.

I have first to observe that it is not now, and, whatever may have been the old law, has not been, since Millington v. Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338, necessary to prove fraud in a case of this kind. The injury to the plaintiff is the same whether the defendant knowingly causes the public to be deceived or whether he does it in the honest belief that he is doing nothing misleading: compare Orr, Ewing, & Co. v. Johnston & Co., 28 W. R. 330, 13 Ch. D. 434. Fraud, therefore, is not at all necessary, and it is only fair to say that in this case there is not the smallest evidence of it, nor has it ever been charged.

Secondly, it was not necessary in the old Court of Chancery, and is not now necessary, to prove that any person has actually been deceived. Of course, the fact, if proved, that a person of ordinary intelligence has been deceived is very material to assist the court. But even the evidence that some one person has been deceived is not conclusive. Malins, V.C., in Civil Service Supply Association, 13 Ch. D. 512, disregarded the evidence of a witness who said he had been actually deceived: see also per Lord O'Hagan in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson, 26 W. R. 664, 3 App. Cas. 376, at p. 395. Moreover, in many cases the question arises when the plaintiff finds that the defendant is about to flood the market with labels to which he objects, and before there can have been actual deception.

Thirdly, it is a question of some little interest what evidence is admissible. There may be no evidence of any person being actually deceived, and this is not necessary. It has been laid down in the House of Lords in North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. v. Manchester Brewery Co., [1899] A. C. 83, 47 W. R. Dig. 192, see per Lord Halsbury, at p. 85, and is finally settled, that it is not a proper question to put to a witness whether the thing complained of is calculated to deceive. One ground for this is that that question is the very question in issue. It appears to me that there are also other reasons for it. How can you call expert evidence as to what is human nature, and what, therefore, the witness thinks the rest of the world would be likely to believe? And, apart from this difficulty, there is in most people a certain proneness to think that other people are more foolish than they really are. Carlyle is not alone in thinking that mankind are mostly fools. It only remains that one should call the evidence of people who will say that they themselves would have been likely to be deceived, and nobody likes to give evidence of his own foolishness. It results, therefore, that unless the matter is left to the eye or ear of the judge, there can be no evidence.

I have said this because of a recent decision of the Court of Appeal which has been thought to be to the contrary effect—viz., London General Omnibus Co. v. Lavell, [1901] 1 Ch. 135, 49 W. R. Dig. 144. But before I discuss that decision I wish to refer to certain earlier cases which show that the test in these cases is the eyesight or the hearing of the judge. Malins, V.C., in the case of Civil Service Supply Association, to which I have already referred, disregarded the evidence of a witness who said that he had himself been deceived. In an earlier case in the House of Lords, Holdsworth v. McCrea, 16 W. R. 226, L. R. 2 H. L. 380, which was a case of copying a design for ornamenting woven fabrics, Lord Westbury, L. R. 2 H. L., at p. 388, says that in such a case "the appeal is to the eye." In The Hecla Foundry Co. v. Walker, Hunter, & Co., 14 App. Cas. 550, 38 W. R. Dig. 65, Lord Herschell, 14 App. Cas., at p. 555, says: "It seems to me that the eye must be the judge in such a case as this, and that the question must be determined by placing the designs side by side and asking whether they are the same or whether the one is an obvious imitation of the other." And in North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. v. Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited), which was a case of similarity of names, Lord Halsbury, in the judgment to which I have already referred, says, [1899] A. C., at p. 85, that for his own part he would not have required such evidence as had been called to show the deceptive effect of the appellant company's name, for when he found well-known names associated together as that of a new company he would himself have jumped to the conclusion that the two old companies were amalgamating together. Payton v. Snelling, [1901] A. C. 308, 49 W. R. Dig. 177, was a case of alleged copying of the get-up of the plaintiff's canisters. Lord Macnaghten in that case said [1901] A. C., at p. 311, that the question whether a customer was likely to be deceived, was not a matter for a witness, but for the judge. "The judge," he said, "looking at the exhibits before him, and also paying due attention to the evidence adduced, must not surrender his own independent judgment to any witness." I now come to the case of the London General Omnibus Co., which has been referred to as being to the contrary effect. In my opinion that case has no bearing on passing off. The Court of Appeal, whether rightly or wrongly it is not for me to say, treated that case as an action of deceit. In the beginning of his judgment, and twice in the course of the argument, the Lord Chief Justice explicitly calls the action an action of deceit, and throughout the Court of Appeal appear to have treated it from that point of view. That point of view is not relevant in a passing off case. For this distinction between the common law action of deceit and the equitable remedy in cases like the present is old. I may refer, in addition to the cases of which I have already spoken, to Edelsten v. Edelsten, 11 W. R. 328, 1 De G. J. & S. 185, a case before Lord Westbury, and to the judgment of Lord Blackburn in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, 31 W. R. 325, 8 App. Cas. 15. These cases make it obvious that the Court of Appeal dealt with the London General Omnibus Co.'s case as an action of deceit, for, if not, it would have been impossible for them to exclude the eyesight of the judge. They cannot have intended to overrule these Lord Chancellors in the House of Lords, and, if they had, they would themselves have been overruled by the House of Lords case of Payton v. Snelling.

Coming now to the facts before me, no suggestion of intentional deceit has been made against the defendants. I have had before me the artist who designed their advertisement, and he has explained that he put in these swans entirely of his own idea. They are, to my mind, as distinct from the plaintiff's swans as swans can be. I cannot believe that any reasonable person would be led by this pretty picture to believe that in buying the defendants' goods he was buying those of the plaintiff. The action must therefore be dismissed.

On the question of costs, the plaintiff has failed in his action, and the defendant has failed as to part of his motion, and, as to the other part, has succeeded, but not got his costs; the parties are not prepared to agree as to the order that should be made. Now it will be difficult for the taxing-master to decide how the various costs incurred in this litigation should be distributed. I have a jurisdiction to settle the matter myself while the state of the evidence is fresh in my mind, and to save the taxing-master from difficulty, the parties from expense, and the court from future trouble, I accordingly direct that the plaintiff should pay to the defendants two-fifths of the entire costs of the plaintiff and defendants of the motion and the action together. It has already been agreed that the plaintiff and the defendants should bear the costs of the comptroller in equal shares.

Jenkins, K.C., asked for a certificate under section 77a of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, that the right of the plaintiff to the exclusive use of the trade-mark, as to which the defendants had not proceeded with their motion, had come in question in an action.

FARWELL, J.—I cannot give this certificate. The defendants gave notice of motion to expunge this mark, but have not proceeded with it, and the question of the plaintiff's right on this point has not been tried. I am therefore unwilling to make an order, the effect of which would be to mulct in solicitor and client costs any person against whom the plaintiff may hereafter successfully bring an action for infringement of this trade-mark.

MARSH v. REDGATE. (a.)

Power — Appointment — Real estate — Legal estate in trustees of instrument creating power—Execution—Devise to trustees of will on trust for sale and appointment of proceeds among objects.

The principle of Kenworthy v. Bate, 6 Ves. 793, that a power of appointing real estate authorizes a devise to trustees for sale and an appointment of the money produced by the sale, applies to a case where the legal estate is vested in the trustees of the instrument creating the power.

A deed contained a limitation of real estate to the use of trustees upon trust to convey the same to such issue of the donee of the power, and "for such estate or estates, manner, and form" as she should by will appoint.

Held, that the power was well exercised by a devise by the donee, of the real estate to trustees of her will upon trust for sale and division of the proceeds among objects of the power.

Action with witnesses.

By indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 25th and 26th of December, 1834, certain hereditaments were limited to Henry Attenborough and George Eddowes, their heirs and assigns, upon trust as to one moiety (after certain prior estates and interests which have long since determined) to "convey and assure" the same "unto such one or more child or children or issue of the body of Elizabeth Redgate, and for such estate or estates, manner and form, as she" by will, notwithstanding coverture, should "give, devise, or dispose of the same, and in default of such gift, devise, or disposition in trust to convey and assure" the same moiety unto the child or children of the said Elizabeth Redgate and the heirs of their respective bodies as therein mentioned, with remainder as Elizabeth Redgate should by will, notwithstanding coverture, appoint.

By her will, Elizabeth Redgate, who died in 1873, bequeathed her personal estate to a trustee upon trust for conversion and investment and to apply the income in the same manner as was therein mentioned with respect to the rents of her real estate. And in exercise of the power contained in the deed of 1834, and of every other power enabling her, she devised and appointed all "her" real estates and hereditaments, shares of real estates, and also any other over which she had any power of appointment, to a trustee upon trust to receive the rents thereof, and to hold the same in trust for her two grandchildren, John William Redgate and the defendant, in equal moieties, as and when they should respectively attain the age of twenty-one years. The will contained a direction that immediately after the younger of her two grandchildren should attain that age her trustee should sell the said real estate, and should hold the proceeds upon trust to divide the same equally between them.

John William Redgate and the defendant attained the age of twenty-one years in 1881 and 1884 respectively.

John William Redgate died in 1887, intestate, leaving a widow, Lucy Emily Redgate, but no issue, and leaving the defendant his heir-at-law. The defendant took out letters of administration to J. W. Redgate, and is also the present sole trustee under the will of Elizabeth Redgate.

The real estate comprised in the deed of 1834 has not been sold, but an action is now proceeding for sale thereof in lieu of partition. No new trustees of that deed have ever been appointed.

Lucy Emily Redgate died in 1902, and the plaintiffs are her executors.

In the present action the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the trust for sale contained in the will of Elizabeth Redgate was a valid trust for sale of the real estate appointed by such will, and effected a conversion of such real estate as from the date when the defendant attained his majority.

The defendant denied this, and contended that, even if this was the case, the subsequent conduct of John William Redgate and the defendant had shown an election on the part of each to retain the property as real estate, that it was thereby reconverted, and that, consequently, on the death of J. W. Redgate his moiety devolved as real estate.

The question as to conversion was first argued.

Astbury, K.C., and E. Ford, for the plaintiffs.—A power to appoint real estate is well executed by a devise to trustees to sell and an appointment of the money produced by the sale: Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), p. 227, Kenworthy v. Bate, 6 Ves. 793; In re Paget, 46 W. R. 328, [1898] 1 Ch. 290. It is immaterial that the legal estate is outstanding in the trustees of the original settlement. The testatrix has in fact exercised the power in that manner, and consequently there was a conversion as from the time that the defendant attained the age of twenty-one years.

Buckmaster, K.C., and H. M. Humphry, for the defendant.—It is only where the limitations are legal that the power can be thus executed; for in such a case a power to appoint to a use includes a power to deal with the legal estate. In the absence of a power to appoint the legal estate, a trust for sale is inoperative, because it cannot be executed without the concurrence of the trustees of the settlement, and they have no power to convey the legal estate without the consent of their cestui que trust: Biggs v. Peacock, 31 W. R. 148, 22 Ch. D. 284. The principle of Kenworthy v. Bate, therefore, does not apply; testatrix has imposed on the estate a trust which it will not bear, and hence there has been no conversion.

Astbury, K.C., in reply.—If the legal estate is outstanding in trustees, the donee of the power can compel them to concur, for the appointment is good in equity: Thornton v. Bright, 2 My. & Cr. 230.

The following cases were also cited: Roberts v. Dixwell, 1 Atk. 607; Fowler v Cohn, 4 W. R. 412, 21 Beav. 360; and Cowx v. Foster, 1 Joh. & Hem. 30; 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 55.

BUCKLEY, J.—In Thwaytes v. Dye, 2 Vern. 80, the limitation was legal—to the use of such children as J. S. should appoint. It was held that the donee of the power could charge the land with a sum of money to be paid to the children, and that he was not limited to naming a person to take the estate. That was in 1688. In 1802, in Kenworthy v. Bate, the limitations were again legal—"to the use of such child or children of" the donee of the power and his wife as he should by will "direct, limit, and appoint." It was held that the power was well exercised by a devise to trustees upon trust to sell, and an appointment of the money produced by the sale. At the conclusion of his judgment Grant, M.R., says: "Does not a power to give include a power to sell for the purpose of giving the money instead of the land?" In 1860 Page Wood, V.C., in Cowse v. Foster, held that a limitation "to such uses, upon and for such trusts, intents, and purposes, and with, under, and subject to such powers, provisos, and declarations" as the donee of the power should by will appoint, "so only that every such appointment be made in favour of a child or children," was well executed by a devise upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds among her children. In Fowler v. Cohn the limitations were again legal—"to the use of" such children, "for such estates" and "in such manner and form" as A. B. should appoint. It was held that they authorized an appointment to trustees to sell and divide the proceeds between the objects. Romilly, M.R., said: "I find it quite settled by the authorities that a general power of disposition of the whole property includes a power of sale, and consequently the power of sale is incidental to the power of disposition of the property in such manner and form, although the original will does not expressly include a direct power of sale."

In all the cases to which I have referred there was a legal limitation. The deed of 1834, with which I have to deal, leaves the legal estate in trustees; the limitation is "to the use of trustees," followed by a trust of the rents for the lives of certain persons, and then on the death of the survivor of two persons on trust that the trustees should convey and assure one moiety of the hereditaments and premises thereby granted "unto such one or more child or children or issue of the body of the said E. Redgate, and for such estate or estates, manner and form" as she should by will "give, devise, or dispose of the same." The argument is, that it is not competent to her to give the property by means of a trust for sale and division of the proceeds. First, on the language of the deed, you cannot give effect to the words "manner and form," unless they are contrasted with the words "estates or estate." I think that the words include a power to do something other than give an estate to children—that she may give to a child in some manner and form an interest in the property which shall not be the estate in the property itself.

Secondly, apart from the form of the language of the deed, is there any variance to show an impossibility of conversion, and distinguishing this case from Kenworthy v. Bate? I should have thought that the inference was rather the other way. When the limitations are legal the donee takes the legal estate by virtue of the language of the power, and you find that the settlor intended that he should take the land as land. Under these limitations the original deed does not convey the legal estate under the Statute of Uses, but there is a trust to convey it. Under Kenworthy v. Bate the donee gets it by virtue of the limitations contained in the settlement itself. In this case he gets it through the execution of the trust to convey to him by the trustees in whom the legal estate is vested by the settlement. I should have thought that this was an a fortiori case in favour of the possibility of conversion and a trust for conversion followed by a gift of the proceeds. I am told that this cannot be so, because the trustees of the will cannot effect a sale, because they have not got the legal estate, and have to go to the original trustees of the settlement, in whom it is vested. I do not see that that makes any difficulty; for if they execute the trust they can carry out the sale, and complete the conveyance by calling on the trustees of the legal estate to concur. I think, therefore, that this case is governed by the principle of Kenworthy v. Bate, and that the trustees of the deed are bound, if called upon, to convey the legal estate in accordance with the appointment.

[His lordship then held, on the construction of E. Redgate's will, that she had in fact converted this property, on the ground that the words "my real estate" referred to real estate which was hers by way of power as well as by way of property; and that subsequently, between 1884 and 1887, J. W. Redgate and the defendant had elected to take the property as real estate, and that in consequence there had been a reconversion.]

Settlement — Marriage settlement — Construction — Children—Wife's next-of-kin—Words "died intestate and without ever having been married."

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*By a marriage settlement the trust property was settled, in default of children attaining a vested interest and in default of appointment. for such person or persons of the blood and kindred of H. Held, on the construction of the settlement that the issue of the marriage were excluded by the words "without ever having been married."

Originating summons.

The question arising on this summons was, as to whether the persons entitled to a trust fund comprised in a marriage settlement, were the persons representing the estates of the children, or the wife's next-of-kin excluding the children.

The facts are set out in the judgment of Swinfen Eady, J.

Frederic Thompson, for the trustees.

Northcote, for a person representing the estates of the children. referred to Wilson v. Atkinson, 4 De G. J. & Sm. 455, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 77; Upton v. Brown, 28 W. R. 38, 12 Ch. Rolt, for the wife's next-of-kin, excluding children.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The question arising upon this summons is, who is entitled, in the events that have happened, to a fund comprised in a marriage settlement dated the 15th of February, 1882. The settlement was upon the marriage of Miss Harriet Smith with George William Cook—that is to say, the marriage of a spinster, and it was a sum of £3,000 which ultimately became payable upon certain trusts to husband and wife and the children of the marriage, who being a son should attain twenty-one or a daughter should attain that age or marry. Then the ultimate gift over was in these words: "Provided also, and it is hereby declared and agreed that if there shall be no child of the said Harriet Smith who being a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry, then subject and without prejudice to the trusts hereinbefore declared the said trustees shall stand possessed of the said trust funds and the annual income thereof or so much thereof respectively as shall not have become vested or been applied under any of the trusts or powers herein contained; upon trust if the said Harriet Smith shall survive the said George William Cook, for herself, her executors, administrators, and assigns, but if the said Harriet Smith shall die in the lifetime of the said George William Cook then upon trust to transfer and pay the same to such person or persons for such estate or estates, and with, under, and subject to such powers, provisions, and declarations as the said Harriet Smith, notwithstanding her coverture, shall by her will direct or appoint, and in default or any such direction or appointment, and so far as any such (if made) shall not extend, upon trust for such person or persons of the blood and kindred of the said Harriet Smith as under the statute for the distribution of the estates of intestates would have been the next-of-kin of the said Harriet Smith in case she had died intestate and without ever having been married."

Now, it appears that there were two children of the marriage. The wife died on the 6th of June, 1885, in the lifetime of her husband. Of the two children, one, a son, died very shortly after the mother's death, within a few weeks, the child being then just a few weeks old. Then, on the 28th of December, 1899, the husband died, and in October, 1901, the second child died. There is no issue of the marriage living, and no issue ever took a vested interest under the provisions of the settlement in favour of the sons and daughters of the marriage; and the question now is, whether the wife's children took in default of any appointment by her, or whether the wife's children are excluded from the division by the language of the instrument. If the children took, then in the events that have happened the husband would take the share of the son who died in the husband's lifetime, and the share of the other child, who died after the husband's death, would go to that child's next-of-kin, the person entitled under the Statute of Distribution; on the other hand, if the children are excluded, then the property in question would go to the persons entitled to the wife's property under the Statute of Distribution, excluding the children.

Now, on the language of this instrument itself, apart from authority, I have no difficulty whatever in coming to a conclusion. The language appears to me to be absolutely clear, and as free from any ambiguity as possible. In default of there being children taking a vested interest, sons attaining twenty-one and daughters attaining that age or marriage, then the property is to go to a class mentioned under the Statute of Distribution as if the wife had died intestate and "without ever having been married." Those words clearly exclude any children, because by our law, if the lady had not been married she could not have had any lawful issue. It seems to me, therefore, that these words must have that interpretation unless I am bound by a rule of construction to say that in this settlement, being a settlement on marriage, these words, "without ever having been married" have a fixed and definite technical meaning different from what the words would have in their ordinary and natural signification. If there is any such technical rule of construction I must give effect to it; but if I am not bound by any such rule, then I have no difficulty whatever in arriving at the true construction of the instrument in question.

Now such a rule is said to have been established by a case of Wilson v. Atkinson. The words of the settlement were, in case the lady "should die in the lifetime of Richard Wilson Simpson, her intended husband," then the fund was to be in trust "for such person or persons as under the statute for the distribution of the effects of intestates would have become entitled thereto on the decease of the said Jane Wilson if she shall die possessed thereof, and without having been married, such persons if more than one to take as tenants in common and in the shares in which they would have taken under the same statute." The settlement in that case was the settlement of a widow who had an illegitimate daughter, and the settlement contained a provision that the illegitimate daughter should, for the purposes of that trust, be deemed to be the lawful child of the said Jane Wilson—that is, the lady. Knight-Bruce, L.J., said the point for decision was "whether the words 'without having been married' in that instrument ought to be read as signifying 'without having been married to anyone' or 'without having a husband living at her death' or 'without having been married to her then intended husband,'" and he said: "The context forbids the first of these constructions." The first construction was "without having been married to anyone," and then he goes on to say: "The context forbids such a construction, and this I think even independently of the following declaration." Then he reads the declaration with regard to the child being treated as the lawful child, and he says that provision "constitutes an effectual and binding provision to the benefit of which the appellant (the child) was entitled. Both provisions read together certainly give the appellant a right to the fund. She appears to me accordingly entitled to succeed." In other words, he does not purport to lay down any general rule of construction that in a marriage settlement the words "without having been married" are always to receive one fixed definite construction, and certainly does not lay down that those words, or words like them—because in the present case the words that I have to consider are "without ever having been married"—in every marriage settlement, no matter what the context, and no matter whether it provides for the issue of the intended marriage or not, are to receive this certain definite construction. In Wilson v. Atkinson, the settlement contained no express provisions for children or issue. Then Turner, L.J., who agreed with Knight-Bruce, L.J., reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, said that the trust in question in that case could not be construed without taking into account the declaration immediately following—the declaration with regard to the illegitimate child—and that there would be no meaning in that declaration if lawful children in themselves could not have taken under that trust; and then he adds: "that declaration must therefore, being taken in connection with the trust for the next-of-kin, be considered to explain the latter to refer to children as well as other next-of-kin." So that, as regards the determination of that case, both Lords Justices decided it upon the context of that particular instrument, and I do not understand either of them as laying down any general rule for the construction of all marriage settlements irrespective of the nature of the provisions in them.

Now, I should arrive at that conclusion on the consideration of that case alone. But if there have been subsequent decisions which compel me to take a different view of Wilson v. Atkinson I shall have to consider them. But the decisions are not uniform.

In In re Ball's Trusts, 27 W. R. 409, 11 Ch. D. 270, and in Upton v. Brown, Fry, L.J., felt himself constrained to decide as he did in those cases by Wilson v. Atkinson, but almost immediately afterwards the late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, in Emmins v. Bradford, felt himself at liberty to come to an entirely different conclusion. In the first of these two cases, In re Ball's Trusts, before Fry, J., there was no provision for the issue of the marriage in the settlement. It was not, as in the case I have to consider, a gift in default of children taking a vested interest; and in the second case before Fry, J., Upton v. Brown, where the person taking was the son of the former marriage, one of the reasons that Fry, J., gave 12 Ch. D. at p. 878 for the conclusion that he came to was this. He said: "Moreover, if I were to hold that this child is excluded, I must equally have held those children were excluded if he had married and died under twenty-one leaving children, and I must equally have excluded children of a third marriage of the mother, for whom the settlement makes no express provision." That reason which seems to have influenced him I am unable to appreciate, because there could have been no third marriage; and on the death of that husband of the second marriage the fund was, if the lady should survive her husband, to be in trust for her absolutely, so that the children of the marriage would not have been excluded from participating in their mother's property any more than the children of any marriage are. Of course there is a possible explanation, but I do not think that was in the mind of the learned judge.

Then, those two cases before Fry, J., being one way, there followed Emmins v. Bradford, before Sir George Jessel, which is a very clear and distinct authority the other way. At 13 Ch. D., p. 498, Sir George Jessel said: "I rest my decision upon this, that the words are free from ambiguity, and there is no context whatever to control it." The decision in Emmins v. Bradford was a very strong one, because the effect of it exclude children of the wife who were living—was to children by a former marriage; and Sir George Jessel, after considering the meaning of the word "unmarried" and referring to Clarke v. Colls, 9 H. L. Cas. 601, 11 W. R. H. L. Dig. 10, in the House of Lords, to which I will refer presently, and referring to Wilson v. Atkinson and Fry, J.'s, decisions upon it, said that "until some higher court lay down some new general principle of construction I shall not interfere with unambiguous words." It cannot, therefore, be said that the decisions following Wilson v. Atkinson are uniform.

Now, Emmins v. Bradford has been twice followed in Ireland in cases to which Mr. Northcote has referred; but in England, Chitty, L.J. (then Chitty, J.), in Stoddart v. Saville, followed Fry, J. It will be observed that in that case there was no trust for the issue of the marriage. The lady had left one child of the marriage, and the trust there was not a trust in default of a child attaining a vested interest, as it is in the case I have now to deal with.

In addition to the case of In re Arden, to which reference has been made, there is a recent decision of Kekewich, J., in In re Mare, [1902] 2 Ch. 112, 50 W. R. Dig. 157, in which he considered himself bound by Wilson v. Atkinson as governing the whole question, and said it was a clear decision of the Court of Appeal covering the exact case. He conceived that it covered the exact case before him, and he followed it. The authorities are certainly conflicting.

Then, when you come to the text-writers, it has been pointed out that Mr. Davidson's view is that the present clause excluded the husband and children. Mr. Wolstenholme's view is that the object of all conveyancers is to exclude the husband, not only from taking in his own right, but also to exclude the husband as the person entitled to the children's share as next-of-kin of the children; his view is that that object fails by the use of the words in question.

Now in that state of things the decision in Clarke v. Colls seems to me of considerable importance, because if there is a conflict of authority certainly any rule laid down there would prevail. In Clarke v. Colls the actual words were "as if the wife had died possessed thereof intestate and unmarried," and the contest was as to what the meaning of the word "unmarried" was. Lord Cranworth states it may have one or two meanings. He says: "What is the meaning of the word 'unmarried'? It may, without any violence to language, mean either 'without ever having been married'—those are the precise words in this case—or 'not having a husband living at her death.' If the former construction be adopted—that is to say, if the word means 'without ever having been married,' then if the wife should survive her husband, and afterwards marry and have children, her collateral relatives would take the fund to the exclusion of her own issue." In other words, he considers that the words "without ever having been married" in a marriage settlement would exclude the issue, which they obviously do according to their ordinary meaning.

Then one other case was referred to, before Chitty, J., which was a case of construction of a will, In re Watson's Trusts. There Chitty, J., came to the conclusion that the same words "without ever having been married" were clear and unambiguous, and that effect must be given to them by directing that the lineal descendant of the titular person, the testator's mother, was excluded in favour of her next-of-kin. Chitty, J., dealt with the difference between a will and settlement in this way. After referring to the cases which have been cited to me to-day, he says: "Those cases were all cases of construction upon marriage settlements, where the court is guided, in interpreting a gift, by the existence of a presumption that the parties intended to benefit the issue."

Now, where you have a settlement dealing in terms with a certain class of issue, that is such issue for which it is intended to provide, sons at twenty-one, daughters at twenty-one or marriage, with a gift over in default of there being any such issue, it seems to me to be very difficult to say that it was the intention nevertheless of the settlement to provide for issue who do not take a vested interest within the words of the settlement. But there is also this further observation to be made. It is said that the intention of this clause is to exclude the husband, and that a particular interpretation has been put upon those words with that object. But if that be so, it seems that the very interpretation so put upon them defeats the object, and does not give effect to it; because the object being to exclude the husband as well in his own right as in respect of the children's right, giving the construction to those words which has been contended for on behalf of the children, would, in effect, be to let in the husband—not to exclude the husband, but let him in—in the only event which we are dealing with, where there are children, but who fail to take a vested interest. It seems to me a case in which, if I were to decide as Mr. Northcote invited me to do, I should be departing from the plain path, the natural ordinary meaning of the words, with the view of giving an effect to a supposed intention, and at the very same time defeating that intention by enabling the property to devolve through children to the husband, the very person whom it was the object of the settlement to exclude.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that I am not in the present state of the authorities compelled or prepared to interpret the words of this settlement in any other than their ordinary and natural meaning, and accordingly I decide that the issue of the marriage are excluded by the words "without ever having been married." I accept what Mr. Bolt said at the conclusion, that Mr. Northcote's argument gives no effect to these latter words, "without ever having been married," because the husband is already excluded by the preceding words. There will therefore be a declaration accordingly.

MILES v. WILSON. (a.)

Will—Class—"My own nephews and nieces"—Half-blood—Husband's nephew described as "my nephew"—Great-niece described as "my niece."

(a.) Reported by GODFREY R. BENSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

When there is no context to the contrary, a gift to persons of a certain degree of relationship to the donor includes those of the half-blood.

The inaccurate use of a term of relationship in describing a particular person may, but need not, lead to the inference that the same term when used in the same instrument to designate a class includes that person and others to whom it may be equally applicable.

A testatrix gave a gift unto and among "my own nephews and nieces." In another part of the same will she had referred to a person who was her great-niece as "my niece," but in yet another part she had described her correctly as "the daughter of my nephew X." She also referred in her will to a nephew of her husband once by his name alone and once as "my nephew."

Held, that the words "my own nephews and nieces" excluded not only the husband's nephews and nieces but the testatrix's great-nephews and great-nieces, not excepting the great-niece who had been called "my niece."

Adjourned summons for the determination of the question who were entitled to take under a gift, in a will, to "my own nephews and nieces."

The testatrix in this case bequeathed one moiety of her residuary real and personal estate upon trust for Alexander Duncan for life, and after his decease upon trust "for my own nephews and nieces, with the exception of Mary Ann, the sister of William Moore." In an earlier part of her will the testatrix had given the proceeds of sale of twenty-two cottages to "Mary Jane Cozens, Ellen Cozens, James Cozens, Louisa Howe, and Catherine Norriss, the nieces and nephews of my late husband, George Cozens, and my nieces Emma Moore and Sarah Metcalf in equal shares."

Emma Moore was a great-niece of the testatrix, and was elsewhere in the will described as the daughter of "my nephew William Moore."

Sarah Metcalf was the daughter of an illegitimate nephew.

Alexander Duncan, the nephew of the testatrix's husband, was in a passage in the will described as "my nephew."

The testatrix died on the 6th of July, 1889, and Alexander Duncan died on the 4th of May, 1900.

In addition to nephews and nieces of the whole blood the following claimed to share in the gift to my own nephews and nieces: Nephews and nieces of the half-blood; Emma Moore and Sarah Metcalf on the ground that they were described as "my nieces"; other great-nieces and great-nephews, on the ground that some of their class were described as nieces.

The husband's nephews and nieces were not made parties owing to the difficulty of tracing them.

Harry Johnston, for nephews and nieces of the whole blood, cited Smith v. Lidiard, 3 K. & J. 252; Wells v. Wells, 22 W. R. 893, L. R. 18 Eq. 504; and Merrill v. Morton, 29 W. R. 394, 17 Ch. D. 382.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—As there are no words in the will pointing to the exclusion of the children of the testatrix's half-brother they are entitled to share, in accordance with Grieves v. Rawley.

As to the claims of Emma Moore, Sarah Metcalf, and other great-nephews and great-nieces, cases have been cited which are said to establish the proposition that great-nephews and nieces are necessarily excluded from a gift to nephews and nieces notwithstanding that in another part of the will they may have been described as nephews and nieces. On the other hand, In re Jodrell has been cited to show that there is a rule that when once a legatee has been referred to by an inaccurate description the same description, if afterwards used to designate a class, must be taken to include that legatee and all other persons to whom the same inaccurate description is equally applicable—that is, who stand in the same degree of relationship to the testator. But in that case Lord Halsbury in the Court of Appeal repudiated laying down any canon of construction which went beyond that particular case, and Lord Herschell in the House of Lords said that a word used in several contexts in a will must in each case be read according to the context. I am of opinion that both the propositions which have been contended for are too wide, and that there is no hard and fast rule that nephews and nieces cannot include great-nephews and nieces; nor, on the other hand, any hard and fast rule requiring the court, when a person has once been referred to as a niece to construe that word everywhere else in the will as including her. The true rule is that the court must determine the question by looking at the language and contents of the whole will.

Now, looking at the contents of this will, I observe that the testatrix gives shares in the proceeds of sale of certain cottages to two named persons whom she describes as "my nieces," of whom one was the daughter of an illegitimate son of her sister, and the other was her great-niece; but that one of these persons is elsewhere referred to, and is then correctly described as "the daughter of my nephew William Moore."

I observe, further, that there is a gift of 30s. a week to "my nephew Alexander Duncan," who was really the husband's nephew, so that if In re Jodrell laid down the wide rule of construction which has been contended for, not only all the great-nephews and nieces, but all the husband's nephews and nieces must share.

Lastly, I come to the gift in question—namely, a gift "unto and among my own nephews and nieces" with an exception. It has been suggested that the words "my own" exclude only the husband's nephews and nieces. I cannot adopt that suggestion, and in my opinion the words restrict the class to the children of the testatrix's brothers and sisters whether of the whole or of the half-blood.

HEALING v. HEALING AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Lunacy—Maintenance of lunatic's children—No committee appointed—Sale of lunatic's business while lunatic was under restraint—Application of lunatic's estate, with consent of wife, by third party for maintenance and education of lunatic's children—Refusal of lunatic on his release to ratify this expenditure—Right to recover proceeds of sale of business.

The plaintiff, who had carried on a draper's business, was confined in a lunatic asylum from 1882 to 1894, but no committee of his estate had been appointed. In 1883 the plaintiff's business was sold by the defendant, and the proceeds of the sale were with the authority and consent of the plaintiff's wife expended by the defendant in the maintenance of the plaintiff's children (not of tender years) while he was in the asylum. The plaintiff upon his release in 1894 refused to ratify what had been done, and brought an action against the defendant to recover the proceeds of sale of the business:—

Held, that the plaintiff not being legally liable to maintain the children while in the asylum, and no committee having been appointed of his estate who might have sanctioned such expenditure, the plaintiff could recover the proceeds of the sale of his business as money had and received to his use.

Further consideration, in an action in which the plaintiff claimed £200 for money lent, and alternatively that sum, as money had and received to the plaintiff's use, tried before Ridley, J., and a common jury.

The plaintiff, Samuel Healing, had a business at Lambeth. In 1882 he was confined in a lunatic asylum, but no steps were taken to appoint a committee. In 1894 the plaintiff escaped from the asylum, and having evaded the authorities for fourteen days, the order on which he had been detained consequently lapsed; and he was then allowed to go free as cured. On his escape he found that his business had been sold, that his wife was living in adultery with his brother William, by whom she had had two children. He obtained a divorce in 1897, with £500 damages, against William Healing, which were not paid, and in the course of the divorce proceedings, alleged he first discovered that Charles Healing, another brother, had disposed of the business for £200, which sum had eventually been paid over by Charles to William. Samuel Healing on the 7th of March, 1900, brought the present action against William Healing, and Charles was added as a defendant on the 30th of May, 1900. By way of defence, William pleaded that, with the consent of the plaintiff's wife as his agent while he was under confinement, he had spent the money derived from the sale of the business on the maintenance and education of the plaintiff's three children—who, however, were not of tender years; and he also claimed for various necessary payments made on the plaintiff's behalf, the chief item being £276 for the maintenance and education of the children between 1884 and 1890. The defendant Charles Healing pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

The trial took place on the 20th and 21st of November, with the result that on the findings of the jury, judgment was entered for the defendant Charles on his plea of the Statute of Limitations, and the consideration of the legal effect of the jury's findings on question left them with regard to William's liability, was reserved for further argument on the 22nd of November.

Dec. 1.—RIDLEY, J., in giving judgment, said: This action was brought to recover the sum of £200 as money had and received, or, in the alternative, recoverable, owing to fraud alleged against the defendants, but this latter allegation was not pressed by the plaintiff's counsel at the hearing. Shortly stated, the facts are that the plaintiff in 1881-82 was in business as a draper in the south of London. He had a wife and three children, and in July of 1882 he became a lunatic and was taken care of in an asylum as such, until the 8th of March, 1894. It appeared that on his becoming a lunatic no committee was appointed; the account which stood in his name at the London and Westminster Bank was closed, and a fresh account was opened in the name of his two brothers, the defendants Charles and William. Into that account was carried the sum of £8 8s. 11d. from the former account, and £50 provided by Charles. For a year or thereabouts the business continued, but in 1883 it was sold by William, with the consent of the plaintiff's wife, and the net proceeds were handed to Charles. These were returned by him to her within about a month, amounting in all to about £200. The wife maintained herself and the children on this fund for a time, but lent £150 out of it to the defendant William, and it was arranged between them that he should maintain the children (who were not then of tender years) out of this fund, receiving back from her the bills he had given for the loan. At some period not precisely known, improper relations began to exist between William and his brother's wife, and two illegitimate children were born in 1888 and 1890 respectively. After the plaintiff regained his liberty he obtained a divorce, with £500 damages against William as co-respondent.

The present action was brought by Samuel Healing to recover the proceeds of the sale, £200, or, at all events, the £150 handed over to the defendant William. With regard to the defendant Charles, as the writ dated the 7th of March, 1900, was not originally directed against him, and his name was only first added as a defendant on the 30th of May, 1900, the Statute of Limitations furnished him with a defence, unless there was by him a concealment of the facts from the plaintiff, which the jury found there was not. William, however, could not rely on this defence, the writ as against him being dated the 7th of March, 1900. With regard to him the jury found, in answer to questions, as follows: (1) That the plaintiff was told when he came out of the asylum of the arrangement, but that he did not accept it; (2) that the sale money was paid to the plaintiff's wife and was used with her authority for the maintenance of the children; (3) that the maintenance of the children cost over £200.

Mr. Rawlinson contended that, as no proceedings were ever taken for the appointment of a committee, all that was done by William, whether the plaintiff's wife consented or not, was illegal, that it was in fact spent on the children without the plaintiff's authority, and that for such a purpose the defendant William had no right in law to spend it, and that if the money was once traced to his hands he could not set up a right to keep it, in whatever way it may have been disposed of. On the other hand, Mr. Henderson said that, though the administration of a lunatic's estate should be carried on by a committee properly appointed, yet that the case of Read v. Legard, 6 Exch. 636, shows that the wife of a lunatic can pledge her husband's credit for necessaries supplied to herself, and that the principle applies to necessaries furnished to the children; that the finding of the jury showed that William applied the money as he did with an authority which had power to pledge the credit of the plaintiff, and that William was therefore entitled to judgment, whether a committee was appointed or not.

It appears to me on consideration that the argument of the plaintiff prevails. There is, indeed, authority for the principle that a husband is liable for necessaries supplied to his wife during the period of his lunacy: Read v. Legard. That is so because the wife has authority by law to pledge her husband's credit for necessaries, and, if necessaries be supplied to a lunatic, there is an implied obligation on his part to pay for them out of his own property: In re Rhodes, 38 W. R. 385, 44 Ch. D. 94. But the obligation which rests on a parent to provide for his children (not of tender years) is a moral and not a legal one, and there is no liability on him to pay for debts incurred by the child, unless he has given the child authority to incur them or has contracted to pay them: Mortimore v. Wright, 6 M. & W. 482. The case of the wife is quite different from that of the children. That being so, the spending by the defendant William of this money on the children in no way makes the plaintiff liable to repay him. It occurred to me that, if a committee had been appointed during the detention of the plaintiff in the asylum, he would have been called upon to allow for money expended on the children previous to his appointment, and that, in a similar way, it might be argued here that it should be allowed to the defendant. But the answer is that in such a case the committee would have had legal authority as representing the lunatic, and that he could ratify the preceding obligation if he thought fit to do so, whereas here the jury found that the plaintiff refused to ratify what had been done. The court can and does meet moral obligations which the lunatic might have met if of sound mind, but the defendant here had no authority to do so, for the wife could give him none, nor did the plaintiff ratify. There may be some doubt whether the full sum of £200, the proceeds of the sale, ought not to be recovered, but, as it appears that the sum actually paid to the defendant was only £150, I think it safer to enter the judgment for that sum with costs. I desire to add that the counterclaim is dismissed with costs.

Held, that the giving of immediate notice of the accident was a condition precedent to the employers' right to indemnity under the policy, that the communication to the person who had introduced the appellants to the company was no notice to the company at all, and that under the circumstances the company were not liable.

Case stated on a point of law for the decision of a judge sitting for a Divisional Court.

The case stated by the arbitrator raised the question as to the construction to be put upon a policy of insurance against (inter alia) liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

On the 28th day of November, 1899, Messrs. Williams & Thomas who were employers, entered into a policy of assurance with the Lancashire and Yorkshire Accident Insurance Co. (Limited), whereby the company agreed, subject to conditions therein expressed, to pay such sums as the employers should become liable to pay in respect of injury to any workman whilst employed on their works in South Wales under or by virtue of (inter alia) the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

On the 10th day of October, 1900, while the policy was still in force, a workman of the employers met with an accident, and on the 16th of that month his employers communicated that fact by telephone to the person who had introduced them to the defendants and had received commission for the introduction. The workman gave the employers notice of his claim on the 1st of December, 1900, and within three days the employers gave written notice of this claim to the defendants, the Insurance Co. The workman obtained compensation against the employers in the Pontypridd County Court, but when the employers made a claim for indemnity under the policy, the defendants denied liability, on the ground that immediate notice of the accident in accordance with clause 3 of the policy had not been given them.

Clause 3 of the policy was as follows: "The employer shall give immediate notice to the company of any accident causing injury to a workman. The employer shall also forward to the company every written or other information as to any verbal notice of claim received, within three days after the receipt of such notice, and shall give all necessary information and assistance to enable the company to settle or resist any claim as they may think fit. . . . Time shall be deemed to be the essence of this condition."

At the foot of the policy, but not among the numbered clauses of the agreement, was the following notice: "Every notice and communication to be given or made by the employer shall be in writing and shall be sent by post to or be delivered at the head office of the company. No notice or communication otherwise given or made shall be recognized for any purpose whatsoever."

The arbitrator found as a fact that the employers could have given, but did not give immediate notice to the company of the accident, but that they did forward to the company within three days of its receipt the written notice of claim in respect thereof. He held that the failure by the employers to give to the company immediate notice of the accident under clause 3, having regard to the true construction of all the terms of the policy, exonerated the company from liability, and he directed that the applicants, the employers, should pay the company their costs of the arbitration and the costs of the award.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, having regard to the true construction of all the terms of the policy, the failure by the employers to give to the company immediate notice of the accident under clause 3 exonerated the company from liability or not.

Hugh Sturges, for the employers.—The question is, whether, having regard to the true construction of clause 3 of the policy, the company is exonerated from liability. The arbitrator held that an "immediate notice" referred to in the policy meant immediate notice of the accident; whereas we say that an "immediate notice" of a claim of the workman to compensation was the notice that had to be given immediately in order to render the company liable to make good an award. It is not disputed here that as such notice was sent to the defendants within three days after the appellants themselves received it from the workman there has been any delay, if, as we submit, this is the true construction. The object of giving notice was that the company should have time "to settle or resist any claim as they may think fit," and the notice sent was sent in time to enable them to consider the matter. So that, even if the giving of immediate notice is a condition precedent to the employers' right to indemnity, which, on the true construction, is at least questionable, such notice was in fact given.

Bailhache, for the respondents, was not heard.

BIGHAM, J.—In this case my judgment must be for the insurance company. Clause 3 of the policy stipulated that the employer should give the company immediate notice of any accident causing injury to a workman, and the arbitrator has found as a fact that immediate notice was not given. What was immediate notice must depend upon the circumstances of each case, and indeed is practically always a question of fact to be tried by the jury or the arbitrator. The arbitrator found that the employers could have given, but did not give, immediate notice of the accident, and he found, consequently, that immediate notice was not given. I think the arbitrator was quite right, as although the accident occurred on the 10th of October, and the employers were aware of the accident by the 17th of October, no notice was sent to the company until the 4th of December. I say no notice was given till the 4th of December, because the communication of the fact that the accident had occurred to the person who introduced the appellants to the respondent company was no notice to the company at all. That finding, in my opinion, decides the case. But it was said that the giving of immediate notice was not a condition precedent to the employers' right to indemnity under the policy. I do not agree with that view, and I have no hesitation in saying that the giving of immediate notice was intended to be a condition precedent. Clause 3 ends thus: "Time shall be the essence of this condition," and I cannot when I read the whole of the clause, and remember how essential it is that the circumstances under which a claim might be made should be speedily brought to the knowledge of the insurance company, accept the view put forward by the appellants' counsel.

BROOKS (Appellant) v. MASON (Respondent). (a.)

Criminal law—Sale of intoxicating liquor to child under fourteen—Delivery in vessel improperly corked and sealed—Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 27), ss. 2, 5.

Where the holder of a licence to sell intoxicating liquor sells or delivers, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any such liquor to a child under the age of fourteen years for consumption by any person on or off the premises in a vessel not corked and sealed as required by the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, he is guilty of an offence under section 2 of that Act, notwithstanding that at the time he sold and delivered such liquor he honestly believed that the vessel was properly corked and sealed in accordance with the requirements of the Act.

This was a case stated by E. T. d'Eyncourt, Esquire, Metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was laid on the 28th of January, 1902, by the respondent, an inspector of police, against the appellant, the licensed occupier of 152, Essex-road, Islington, under the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, for that the appellant, being the holder of a licence, within the intent and meaning of the Licensing Acts, 1872 and 1874, and of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, did unlawfully and knowingly deliver otherwise than at the residence or working place of the purchaser a certain description of intoxicating liquor to one James Cousins, a person under the age of fourteen years, for consumption by any person on or off the premises, such intoxicating liquor not being sold or delivered in a corked and sealed vessel in a quantity not less than one reputed pint for consumption off the premises only.

The said information was heard on the 20th of February, 1902, whereupon the magistrate convicted the appellant and fined him 10s. and 2s. costs.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:

The appellant holds a licence to sell beer by retail for consumption off the premises in respect of 152, Essex-road, Islington.

On Sunday, the 19th of January, 1902, one James Cousins, a boy of about eleven years of age, had been sent by his parents to the appellant's premises to obtain some beer to be drunk off the premises, and there was delivered to him by the appellant one pint of beer in a bottle supplied by the appellant. The bottle was fitted with a glass stopper, having round it a ring of cork. Over the top of such stopper from one side of the neck of the bottle to the other side the appellant, before delivery, stuck a gummed label previously moistened by him. The label was about three inches in length, and bore the words "Caution. This label must not be tampered with."

After affixing the label, a portion of sealing-wax was placed by the appellant on one side of the neck of the bottle, partly on the glass and partly over one end of the paper label. In that condition the bottle containing beer was delivered by the appellant to the boy James Cousins.

A police officer stopped the boy and took from him the bottle. The gum on the label was then wet. The constable took hold of the label by the end opposite that on which the sealing-wax was, and turning it back detached the label, which came off the bottle intact, the sealing-wax also coming whole off the bottle with the label.

The learned magistrate found as a fact that the bottle was corked and closed with the stopper, but that the paper label had not been secured with a substance without the destruction of which the stopper could not be withdrawn; also that the appellant knew that James Cousins was under the age of fourteen years, but that the appellant had, at the time he delivered the bottle to James Cousins, honestly believed that he had in manner before mentioned by the gummed label and the sealing-wax secured the stopper in conformity with section 5 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901.

On the part of the appellant it was contended upon the above facts that under section 2 of the statute a person commits no offence against that section who honestly believes at the time of sale or delivery that the stopper has been secured in accordance with the said section; and that the word "knowingly" in that section refers to the knowledge of the seller as to the condition of the corking and sealing of the vessel in which the intoxicating liquor is sold or delivered as well as the knowledge by the seller of the age of the person to whom the intoxicating liquor is sold or delivered.

The magistrate held, however, upon the above facts that the appellant had been guilty of an offence against the statute, and thereupon convicted him as aforesaid.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

The Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 27), enacts as follows:

Section 2.—"Every holder of a licence who knowingly sells or delivers or allows any person to sell or deliver, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any description of intoxicating liquor to any person under the age of fourteen years for consumption by any person on or off the premises, excepting such intoxicating liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels in quantities not less than one reputed pint for consumption off the premises only, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for the first offence, and not exceeding five pounds for any subsequent offence; and every person who knowingly sends any person under the age of fourteen years to any place where intoxicating liquors are sold or delivered or distributed, for the purpose of obtaining any description of intoxicating liquor, excepting as aforesaid, for consumption by any person on or off the premises, shall be liable to like penalties."

Section 5.—"The term 'corked' means closed with a plug or stopper, whether it is made of cork, or wood, or glass, or some other material.

"The expression 'sealed' means secured with any substance without the destruction of which the cork, plug, or stopper cannot be withdrawn."

Danckwerts, K.C. (Bruce Williamson with him), for the appellant.—The decision of the magistrate was wrong. The appellant did not commit any offence under the statute. Section 2 creates the offence charged in this case. The words in the section "excepting such intoxicating liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels in quantities not less than one reputed pint for consumption off the premises only" are part of the definition of the offence created and the word "knowingly" applies to them. The word "knowingly" covers the whole question. That is clear on looking at the latter part of the section; there the words used must mean, not that a person is guilty of the offence who sends a child under fourteen to obtain liquor, but that he is guilty of the offence if he knowingly sends such child to obtain liquor in uncorked and unsealed vessels. There must be a mens rea in order to establish a criminal offence unless the statute expressly provides otherwise.

He referred to the judgment of Day and Wright, JJ., in Sherras v. De Rutzen, 43 W. R. 526, [1895] 1 Q. B. 918.

Craies (H. Avory, K.C., with him), for the respondent.—The magistrate was right. The word "knowingly" applies to the sale and delivery of the liquor supplied and to the age of the person to whom the liquor is supplied; it does not apply to the exception in the section. The gist of the offence is knowingly serving intoxicating liquor to children under the age of fourteen. The offence created by section 2 is that which is defined in the first part of the section down to the word "excepting." The exception in that part of the section is not part of the definition of the offence, but is merely a defence which may be set up. This argument also applies to the second part of the section. It is not necessary in the case of an offence under this section to prove mens rea.

He referred to Reg. v. Tolson, 37 W. R. 716, 23 Q. B. D. 168, and Cundy v. Le Cocq, 32 W. R. 769, 13 Q. B. D. 207.

Danckwerts, K.C., in reply, referred to Miller v. Justices of Dudley, 46 W. R. 606.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case, to my mind, is not without difficulty. In a very great many criminal cases there can be no doubt that it is necessary to prove mens rea, and in dealing with offences under many statutes if such proof is not necessary you must show that the particular statute does not require it. But this case cannot be decided simply on that principle. I think that in deciding this case we must look at the statute which creates the offence we are dealing with, and in construing section 2 we must look to see whether the word "knowingly" applies to the words which we there find before or after the word "excepting"; whether, in fact, that part of the section beginning with the word "excepting" forms a part of the definition of the offence, or is intended, if proved, to constitute a defence to the offence. [The learned judge here read section 2.] In my opinion the intention of the Legislature here was to stop the sale of intoxicating liquor to children under the age of fourteen. But the Legislature seem to have thought that in some cases where there was a sale to a child under that age the sale might not be to the child for its own consumption but for that of the person who sent the child to purchase the liquor, and the Legislature therefore made the exception as to intoxicating liquors sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels.

It has been argued on behalf of the appellant that the words constituting this exception form part of the definition of the offence, and that the word "knowingly" applies to the whole of the section, and that, therefore, there is no offence under the section if the child is supplied with intoxicating liquor in a vessel which the holder of the licence honestly believes to be corked and sealed in accordance with the requirements of the Act. The other view is that an offence under the statute is committed merely if such liquor is delivered not so corked and sealed; and that the word "knowingly" does not apply to the exception. I have come to the conclusion, though not without hesitation, that the Legislature did not intend to read into the exception the word "knowingly." I think they only intended to except intoxicating liquors delivered in vessels which are in fact corked and sealed as required by the statute, and not intoxicating liquors delivered in vessels which, the vendor merely believed to be so corked and sealed. The exception refers to matters of defence which if proved, in fact negative the alleged offence. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate was right and that this appeal must fail.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree, though I also think there may be doubt on the point.

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

Burrows v. Matabele Gold Reefs Co., 49 W. R. 500, [1901] 2 Ch. 23, discussed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Rigby, Collins, and Romer, L.JJ.) affirming a decision of Byrne, J. They followed a previous case of Burrows v. Matabele Gold Reefs Co., 49 W. R. 500, [1901] 2 Ch. 23.

The facts are set out at length in Lord Davey's judgment.

The short question was whether (having regard to section 8 (2) of the Companies Act, 1900) it was lawful for a company limited by shares to agree with persons subscribing or underwriting shares to grant to them an option whereby they were entitled by way of brokerage or commission to purchase at par within a certain time unissued shares of the company.

The company issued one-sixth of its nominal capital, and applied to certain people, of whom one, the appellant, asked for and was allotted shares upon the following terms: "For each share allotted, in accordance with this application, a subscriber shall have the option, during the period of one year, of taking up at par a further ordinary share of £1, and in the event of this share being taken up under the option, a further option during a period of two years of taking up at par a further ordinary share of £1 in the initial capital of the company."

The object of the action was to restrain the company from carrying out this contract, and an injunction had been granted by the court below restraining the directors from doing so.

Against this order the present appeal was brought.

Levett, K.C., and Clauson, for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I have more than once had occasion to say that in construing a statute I believe the worst person to do so is the person who is responsible for its drafting, because he is very much disposed to confuse what he intended to do with the language which has in fact been employed; at the time of the drafting, at all events, he may have been under the impression that he had given full effect to what was intended; and he might make a mistake in construing the statute afterwards, just because what was in his mind was what was intended, though perhaps it was not expressed. For that reason I abstain from giving any judgment myself in this case. At the same time I desire to say that I have read the judgments about to be delivered by my noble and learned friends, and I entirely concur with every word of them. I believe that the construction at which they have arrived was the intention of the statute—I do not say my intention, but the intention of the Legislature. I was largely responsible for the language in which the statute was expressed, and for that reason I do not write a judgment myself.

Lord SHAND had expressed his concurrence.

Lord DAVEY.—The United Gold Coast Mining Properties (Limited) was incorporated on the 17th of December, 1900, with a capital of £200,000 divided into 200,000 shares of £1 each. In January, 1901, the directors determined to issue 33,333 shares, or one-sixth of their nominal capital. They did so by applying to a number of persons, of whom the appellant, Charles Martin Hilder, was one, to subscribe. The last-named appellant applied for and was allotted 6,975 shares upon the following terms: "For each share allotted in accordance with this application a subscriber shall have the option during the period of one year from the 3rd day of January, 1901, of taking up at par a further ordinary share of £1 in the initial capital of the company, and in the event of such last-mentioned share being taken up under such option a further option during the period of two years from and after the said 3rd day of January, 1901, of taking up at par a further ordinary share of £1 in the initial capital of the company." The whole 33,333 shares forming the first issue were applied for by fourteen persons, and allotted to them upon these terms. The shares are now selling on the market at a premium, and the appellant has elected to exercise his option.

The object of the action is to restrain the directors from carrying out the company's contract. There is nothing whatever in the case to throw doubt upon the good faith of the directors in selecting this mode of issuing the shares of the company in preference to offering them for public subscription in the ordinary way, or to impeach their exercise of the discretion vested in them by the articles. It appears from the affidavits that the scheme was to raise the necessary working capital by the issue of one-half of the share capital for cash, the other half being used for the purpose of payment in, shares credited as fully paid up, for the concessions to be purchased by the company."

But it was said that this mode of raising the sum required for working capital is prohibited by section 8 (2) of the recent Act of 1900, and is therefore beyond the power of the company. This is the only question which has been argued at the bar. Now before construing the words of the section which is relied on, your lordships are entitled to consider the state of the law before the section was passed with a view to ascertaining the mischief to which the enactment is directed. It was decided by this House in Ooregum v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125, that a stipulation or agreement that a less cash sum than the nominal amount of the share shall be accepted as payment for the share is repugnant and void. On the other hand, there was authority for saying that the payment of a commission to brokers or others who undertook to procure subscriptions, or in default to subscribe for a certain number of shares, was legitimate. That doctrine, however, did not meet with universal acceptance, although it had the support of Buckley, J., in his valuable work on the Companies Acts (7th ed., pp. 609, 610). It was thought by some that such a payment when made out of capital was a misapplication of the company's capital, and was therefore ultra vires. There were, therefore, two points for consideration—first, that shares could not be issued at a discount—i.e., subject to an agreement that the shareholder should pay less to the company than the nominal value of the share; and, secondly, the question whether the payment out of capital moneys or by means of shares credited as fully or partly paid up of what is called an underwriting commission was within the powers of a company.

From a perusal of the 8th section of the Act of 1900 your lordships will infer that the Legislature was desirous of enabling remuneration to be paid for services rendered in placing or procuring subscription of the company's capital, and it appears to have hit upon what may be termed a compromise. By the first sub-section a company is empowered, upon any offer of shares to the public for subscription, to pay a commission to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any shares in the company, or procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any shares in the company subject to certain defined conditions as to amount and disclosure. This sub-section therefore permits a limited application of the company's capital in payment of a commission. Then follows the 2nd sub-section, on which the question before your lordships turns. It is in the following terms: "(2) Save as aforesaid no company shall apply any of its shares or capital money either directly or indirectly in payment of any commission, discount, or allowance, to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any shares of the company, or procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any shares in the company, whether the shares or money be so applied by being added to the purchase-money of any property acquired by the company or to the contract price of any work to be executed for the company, or the money be paid out of the nominal purchase-money or contract price, or otherwise." And the 3rd sub-section provides that nothing in this section shall affect the power of any company to pay such brokerage as it has heretofore been lawful for a company to pay.

The first words to be construed are "apply any of its shares or capital money." I think that those words naturally mean, apply its capital, either in the form of shares before issue when they may be described as potential capital, or in the form of money derived from the issue of its shares. "In payment of any commission, discount, or allowance"; I think this means payment by the company. The words "discount or allowance" seem to mean the same thing—viz., a rebate on what would justly be due from the subscriber on his shares. The advantage which the appellant will derive from the exercise of his option is certainly not a "discount or allowance," because he will have to pay 20s. in the pound for every share. Nor is it, in my opinion, a commission paid by the company, for the company will not part with any portion of its capital, which is received by it intact, or indeed with any moneys belonging to it. But the words relied on are "either directly or indirectly," and the argument seems to be that the company, by engaging to allot shares at par to the shareholder at a future date, is applying or using its shares in such a manner as to give him a possible benefit at the expense of the company in this sense, that it foregoes the chance of issuing them at a premium. With regard to the latter point it may or may not be at the expense of the company. I am not aware of any law which obliges a company to issue its shares above par because they are saleable at a premium in the market. It depends on the circumstances of each case whether it will be prudent or even possible to do so, and it is a question for the directors to decide. But the point which, in my opinion, is alone material for the present purpose is that the benefit to the shareholder from being able to sell his shares at a premium is not obtained by him at the expense of the company's capital. The prohibited application of the shares may be direct by allotting them as fully or partly paid up to the person underwriting the shares, or by allotting them in some other way with the intention that they shall ultimately find their way to such person or be applied in payment of his commission. It may be that in some particular case a contract such as that which your lordships have before you would be open to impeachment as improvident or an abuse, or in excess of the powers of management committed to the directors. In this case the question is as to the powers of the company itself, and not as to the due exercise of the directors' powers. I have come to the conclusion from a consideration of the language of section 8, sub-section 2, that the prohibition therein contained extends only to the application, direct or indirect, of the company's capital in payment of a commission by the company, and that the transaction impeached in this case is not within it. It is satisfactory to find that the conclusion to which I have come will not have the effect of extending the prohibition to transactions which were legitimate before the Act, and not, so far as I am aware, open to objection on any other ground. I am of opinion the appeal should be allowed.

Lord BRAMPTON, whose judgment was read by Lord Lindley, after stating the facts, said: From first to last I find no allusion to any contract or stipulation for either commission, discount, or allowance. Hilder's allotment of 6,975 out of the first issue of shares was accepted by him and fully paid for at par as a pure speculation. If it turned out badly his £6,975 might have been totally lost, and he would have had to bear his loss alone, and not one penny could have been claimed by him as commission, discount, or allowance. I do not think this could be contested. Now as to the remaining 66,667 shares, which I will call the optional shares. What was the state of things on the 8th of January, 1901, the day when the contract for the options of them was made? The directors, under article 9 of the articles of association, had control of all the shares representing the capital of the company, with power to allot or otherwise to dispose of them to such persons, on such terms and conditions, either at a premium or otherwise, at such times as the directors might think fit. All the shares then stood at par, and the par value being £1 per share; there was no obligation on the directors to offer any of them to the public, and they might have issued and allotted the whole 100,000 at that price, at one and the same time, had they so pleased. There was, however, then no certainty that any of the shares would attain and maintain a premium value in the future; and the success of the mines and the development of their worth could only be ascertained by means of the working capital immediately to be raised by the allotments to the fourteen selected gentlemen I have referred to. Mr. Hilder represents the case of all. He was willing to apply for and to risk the money he paid for his shares in the first issue on condition, but only on condition, that the options offered by the directors in the invitation to him were made to form part of his contract. By the first allotment accepting his condition the directors were bound to give him those options at the price they were offered, and when he exercised them by his notice he became bound to take and pay for the shares at that price, and at once was placed in the same position as if he had applied for them, and they had been allotted to him with the first issue when par was their true value. It is not contended that the contract would have been illegal before the Act of 1900, and I do not think it is, so far as regards the question before us, affected by the Act. It seems to me to have been a very reasonable and prudent contract to make when it was entered into, and in carrying it out the company will have raised, without deduction of any kind, the whole of their authorized share capital of £200,000 as contemplated on their incorporation; the shares they deliver will be applied, not in payment of commission, but purely in fulfilment of the agreement of the directors for good consideration to allot them to Mr. Hilder, who will pay for them the price fixed when the contract was made. I do not think that the Matabele case (if rightly decided) is applicable to the present. It is materially distinguishable in this, that there the 15,000 shares in question were expressly agreed to be allotted at a price below the then market premium value in order to satisfy an agreed commission. I think, for the reasons I have expressed, this appeal should be allowed, with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON concurred.

Decision of Swinfen Eady, J., 50 W. R. 424, [1902] 2 Ch. 214, affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (reported 50 W. R. 424, [1902] 2 Ch. 214).

The facts were as follows:

In June, 1901, Alfred J. Bird made a written offer to William Highett to purchase from him the leasehold house, 142, Friern-road, East Dulwich, at the price of £350. Highett replied that £365 was the lowest price that he could take, to which Bird replied by increasing his offer to £360, adding, "I shall be glad to hear that you will accept this, as no doubt you are aware that the house requires sundry repairs." This offer was declined, but on the 1st of July, Bird agreed to purchase for £365, and subsequently it was agreed between the parties that the purchase should be completed on the 27th of September, Bird, however, stipulating that he was to be at liberty to complete at any earlier date.

On the evening of the 27th of September, the tenant of the house brought to Highett, the vendor, a notice in writing, dated the 26th of September, which had been signed on behalf of the London County Council as the local authority under the London Building Act, and left on the premises. This notice required the owner and occupier of the house forthwith to take down, underpin, or otherwise render secure the front bay; also to shore up the structure immediately.

The notice not having been complied with, the police magistrate at the Lambeth police-court made an order under the London Building Acts on the 1st of November, requiring the owner to take down or underpin or otherwise render secure the front bay, to the satisfaction of the district surveyor, within fourteen days from the service of the order.

The order was served on the vendor's solicitor and on the vendor himself on or about the 8th or 9th of November.

The house was held on a lease, of which about eighty years were unexpired, at a ground-rent of £7 per annum, and the receipt for the last payment of ground-rent was produced to the purchaser by the vendor.

The lease contained a covenant to keep the buildings in good and substantial repair and condition. A dispute having arisen between the vendor and the purchaser as to the question by whom the expenses of complying with the order of the police magistrate were to be borne, this summons was taken out under the Vendor and Purchaser Act to determine it.

Swinfen Eady, J., held, on the evidence, that the purchaser inspected the property before agreeing to purchase and saw some cracks there, which cracks afterwards increased to such an extent that by the 21st of September, 1901, the premises were in a dangerous condition, and remained so until after the 6th of November. His lordship held, on the authority of Barnett v. Wheeler, 7 M. & W. 364, that the purchaser's knowlege of the state of the property was not material, and that section 3 (4) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, making the production of the last receipt for rent evidence of the performance of the covenants in the lease unless the contrary appeared, did not protect the vendor, as in this case "the contrary" did appear; and that the expenses must therefore be borne by the vendor.

Section 3, sub-section (4) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, is as follows: "Where land sold is held by lease . . . on production of the receipt for the last payment due for rent under the lease before the date of actual completion of the purchase, the purchaser shall assume, unless the contrary appears, that all the covenants . . . of the lease have been duly performed up to the date of actual completion of the purchase."

The vendor appealed.

In May, 1902, after the decision in the court below, the purchase was completed.

Eve, K.C., and E. Ford, for the appellant.—At the date fixed for completion the liability under the London Building Acts was not actually in existence; at all events, there was not then any pecuniary liability. If the governing date is the giving of the notice by the county council, all the argument in Tubbs v. Wynne, [1897] 1 Q. B. 74, 45 W. R. Dig. 168, was unnecessary: see also Stock v. Meakin, 48 W. R. 420 [1900] 1 Ch. 683. The outgoings ought to be ascertained when the works are completed. And the purchaser's attitude is inequitable, for he has bought the property at a lower price on account of its bad state and then turns round and claims that the vendor must pay for putting it in repair. There was no contract by the vendor that the property was in good repair. With regard to section 3 (4) of the Conveyancing Act, the purchaser knew of the state of the premises and the production of the last receipt for rent is proof as against him that the provisions of the lease have been complied with. Whether the purchaser would have had a right of action formerly or not, the law has been altered now by that section, which was intended to protect vendors against such a case as this.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and W. M. Spence, for the purchaser, were not called on.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case the controversy is as to whether the vendor or purchaser shall pay the expenses incurred in consequence of the action of the local authority, the London County Council. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] There was an argument before Swinfen Eady, J., and there has been one also before us, as to the rights of the parties with regard to those expenses under the provisions of the London Building Acts and whether at the time fixed for completion the obligation under the Acts had ripened into an obligation to pay a sum of money. It has been contended for the vendor that at that date the expenses had not become outgoings. It is, however, not necessary for us to decide that point. Swinfen Eady, J., did not decide the case on it, and I am not at present prepared to give an opinion on it, nor is it necessary for me to do so. Swinfen Eady, J., decided the case on the ground that the premises were in such a state of disrepair as to show breaches of covenant by the vendor as against his lessor, continuing down to the completion of the contract. He held, on the authority of Barnett v. Wheeler, that the purchaser of leasehold property, even though he knew of the condition of the premises, would have had a right of action against the vendor on the ground that he could not show a good title, since the lessor could have intervened. It is said that Barnett v. Wheeler is not applicable here, because the law has been changed by section 3 (4) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. Is that so? The sub-section is as follows: [His lordship read it, and continued:] How far does that modify the principle laid down by Barnett v. Wheeler? I think only to this extent, that by it the burden of proving breaches of covenant is thrown on the purchaser, the vendor's production of the last receipt for rent being made primâ facie evidence of compliance with the conditions of the lease. But the section says in terms "unless the contrary appears," and the purchaser cannot be barred from going into the circumstances and proving that the contrary does appear. If he does prove it, he brings himself within the principle of Barnett v. Wheeler, that on an open contract the purchaser has a right of action if there are breaches of covenant by the vendor, on the ground that the vendor has not shown a good title, and this, even though the purchaser knew the condition of the premises. No ingenuity can avoid the necessity on the part of the vendor here of arguing as though "primâ facie" meant "conclusive." The law remains unaltered, except that it has been modified with regard to the burden of proof, and this appeal must be dismissed. I should not have dealt with the matter at such length except out of respect for the arguments which have been addressed to us.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and wish only to add, with regard to the suggestion that this is a case of hardship on the vendor, that we have not here to deal with a claim for specific performance. Very likely the purchaser could not have enforced specific performance when he had contracted to buy the property at a small price on the footing that it was in bad repair. A court of equity might not enforce specific performance in a case of hardship, but we have not to deal with specific performance here.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. We are really asked to construe the sub-section of the Conveyancing Act as though the words were "although the contrary appears." I express no opinion on the question arising under the London Building Acts.

Will—Ademption—Purchase of house and land for legatee by testator in his lifetime—Codicil directing advances or moneys lent to be brought into hotchpot—Construction—Presumption against double portions.

A testator by his will gave one-third of his residuary estate to a daughter, who afterwards married. By a codicil, made after the marriage, the testator directed the amount of all "advances or moneys lent" by him to the daughter or her husband, or either of them, to be brought into hotchpot. Shortly after making the codicil the testator purchased a house and some land, which were conveyed by his direction to the daughter and her husband respectively.

Held, that these did not constitute "advances" within the meaning of the codicil. The law relating to the presumption against double portions based on Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Bro. Ch. C. 555, has not been changed by In re Lawes, 30 W. R. 33, 20 Ch. D. 81.

Decision of Buckley, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts were as follows:

John Jaques, of Hull, by his will, dated the 31st of March, 1897, after certain other devises, devised certain dwelling-houses in Hull upon trust for his daughter, Elizabeth Jaques, during her life, to whom he also gave an equal third part or share of the net proceeds of sale of his residuary real and personal estate. He further directed that on the death of each of his daughters the real estate devised in her favour during her life should be held on trust to pay out of the income arising therefrom, an annuity of £50 to her husband, if any, during his life or until remarriage, assignment, or bankruptcy, and subject thereto on trust for all the children of such daughter on attaining twenty-one in equal shares.

In August, 1898, Elizabeth Jaques married John Robert Braisby.

By a codicil dated the 26th of May, 1899, the testator, after referring to the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth, directed his trustees to hold her share of residue on the trusts declared by his will as to the real estate devised to her, except as to the payment of an annuity to her husband, and declared that she should have no power of anticipation. The codicil then proceeded as follows: "I declare that the said Elizabeth Braisby or the persons claiming the real estate specifically devised and the share of and in my residuary real and personal estate bequeathed by my said will in her favour, or by this codicil, directed to be held in trust for her during her life, shall not nor shall either or any of them participate in the benefit of such devise and bequest, direction, or trust without first bringing into hotchpot as part of my residuary personal estate the total amount of any advances or moneys lent by me to the said Elizabeth Braisby and her said husband or either of them since their marriage."

In June, 1899, the testator purchased a piece of land, with house and farm buildings, for £520, and caused it to be conveyed to Mrs. Braisby in fee; and in April, 1900, he purchased another piece of land for £60, and caused it to be conveyed to Mr. Braisby in fee.

The testator died on the 27th of March, 1901, and this summons was taken out by the surviving executor and trustee of his will for the determination (inter alia) of the question whether the purchase-moneys for these hereditaments or any part of them ought to be regarded as advances or moneys lent and to be brought into hotchpot.

The defendants to the summons were Mr. and Mrs. Braisby and their two infant children, and Mrs. Todd, another daughter of the testator, to whom another third share of residue was bequeathed by the will.

Buckley, J., held that none of the purchase-moneys ought to be regarded as advances or money lent or be brought into hotchpot.

Mrs. Todd appealed.

Upjohn, K.C., and A. H. Jessel, for the appellant.—This was in effect a gift to a daughter on her marriage, and is therefore an advancement which must be brought into account. The testator clearly intended to provide for equal division of his property among his descendants. And apart from construction the case is clearly within the rule against double portions. Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Bro. C. C. 555, has been overruled; see In re Lawes, 30 W. R. 33, 20 Ch. D. 81, and the observations on Jessel, M.R.'s, judgment in that case made by North, J., in In re Vickers, 36 W. R. 545, 37 Ch. D. 525. The law nowadays tends to include in the rule such advances as these.

They also cited or referred to Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. 140, at p. 151; Pym v. Lockyer 5 My. & Cr. 29;

Montefiore v. Guedalla, 8 W. R. 53, 1 De G. F. & J. 93; Bengough v. Walker, 15 Ves. 507; Lacon v. Lacon 39 W. R. 514, [1891] 2 Ch. 482; Chichester v. Coventry, 15 W. R. 849, L. Warrington, K.C., and E. S. Ford, for Mr. and Mrs. Braisby's infant children.—This is entirely a question of construction, and the rule against double portions has no application. The testator was thinking of payments of money, not of gifts in kind like these.

R. J. Parker, for Mr. and Mrs. Braisby.

Dec, 15.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., after stating the facts, continued: The sole question is whether this real estate must be taken to be "advances" within the words of the codicil. I think we cannot construe these words so as to make them include real estate. I cannot but give weight to the fact that the direction to bring advances and money lent into hotchpot follows words showing that the testator had in mind the distinction between real and personal estate, for he refers to his "residuary real and personal estate." Mr. Upjohn pressed upon us the argument that if we did not construe "advances" so as to make it include real estate we should give no meaning to the word, and should only make it equivalent to "moneys lent." But a separate meaning can be given to it if we include moneys paid at the request of a child; and there is nothing to show that the moneys laid out on real estate were moneys paid at the request of the daughter or her husband. The transaction was carried out by the direction of the testator alone. The case really turns on the construction of this codicil. But it has been so strongly urged upon us that there has been a great change in the law relating to the presumption against double portions on account of the decision in In re Lawes, and of the observations upon the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in that case made by North, J., in In re Vickers, that I feel bound to say I cannot assent to this view. I think that in In re Lawes Jessel, M.R., did not intend to overrule Holmes v. Holmes or the old doctrine based on it, but to affirm it. He discusses it, and says (20 Ch. D., on p. 87): "It is said that that case decided that a share in stock-in-trade was not a satisfaction of a pecuniary legacy, and taking the report as it stands it is impossible to say that it was not so decided. Still, I am not prepared to say that even a share in a stock-in-trade, if declared to be taken at a specific value, would not be a satisfaction of a portion; but I cannot discover from the report, which is very brief, what the facts really were." Then he proceeds to discuss Bengough v. Walker, and says that he thinks that he can find out what Sir W. Grant really meant in that case. A father gave to his child a share of a mill, and directed it to be made up to the value of £10,000, and it was held that that was a satisfaction of a portion of £2,000. The question argued was whether a share of a mill could be a satisfaction of a legacy, because a legacy must be satisfied by something of the same kind. What Sir W. Grant says, after referring so some authorities, is this: "But it is to be observed that in none of those cases did the party making the advance or the bequest ever make either, with reference to a definite amount to which he intended it should reach. They are all cases in which the testator, without reference to the pecuniary value of the thing he was giving, has given it; and the question was, whether, if upon entering into a computation of the value of the thing given, it turned out equal to the portion or the legacy, it should be taken as a satisfaction; the testator not having indicated any idea of his own whether it was or was not correspondent in value to the debt which he owed or the legacy which he gave. Those cases, therefore, would not precisely apply." Then Jessel, M.R., commenting upon that, said in In re Lawes: "The true meaning of that is, that where a testator gives to a child a beneficial lease or share of works, or any other thing, and says nothing about the value, he is not to be taken to be giving it in satisfaction of a pecuniary bequest; but where he does refer to the value the presumption of satisfaction may arise." In his judgment in In re Vickers, North, J. (37 Ch. D., at p. 534), quotes these words of Jessel, M.R., and says: "Now, what I understand him to be doing is to be commenting on the meaning of language used by a former judge in a case decided at a time when it was considered that a gift of something to go in ademption of a legacy must be something that would satisfy the legacy altogether and not pro tanto, and he is not expressing his own view of the law at the time he was speaking. The view of the Master of the Rolls, and of the whole court in that case, was that a gift of a share in a business, in that case more valuable than a legacy, was of itself sufficient to adeem the legacy, and that the rule that there is a primâ facie presumption against double portions applied, and that in that case there was nothing to rebut it." But with all deference to North, J., the plain basis of the decision in In re Lawes, was that the share in that case was valued at a fixed amount. This is clear if one looks at the judgment of the court. Lush, L.J., says (20 Ch. D., at p. 89) "it was equivalent to the father saying, 'I will give you £19,000 in money if you will agree to put it into the business;'" and Lindley, L.J., says "the father gives his son £19,000. He gives it in money—not in cash, but in what is to be taken as so much money. There is no question as to the value of what he gives; it is to be taken by the son as that amount of cash. Then why does not the presumption of satisfaction arise? I see no reason for saying it does not." I think that in In re Lawes, Jessel, M.R., did not mean what North, J., in In re Vickers considered that he meant, and this view leaves untouched the statement of the law in Williams on Executors (9th ed., p. 1197) based on Holmes v. Holmes.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case turns on the construction of the codicil, and especially on that of the word "advances" in it. We were asked to read this in the sense of advancements by portion, the expression which is to be found in the marginal note to the Statute of Distributions. The word "advances" is susceptible of this meaning, and has been so used by various judges—for instance, by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Pye—and by text-writers, for instance, on p. 464 in the last edition of Lewin on Trusts. But this is not the only, or the natural, sense of the word "advances." The natural sense of it is advances of money; an advance of a house or land would not be understood without explanation by anyone but an expert. Therefore, unless the context so requires it, I think we ought not so to construe it here; and the context goes the other way, for the testator speaks of his residuary real and personal estate before he speaks of his residuary personal estate, and speaks of the amount, not the value, of advances. I agree also that we do not make the word "advances" ineffectual by putting this limited construction on it; and this limited sense is illustrated by Austen v. Powell. I agree also with what Vaughan Williams, L.J., has said as to the suggested change in the rule relating to double portions; and I cannot read Jessel, M.R.'s, judgment in In re Lawes in the sense put upon it by North, J., in In re Vickers.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely agree as to the construction of the codicil, on which the case really turns, and have nothing to add as to that. In my opinion the rule against double portions has no application here, but I entirely agree with the remarks of Vaughan Williams, L.J., as to the decision in In re Lawes, and North, J.'s, criticism of it in In re Vickers. I cannot adopt this criticism, though no doubt North, J.'s, own decision in that case was correct.

S. for life, and subject thereto, in events which happened, upon trust for* (inter alios) the issue of G. F. S., but without expressly including in such class the said S. S. R.

Held, that S. S. R. had been legitimated for all the purposes of the will, and was entitled to share in estate B.

Adjourned summons.

W. L. S. by his will dated the 9th of April, 1880, devised freehold property in Bank-street, Sheffield, upon the following among other trusts—viz., "to pay the net income thereof to my said nephew G. F. S. during his natural life or until he shall assign the same . . . and after the failure or determination of the trust lastly hereinbefore mentioned . . . in his lifetime . . . to pay or apply the same . . . for or towards the maintenance and personal support of my said nephew G. F. S. and his wife and issue, whether children or more remote, for the time being in existence, including S. S. R., hereinafter named . . . and subject to and on the expiration of the trust aforesaid I direct my trustees or trustee for the time being to sell my said freehold property and hold the net proceeds arising from such sale . . . upon trust for all and every the children or child of my said nephew living at my death or born afterwards . . . including amongst such children or child S. S. R., the illegitimate son of my said nephew, provided always and I declare that if there shall be no child of my said nephew including the same S. S. R. living at my death or born afterwards . . . to hold such proceeds upon trust for such of . . . (eight named nephews and nieces) as shall be living at the decease of my said nephew, and the issue, living at the decease of my said nephew G. F. S., of such of my said other nephews and nieces as shall die in the lifetime of my said nephew G. F. S. leaving issue in equal shares as tenants in common," such issue taking their parents' shares per stirpes.

By the next following clause of his said will the testator devised other freehold property in Regent-street, Sheffield, "upon trust to pay the income thereof to my said niece M. S. during the term of her natural life," and subject thereto to sell and hold the net proceeds upon trust for the child or children of M. S., and in default of such, "upon trust for such of my nephews and nieces, the said G. F. S. and . . . (the eight other nephews and nieces so named as aforesaid) . . . as shall be living at the decease of my said niece M. S. and the issue living at the decease of my said niece M. S. of such of my said other nephews and nieces as shall die in the lifetime of my said niece M. S. leaving issue, in equal shares as tenants in common," such issue taking the parents' shares per stirpes.

The testator died in 1883, and his will was duly proved by his widow (since deceased) and the plaintiffs.

The niece M. S. died in 1902 without ever having been married.

The nephew G. F. S. died in 1897, leaving issue one illegitimate son only—viz., the said S. S. R.

This summons was taken out to determine whether upon the true construction of the will, S. S. R. was entitled to a share in the Regent-street property as well as in the property in Bank-street.

Kenyon Parker, for the summons.

R. J. Parker, for the illegitimate son S. S. R., submitted that the testator having named S. S. R. in some places must be taken to have defined a class including S. S. R., and that wherever the class was afterwards mentioned S. S. R. was impliedly a member of it.

He cited In re Wood, Wood v. Wood, 50 W. R. 695, [1902] 2 Ch. 542; In re Parker, Parker v. Osborne, 45 W. R. 536, [1897] 2 Ch. 208; and In re Walker, Walker v. Luiyens, 45 W. R. 647, [1897] 2 Ch. 238.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C. (Everard with him), and Peterson, for other beneficiaries.—The testator has not himself made a dictionary; there is a distinction between "namely" and "including," the latter obviously means an addition to a class of someone who would not otherwise be included. The testator has been careful to include S. S. R. in certain places, and the proper inference is that when he does not mention him he does not intend to include him.

They cited Meredith v. Farr, 2 Y. & C. Ch. Cas. 525.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, said the case was very near the line, but on the whole there was a sufficient indication in the will of an intention to include S. S. R. in the class of issue of G. F. S. for all purposes. The case of Meredith v. Farr was a different case, for there there were two illegitimate children, one of whom was only once mentioned, and Knight-Bruce, V.C., although a very broadminded judge, thought it was too dangerous to include her. Moreover, in 1843 the view which the court took of the claims of natural children was a very different one from that now taken, and "issue" then only included persons justis nuptiis procreati, unless there was something very strong indeed to show the contrary intention; the whole trend of modern decisions had been in favour of the claims of illegitimates to be included, and the court would take hold of anything reasonably possible in the will as a foundation upon which to base their inclusion. [His lordship cited the several loci in the will where S. S. R. was mentioned, and continued:] I am therefore of opinion that this testator, being well aware that S. S. R. was illegitimate, has yet manifested an intention to make him the son of G. F. S. for all the purposes of his will and to include him in the class wherever the class is mentioned.

In re LOVERIDGE.

DRAYTON v. LOVERIDGE. (a.)

Mortgage—Mortgagee in possession—Equity of redemption barred—Intestacy of mortgagee—Devolution of mortgaged land.

Testator, for three years before his death, was mortgagee in possession of freehold land, and died leaving all his real and personal property to his widow for her life, but made no disposition of the remainder expectant upon the widow's decease. The widow, as life tenant, continued in possession of the mortgaged land for many years, and during her possession the mortgagor's equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises became barred by lapse of time. Upon the widow's death, in an action for administration of the estate of the testator, the mortgagee,

Held, that the mortgaged land must be treated as personalty for the purposes of devolution from the mortgagee, and passed as personalty to the next-of-kin of the testator.

Administration action.

The question for determination in this case was whether mortgaged freehold land of which the mortgagee had taken possession, and the equity of redemption in which had become barred by the Statutes of Limitation after the death of the mortgagee, devolved as realty or personalty of the mortgagee.

By an indenture, dated the 26th of May, 1831, certain real estate was mortgaged to James Loveridge to secure £1,075 and interest.

In 1861 the mortgagee entered into possession of the property, and so remained until his death in December, 1864. By his will, dated the 7th of February, 1863, James Loveridge devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate, subject to certain annuities, to his widow during widowhood, and appointed her executrix, but he died intestate as to the reversion. After his death his widow (who never remarried) went into possession as tenant for life, and so continued until she died in February, 1900.

Anna Drayton, who was the executrix of the widow, brought this action to administer the estate of the testator for the purpose of determining whether the mortgaged estate was to be treated as realty or personalty.

The heir-at-law of the testator was his brother, Isaac Loveridge, who had since died, leaving his daughters, the defendants, as co-heiresses of the testator. The persons entitled as next-of-kin to the personal estate of the testator at the time of his death were the testator's widow and Isaac Loveridge.

An order for the administration of the testator's estate was made on the 7th of May, 1900; and by the chief clerk's certificate, filed on the 22nd of April, 1902, the question was reserved whether the mortgage debt and the land comprised in the mortgage remained personalty, or whether the fact of entering into and retaining possession of the mortgaged property required it to be treated as realty of the mortgagee.

H. Charlton Hawkins, for the plaintiff Anna Drayton.—The testator's widow was entitled to a moiety of the testator's personal estate, as to which he died intestate. The test is, what was the nature of the mortgaged property at the mortgagee's death: Williams on Executors (9th ed.), vol. 1, p. 602. At that time the equity of redemption had not become barred, and therefore the mortgagee's interest in the land was only personalty. It must therefore devolve as personalty, and the mortgagee's heir-at-law can only take it as trustee for the next-of-kin: Canning v. Hicks, 1 Vern. 412; Tabor v. Grover, 2 Vern. 367. At all events, the next-of-kin are entitled to a charge on the land for the amount of the mortgage debt and interest: Awdley v. Awdley, 2 Vern. 192.

H. F. F. Greenland, for the next-of-kin of Isaac Loveridge, supported the plaintiff's contention, and cited Earl of Carlisle v. Gober, Nelson 52; Ellis v. Guavas, 2 Ch. Cas. 50; Attorney-General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. 256, see Lord Eldon's dictum at p. 277; and Flack v. Longmate, 8 Beav. 420.

Fossett Lock, for the co-heiresses.—It is a question of intention on the part of the mortgagee whether the property is to be considered realty or personalty: Noys v. Mordaunt, 2 Vern. 581. When a mortgagee enters into possession he shows an intention to take the mortgaged property as land, subject only to the liability of being redeemed by the mortgagor; and as the mortgagor's right to redeem has become barred by time, the land devolves as realty: Attorney-General v. Bowyer, 3 Ves. 714; Garrett v. Evers, Mos. 364; In re Alison, Johnson v. Mounsey, 27 W. R. 389, 11 Ch. D. 284. At all events, the next-of-kin are only entitled to a charge on the land: In re Woodhead [1884] W. N. 174; Clerkson v. Bowyer, 2 Vern. 66.

Greenland replied.

Aug. 2.—BUCKLEY, J.—James Loveridge, the testator in this cause, died on the 28th of December, 1864, having by his will, dated the 7th of February, 1863, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to his wife during her widowhood, subject to certain annuities. Subject to those gifts he died intestate. He appointed his wife executrix. The testator was entitled to a mortgage debt of £1,075, secured upon certain messuages and lands by deed dated the 26th of May, 1831. In 1861, three years before his death, he went into possession and remained in possession of the mortgaged property until his death in December, 1864. After his death his widow went into possession, and so remained until her death on the 15th of February, 1900. She never married again. She was therefore tenant for life from 1864 until 1900. The plaintiff Anna Drayton is executrix of the widow. The persons entitled under the statutes of distribution to James Loveridge's personal estate at the time of his death were the widow and a brother of the testator named Isaac Loveridge. The certificate reserves the question whether the mortgage debt and the land comprised in the mortgage remain of the nature of personalty, or whether the possession of the mortgaged property is to be treated as making it realty. The plaintiff argues that it is personalty. The defendants argue that it is realty. The plaintiff does not argue that the possession of the widow was on her own behalf. The mortgage was by way of trust for sale, but no contention is raised by the plaintiff on that ground: see In re Alison, Johnson v. Mounsey.

The whole question to be determined is whether after possession for three years by the testator, followed by possession by the widow, the property is for the purposes of devolution from the testator to be treated as realty or personalty. Regarding this matter upon principle, it seems to me that the property is for the purposes of devolution to be treated as personalty. The testator at the time of his death was entitled to the mortgage debt, which was personalty, and, by way of security, the land was vested in him subject to redemption. The estate in the land descended to the heir, but at the moment of the testator's death the heir was, as it appears to me, only a trustee for the legal personal representative who was entitled to the debt and to the beneficial interest in the land in respect of the debt. After the lapse of many years the equity of redemption became barred, and the estate of the heir was no longer subject to redemption, but I see no reason why the estate of the heir, of which he was up to that time trustee for the legal personal representative, became at that date or at any time his own property. Someone at the testator's death became entitled to the property. Unquestionably, as regards the mortgage debt, that person was the legal personal representative. The right against the land by way of security was the property of that same person, and, although at a later date the right in respect of the land became enlarged from a right subject to redemption to a right free from redemption, that can have no effect in discharging the legal owner of the land from his trusteeship for the owner of the debt.

Passing to authority, I find that in Attorney-General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. at p. 277, Lord Eldon says this: "Where a person dies entitled to a mortgaged interest, that is personalty at that time; and although afterwards a mortgagor may be barred, that would not convert the property as between the representatives at the time of his death from personal to real; but the person taking it as real would be a trustee for the persons entitled to it at the death of the testator such as it was. But if that person, alone entitled at the death of the testator, remains in possession, in the same manner as his ancestor was, without any act as between him and the mortgagor, there being a clear option in a question with himself to determine, whether it shall be real or personal estate, if he lets it become real, no one has a right to say it shall be personal." The former sentence of the above exactly fits, as it seems to me, the present case; the latter means, I think (applying it to the facts of the case before me), that, if the widow had alone been entitled at the testator's death to the mortgage debt (which she was not, for the brother Isaac was entitled to a moiety), then for the purposes of devolution from her the property would have been realty. Again, Flack v. Longmate, seems to me to be a clear decision in favour of my view. In that case, interest on the mortgage had been paid down to 1816. Flack died in 1830, so that the mortgagor's claim was not barred at his death. His widow claimed dower out of the estate. It was held that she was not entitled to dower. Lord Langdale said that it was necessary to consider what estate the husband had at the time of his death; that, in order to consider whether the widow was dowable, it was necessary to look at the matter as it stood at the husband's death, and not at subsequent events. He concluded his judgment by saying: "It may appear that nobody is to redeem; but did this state of things exist at the death of the husband? Though the husband might have considered it as his own at his death, and though I may not now consider it subject to any claim to redemption, yet the quality of the estate in the consideration of this court, at the decease of the husband was not such as to give a right to dower." I can see no distinction for the present purpose between a case in which the question is whether the beneficial interest in the property descends upon the heir and a case where the question is whether the widow is entitled to dower. For the proposition that the heir is trustee for the legal personal representatives, the cases of Ellis v. Guavas, Clerkson v. Bower, and Awdley v. Awdley are authorities. In Ellis v. Guavas, "administrator of a mortgagor" in the second line is, I think, a misprint for "administrator of a mortgagee." The case is not intelligible without that alteration, and the matter is made plain, I think, seven lines down by the passage: "The land shall go to the administrator because the money would have gone to her." The administrator in that connection can only be the administrator of the mortgagee to whom the money was to be payable.

But then it is said that, where the equity of redemption is released or foreclosed or the estate becomes irredeemable after the testator's death, the heir may be entitled to pay off the mortgage debt to the personal estate and retain the land. For this there was cited a case before Bacon, V.C., of In re Woodhead. The rule used to be that cases ought not to be cited from the Weekly Notes, and I think that, in this instance at least, the rule is deserving of observance. The reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor is not given, and the note is not easy to follow. The one thing which does appear is that no authorities were cited. It may be that the decision rested upon the fact that there was a devise of mortgage estates, and that it was to persons other than those to whom the residuary real and personal estate were given. However this may be, I do not think that the note of that case can prevail as against the authorities to which I have referred. I hold, therefore, that this property devolved upon the legal representative as personalty.

Gaming — Betting — Coupon competitions — Advertisement—Use of newspaper office for betting by advertiser —Liability of proprietor of newspaper—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 3.

M., the proprietor of a newspaper called Football Chat, was the occupier of an office in Bedford-street, Strand, where his newspaper was published. T. had an office at Middelburg, in Holland, where he conducted sporting coupon competitions, which, by agreement between T. and M., were advertised week by week in the latter's paper. The advertisements contained offers of money prizes for correct guesses as to the winners of football matches, and offered coupons at certain rates to intending competitors. Appended to the advertisements were coupon sheets, which might be filled up, and were directed to be sent, with postal order, to Football Chat, *Middelburg, Holland. for publishing the names of the prize-winners; but M did not share in the profits of the coupon competition. The postal orders were returned to England and collected by a bank and placed to the credit of T.

Held, that there was evidence that T. was a person using the office of M's newspaper for the purpose of money being received by T as the consideration for a promise to pay money on the event of a game within the meaning of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, and that M. was a person knowingly and wilfully permitting his office to be used as aforesaid within the meaning of section 3 of the said Act.

Case stated.

This was an appeal from the decision of R. H. B. Marsham, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Bow-street police-court, convicting Donald Mackenzie, the appellant, upon two charges on two informations under the Betting Act, 1853.

The first information, under section 3, charged that the appellant, being the occupier of a certain office or place situate at 23, Bedford-street, Strand, did, on the 12th of November, 1901, unlawfully knowingly and wilfully permit the said office to be used by one H. T. Terry, a person using the same for the purpose of money or valuable things being received by or on behalf of the said Terry as and for the consideration for an undertaking or promise to pay or give thereafter money, on events or contingencies of or relating to football contrary to the form of the statute.

The second information, under section 1, charged that the appellant, being such occupier, on the date and at the place aforesaid unlawfully did open and keep and use the said office or place for the purpose of money or valuable things being received by or on behalf of the said Terry, a person using the said office for the like purpose.

The magistrate convicted the appellant on both informations.

At the hearing the following facts were admitted or proved before the magistrate:

On the 12th of November, 1901, the appellant was the occupier of an office situate at 23, Bedford-street, Strand. He was also the registered proprietor of a weekly newspaper called Football Chat and Athletic World, and this office was the principal place at which the newspaper was published and the business thereof conducted. The person H. T. Terry mentioned in the informations was a person having an office at Middelburg, Holland, and was, at the period mentioned, to the knowledge of the appellant, conducting certain competitions known as "Sporting Coupon Competitions." These competitions were by agreement between Terry and the appellant advertised week by week in Football Chat and Athletic World, for which advertisements the appellant received pecuniary consideration amounting to about £27 in each issue of the newspaper; in addition to this the names of the prize-winners were periodically published in lists of different lengths, and were paid for at the same rate, and the advertisements which were headed "Football Chat Competitions" contained the rules and conditions subject to which the competitions were conducted.

Part of such advertisements consisted of coupon sheets on which intending competitors could fill in their selections. It was not obligatory on competitors to fill in their selections in such coupon sheets; they were at liberty to use plain paper. All the moneys remitted by competitors in respect of the competitions were in the form of postal orders, and they with their sender's selections were, in accordance with the advertised conditions, addressed by post to Football Chat at Middelburg. The postal orders were returned to this country for collection by the London and Westminster Bank, and the proceeds thereof placed to the credit of one B. W. Blydenstein (agent of the said H. T. Terry), who paid the appellant by Terry's instructions for the advertisements.

The appellant stated in his evidence that he had not received any benefit from the coupon competitions other than that accruing to him as payment for the insertion of the advertisements in his newspaper. H. T. Terry had no interest in the newspaper Football Chat other than that accruing to him through advertising the coupon competitions therein, and it appeared that he never made any personal use of the above office except that he once called there.

The magistrate held that H. T. Terry was a person using the office, 23, Bedford-street, and that he used the same for the purpose of money being received by himself on the consideration for his promises to pay money on the result of football matches. He also found that the appellant permitted the said user by H. T. Terry, and that he opened and kept the said office for the purpose of such user by H. T. Terry. He also found that the appellant derived benefit from the insertion of the coupon advertisements and list of winners, for which he received considerably more than for ordinary advertisements, but that he did not share in the profits of the coupon competitions. He accordingly convicted the appellant, and fined him £100 on the first information and 1s. on the second information, and ordered him to pay twenty guineas costs.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate was right in law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

The advertisement in the issue of the 12th of November, 1901, was headed:

"H. T. Terry's, Middleburg, Advertisement.—Football Chat Football Skill Competition.—£150 for ten correct results or next best, and £50 in fifty consolation prizes of £1 each. Ten coupons for sixpence. Twenty-four coupons for one shilling postal orders."

Then followed:

"Coupons for matches played Saturday, Nov. 16."

The coupon contained a list of the football matches to be played, and lines indicating where the coupon was to be cut out for the purpose of being sent, and stated that:

"Coupons must be addressed to Football Chat, Middelburg, Holland."

At the end of the advertisement was the statement:

"Printed and published by the Proprietors of the Bedford Publishing Press, at 23, Bedford-street, Strand, London, W.C. (Tuesday, 12th Nov.)."

The Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), provides:

"Whereas a kind of gaming has of late sprung up tending to the injury and demoralization of improvident persons by the opening of places called betting-houses or offices, and the receiving of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices, or by other persons acting on their behalf, on their promises to pay money on events of horse-races and the like contingencies: For the suppression thereof, be it enacted . . . as follows:

Section 1. No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, or any person procured or employed by or acting for or on behalf of such owner, occupier, or keeper, or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management or in any manner conducting the business thereof, betting with persons resorting thereto; or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse-race, or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise, or as or for the consideration for securing the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency as aforesaid; and every house, office, room, or other place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance and contrary to law."

"Section 3. Any person who being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, or either of them; and any person who being the owner or occupier of any house, room, office, or other place shall knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept, or used by any other person for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them; and any person having the care or management of or in any manner assisting in conducting the business of any house, office, room, or place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them, shall, on summary conviction thereof before any two justices of the peace, be liable to forfeit and pay such penalty, not exceeding one hundred pounds, as shall be adjudged by such justices, and may be further adjudged by such justices to pay such costs attending such conviction as to the said justices shall seem reasonable; and on the nonpayment of such penalty and costs, or in the first instance, if to the said justices it shall seem fit, may be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding six calendar months.

C. W. Mathews (G. H. Stutfield with him), for the appellant.

Avory, K.C. (J. K. Mackay with him), for the respondent.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the following judgments.

Stoddart v. Hawke, 50 W. R. 93, [1902] 1 K. B. 353; Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co., 47 W. R. 585, [1899] A. C. 143; Reg. v. Cook, 32 W. R. 796; Reg. v. Stoddart, 49 W. R. 173, [1901] 1 K. B. 177; Hornsby v. Raggett, 40 W. R. 111, [1892] 1 Q. B. 20, were cited.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is one of four cases stated by a metropolitan police magistrate under the Betting Act, 1853. Three of them to a large extent involve the same point. I will deal with them in their order, indicating so far as is necessary what are the distinctive features of one from the other.

In this case the magistrate convicted the appellant Mackenzie on two summonses which are set out in the case, for permitting the office at Bedford-street to be used by Terry, who was a person using the same for the prohibited purposes, and for opening, keeping, and using the office for the purpose of money being there received by or on behalf of Terry for the like consideration. The facts may be shortly summarized in this way: At that office there was published by the appellant a newspaper which was called Football Chat and Athletic World, and which contained on the last page that which is called an advertisement: "H. T. Terry's, Middelburg, Holland, Advertisement. Football Chat Football Skill Competition." It is not necessary to say more about the competition than that it clearly comes within the class of cases held to be illegal in many decisions in which these questions have arisen. The coupon was, when cut out, filled up and sent with money, addressed to "Football Chat, Middelburg, Holland." There were certain coupon rules from which it appeared that the names of the winners, as the result of the competition, would be advertised in the paper and the prizes remitted on a certain day, and everybody claiming to be a prize winner whose name did not appear in that list was required to send in a remonstrance or claim before a certain day. The sole address was said to be "Football Chat, Middelburg, Holland," and there appears below, "Printed and published by the proprietors, Bedford Publishing Press, at 23, Bedford-street, Strand." It was stated before the magistrate—but he has not found it one way or the other as a matter of fact—that the appellant had no interest in the competitions, and we do not proceed upon any view that there is any finding upon which we could act that the competition itself was on behalf of the appellant. It was stated that the appellant received a considerable amount more for the advertisements than the ordinary rate; that the moneys with the coupons were remitted to Holland and were returned, not, of course, passing through the hands of the appellant again. Upon that state of facts it was contended for the appellant that there was no user by Terry of the office at 23, Bedford-street for an illegal purpose, and that, if there were no user by Terry, there could be no permission by the appellant that Terry should so use it. I think it is extremely important to read the finding of the magistrate, and to see what it amounts to. [His lordship read the findings of the magistrate as set out in the case, and proceeded:] It is scarcely necessary to say that that finding of the office being opened and kept for the purpose of such user by Terry, and of Terry using the office for the purpose of these competitions, if there is evidence to support it, brings the case within one or more previous decisions. It is said by counsel on behalf of the appellant that there is no evidence on which that finding could properly be supported, because all that was done was that the coupons were printed and sent out from that office. In my opinion there was evidence upon which the magistrate could come to that conclusion. The coupon, and the receipt of the money by Terry with the coupon, is really of the essence of the scheme. The coupon goes out in order that the person may fill it up and may send it to Terry. It seems to me that that operation carried out at Bedford-street, where the paper could be obtained, was evidence of a user by Terry of that place for the carrying out of an essential part of his scheme, and therefore I think there was evidence upon which the magistrate could rightly find that Terry himself used this office, and that the appellant permitted Terry so to use it. It is to be noticed that there is no finding here of what I may call any independent newspaper undertaking; and, if it were an independent newspaper undertaking, it is difficult to understand why the money should be sent to Football Chat at Middelburg, and why the competition should be spoken of as "Football Chat Football Skill Competition." If it were a mere case of an ordinary innocent advertisement, a very different state of things would prevail. I have only to add with reference to this case that in the case of Stoddart v. Hawke this court decided that the money need not be received at the place. The substantial finding, as the court there pointed out, and the material finding, was that the place is used as a part of the essential machinery for the receipt of the money for the illegal purpose. Holding, as I do, that the findings of facts by the magistrate in this case can be justified by the evidence, I think he has come to the right conclusion, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me to be found by the magistrate, and upon evidence which cannot be disputed, that the appellant permitted Terry, who had the office at Middleburg in Holland, to advertise in the paper Football Chat, and in that paper to issue the coupons which were procured at the office of the newspaper. Counsel for the appellant has argued that this sheet of Football Chat was nothing but an advertisement. He spoke of it as an advertisement, and as though all we were dealing with was an advertisement in the newspaper as to where one might go and get some information as to betting. But it is to be noticed that the real thing that was issued was much more than an advertisement. What was issued there was the series of coupons. They were issued as a part of the paper, but none the less they were coupons which people used for the purpose of betting; and the coupons that were issued from that office of Football Chat were a part of the machinery by which Terry carried on the business of betting with people who affected to choose, according to his system, what football clubs would win certain matches. When we have to consider whether he used the place for the purpose of betting with persons, clearly Terry used the newspaper for those purposes, and the newspaper was published at the office of Football Chat, and issued therefrom with the coupons attached. That possibly might alone be enough to bring this office within the statute. It is not necessary to decide that in this case, and I will not say whether I think it would be enough to bring it within the statute or not. I do not affect to decide that, and it is not necessary to do so, because the magistrate has here found that the appellant permitted the user of the office by Terry, and that he opened and kept the office for the purpose of such user by Terry, and that he derived a profit from it; that he charged considerably more than he charged for ordinary advertisements; he charged Terry for the privilege of putting these coupons into his paper considerably more than the ordinary charge. That being so, it seems to me that Terry did use this office for an illegal purpose within the meaning of this Betting Act, and that he used it by the permission of the appellant in the way which has been pointed out, and that therefore the appellant was also guilty within the Act for permitting the illegal thing to be done, which illegal thing Terry did. Therefore I am also of the same opinion as my lord.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I also wish to say that I found my judgment entirely on the finding in this case, which I think is a finding absolutely justified, and I have not the slightest doubt that it is absolutely true that this office was opened and kept by the appellant Mackenzie for the express purpose of this thing being done. The whole object of this paper called Football Chat and Athletic World beyond all doubt was for the purpose of working this coupon competition and scheme. The magistrate has found that, and, as he has found that, it seems to me it brings the case absolutely and entirely within our previous decision in the case of Stoddart v. Hawke. If it had not been for that finding I should have had some difficulty, because I think the argument for the appellant was right to a considerable extent—namely, that there must be something like a physical user of the office. The whole object of this Betting Act of 1853 is to prohibit betting offices within the meaning which the Legislature put on that word; and it is necessary that a person to be held liable for using the place must be a person who uses it either in the character of owner, keeper, or manager, or conductor of the business. If he is a person who has not that character, then he must be some other person who is analogous to and is of the same genus as the owner, keeper, and occupier, as we see by one portion of the judgment of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Halsbury) in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. It must be the use by some person having some kind of dominion or control over the place, or conducting his business there. Consequently, if this really were the case of two independent persons, one carrying on a newspaper and the other having a scheme for receiving money by himself in Holland which he desired to advertise, and if this were a bonâ fide advertisement in a bonâ fide newspaper, I should think that the mere use of the newspaper was not the use of the office of the newspaper within the meaning of this statute. But on the findings, which, as I have said, are perfectly justified, that question does not really arise, and I therefore agree in dismissing this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

HAWKE v. MACKENZIE (No. 1).

Special case.

This was an appeal by special case stated by R. H. B. Marsham, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Bow-street police-court.

An information was preferred by John Hawke, the appellant, against Donald Mackenzie, the respondent, under section 7 of the Betting Act, 1853, charging that the respondent, as occupier of a certain office or place situate at 23, Bedford-street, Strand, did, on the 12th of November, 1901, unlawfully cause a certain advertisement to be published whereby it appeared that the said office or place was opened, kept, or used for the purpose of making bets or wagers.

At the hearing, when the learned magistrate dismissed the summons, the following facts were proved or admitted.

On the date specified the respondent was occupier of the office in Bedford-street and also the registered proprietor of a newspaper called Football Chat and Athletic World. The office was the principal one at which Football Chat was published and the business of that newspaper conducted.

A copy of Football Chat, dated the 12th of November, 1901, was put in evidence at the hearing, as was also one of its posters for the 12th of November, 1901. The copy contained an advertisement of a football coupon competition, and was procurable at the office by intending competitors. A copy of Football Chat for the 12th of November, 1901, was annexed to this case, as was also the poster given in evidence.

All the coupons filled up and dispatched by the competitors, together with the remittances accompanying, were, in accordance with the instructions in the advertisements, addressed to "Football Chat, Middelburg, Holland," and remittances were to be made payable to H. T. Terry.

The respondent stated in evidence that H. T. Terry was the sole promoter of the competitions, and that H. T. Terry received all the money sent by competitors in respect thereof, and all the profits derived from them belonged to H. T. Terry.

The respondent swore he had no interest in the competitions or the profits thereof except moneys received from advertising them in the newspaper, which moneys amounted to about £27 in each issue of Football Chat, and also the moneys arising from the periodical publication in Football Chat of the list of prize winners, the number of which varied from time to time, the insertion of such lists being paid for at the same rate as the advertisements. H. T. Terry made personal use of the office by occasionally calling there.

It was proved that the competitions for which the money was received were in respect of football matches, and that they were described in Football Chat as "Football Chat Football Skill Competitions," and that the address in Holland was given as "Football Chat, Middelburg, Holland."

Upon the above facts counsel for the appellant contended that the decision of the Divisional Court in the case of Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co., 49 W. R. 666, [1901] 2 K. B. 470, was not fully argued as both parties had the same interest, and that it was inconsistent with the opinions expressed by several of the judges in the case of Reg. v. Stoddart, 49 W. R. 173, [1901] 1 K. B. 177, in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, and that, as this latter court was the superior one, the magistrate would be bound by its decision rather than that of the Divisional Court.

Counsel for the respondent contended that the office was not opened, kept, or used for the purpose of H. T. Terry making bets or wagers in manner prohibited by the Act; that the respondent did not advertise the office as being so opened, kept, or used; and that the decision in Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co. would be binding on the magistrate as it was later in date to that in Reg. v. Stoddart.

The following cases were also referred to before the learned magistrate: Cox v. Andrews, 32 W. R. 289, 12 Q. B. D. 126, and Reg. v. Brown, 43 W. R. 222, [1895] 1 Q. B. 119.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate came to a correct determination in point of law.

The Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), provides as follows:

Section 7.—Any person exhibiting or publishing or causing to be exhibited or published any placard, handbill, card, writing, sign, or advertisement whereby it shall be made to appear that any house, office, room, or place is opened, kept, or used for the purpose of making bets or wagers in manner aforesaid or for the purpose of exhibiting lists for betting or with intent to induce any person to resort to such house, office, room, or place for the purpose of making bets or wagers in manner aforesaid; or any person who on behalf of the owner or occupier of such house, office, room, or place or person using the same shall invite other persons to resort thereto for the purpose of making bets or wagers in the manner aforesaid, shall upon summary conviction thereof before two justices of the peace forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding £30, and may be further adjudged by such justices to pay such costs attending such conviction as to the said justices shall seem reasonable, and on the non-payment of such penalty and costs or in the first instance if to such justices it shall seem fit may be committed to the common gaol or house of correction with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two calendar months.

Avory, K.C. (J. K. Mackay with him), for the appellant.

The following case, the facts and points of law being somewhat similar to those in the above case, was then proceeded with:

HAWKE v. MACKENZIE (No. 2).

This was also an appeal by way of case stated from the decision of R. H. B. Marsham, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Bow-street.

Two informations were preferred by John Hawke, the appellant, under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, and section 3 (1) of the Betting Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 15), against the respondent Mackenzie, for that he did on the 12th of November, 1901, unlawfully cause two certain advertisements to be published whereby it appeared that J. O'Reilly, of 55, Chatham-road, Rock Ferry, Cheshire, and J. Taylor, of 46A, Market-street, Manchester, respectively would on application give information for the purpose of or with respect to certain bets, wagers, events, or contingencies mentioned in the Betting Act, 1874.

At the respective hearings on the 5th and 7th of December, 1901, the summonses on the above informations were heard, and the following facts were proved or admitted:

On the date specified, the respondent was the occupier of an office, 23, Bedford-street, and also registered proprietor of a newspaper called Football Chat and Athletic World. The office was the principal one at which the newspaper was published and the business thereof conducted.

A copy of the newspaper, dated the 12th of November, 1901, was put in evidence at the hearing. The copy contained advertisements whereby it appeared that J. O'Reilly and J. Taylor respectively would on application give information with respect to certain bets, wagers, events, or contingencies with respect to the game of football. A copy of the newspaper for the 12th of November, 1901, was annexed to this case.

Upon the above facts, counsel for the appellant contended that the decision of the Divisional Court in the case of Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co. was not fully argued as both parties had the same interest, and that it was inconsistent with the opinions expressed by some of the judges in the case of Reg. v. Stoddart in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, and that, as this latter court was the superior one, the magistrate would be bound by its decision rather than that of the Divisional Court; and, further, that the decision in Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co. did not itself apply to advertisements such as those of O'Reilly and Taylor.

Counsel for the respondent contended: (1) That the advertisements did not relate to information to be given for the purpose of wagers to be made in any house or place prohibited by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. (2) That the decision in Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co. would be binding on the magistrate as it was later in time than that of Reg. v. Stoddart.

Upon the facts as proved and stated in the other special cases now being stated by the magistrate with reference to decisions given by himself at the same hearing on other informations, the magistrate held that the office, 23, Bedford-street, was used by H. T. Terry (a person referred to in the other special cases) for the purpose of money being received by him as the consideration for his promise to pay money on the events of football matches; and the magistrate further found that the respondent permitted the user by H. T. Terry, and that the respondent opened and kept the office for the purpose of such user by H. T. Terry; but the magistrate was of opinion that the case of Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co. did not apply to all the advertisements in question, and he dismissed the summonses.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above facts the magistrate came to a correct determination in point of law.

The Betting Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 15), provides as follows: "Section 3. Where any letter, circular, telegram, placard, handbill, card, or advertisement is sent, exhibited, or published (1) whereby it is made to appear that any person, either in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, will on application give information or advice for the purpose or with respect to any such bet or wager or any such event or contingency as is mentioned in the principal Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119) or will make on behalf of any other person any such bet or wager as is mentioned in the principal Act . . . every person sending, exhibiting, or publishing or causing the same to be sent, exhibited, or published shall be subject to the penalties provided in the 7th section of the principal Act with respect to offences under that section."

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—These two appeals involve the same point, although the summonses were under different sections. The first summons was a summons under the 7th section of the Act of 1853, that Mackenzie, being the occupier of a certain office, did unlawfully cause certain advertisements to be published whereby it appeared that the said office was kept and used for the purpose of making certain bets or wagers, against the form of the statute. The second case was framed on the 1st sub-section of the 3rd section of the amending Act of 1874, which provides that "where any letter, circular, telegram, placard, handbill, card, or advertisement is sent, exhibited, or published (1) whereby it is made to appear that any person, either in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, will on application give information or advice for the purpose of or with respect to any such bet or wager or any such event or contingency," and so on. The learned magistrate practically recapitulates, upon the summons for the issue of the advertisement and also in respect of the offence under the Act of 1874, what he has found with regard to the case we have just disposed of (Mackenzie v. Hawke). He repeats, in fact, that Terry was using this place for the purpose, and would have come to the conclusion that, so far as that ingredient of the case was concerned, there was sufficient evidence for him to act, but he considered that he was bound by the case of Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co. which was a judgment of Phillimore, and Gainsford Bruce, JJ. Before that case was argued, the matter was considered in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved in Reg. v. Stoddart. It is contended, and I think rightly contended, that the principle and ground of the decision of the case in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved is inconsistent with the view taken by Bruce and Phillimore, JJ. The question depends on the language of the Act of 1853. Section 7 provides: [His Lordship read the section.] Now, in Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co., in connection with the printing of advertisements of this kind, it was contended before my brothers Bruce and Phillimore that the contract to print was not illegal, because section 7 only meant to refer to advertisements in respect of what has been called the first branch of section 1, and the court in that case so decided. But, looking to what was decided in the case of Reg. v. Stoddart, and to the ground of the judgment there given by my brother Wills, I certainly cannot think that section 7 is so confined. I think the language of section 7 is inconsistent with its being confined solely to the case of betting by persons who resort to the place, and I think that the attempt that was there made to confine the meaning of section 1 to the more narrow construction based on section 7 to a certain extent shows the inconsistency of the view that section 7 is to be confined to the first part of section 1. It seems to me that, having enumerated the main and principal offence in section 1, in dealing with the subordinate offence in section 7, the Legislature has said enough in section 7 to indicate that it is referring to the transaction referred to in section 1, and it would certainly serve no useful purpose to, nor ought we to adopt a mode of construction that would, cut down section 7 to the limited case referred to in the judgment in Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co., the mischief of the evil aimed at by the statute being certainly as great in one case as in the other. I do not wish to say too much on the Argus case having been what is called a friendly case. It certainly does not seem to have been argued on the part of the defendants as strenuously as it might have been argued if the parties had been hostile, but I think in such a matter as this, if the two cases are inconsistent, as to a certain extent they are, we must in the present case follow the decision in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, and treat that for the purposes of these proceedings as being the authority by which we are bound.

Now, the same point arises with regard to the second case—that is to say, the summons under section 3 of the Act of 1874 with a slight addition to which I must refer. There the learned magistrate, having again stated the facts in reference to Terry's user, considered he was bound by the decision in Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co., and, in addition to that, relied on the case of Cox v. Andrews, which had held, and I think rightly held, that the Act of 1874 was an amendment with an extension of the Act of 1853, and that the two Acts were to be read together. If the limited construction were to be put on section 7, so that it was only to be confined to the first class of offences mentioned in the 1st section of the Act of 1853, the same argument might be applied with reason to section 3 of the Act of 1874, and it might then be successfully maintained that the Act of 1874, when it referred to any such bet or wager, or any such event or contingency as is mentioned, must of course be limited in the same way as section 7 was limited. I might say at once that I do not adopt the wide contention of Mr. Avory that the words "any such event or contingency" were meant to widen the scope of the Act altogether by including information about bets, or information about contingencies. But while I think these words are very important to indicate that sub-section 1 of section 3 of the Act of 1874 includes all the 1st section of the Act of 1853, I still think there must be the element, which is essential in all these cases, of some place which is used as a part of the machinery whereby the unlawful transaction is carried out, though the money may not be actually received there. I think, therefore, that in adopting the view the learned magistrate did of section 7 of the Act of 1853, he was quite logical and consistent in applying the same view to section 3 of the Act of 1874. But, as I think he should have followed the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved in Reg. v. Stoddart, his judgment in this respect must be reversed both as regards the information under section 7 of the Act of 1853, and also as regards the information under section 3 of the Act of 1874.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I desire to say a word with regard to the first of these appeals. I quite agree that the case on which the learned magistrate felt bound to act—Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co.—is in conflict with the other case to which my lord has alluded, and which was decided by the full court, and I think that decision must prevail. But, apart from that, I should disagree with the case of Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co., and with the judgment that was there given. Phillimore, J., there held that section 7, which created the punishment for the offence, was confined to the offences which are enumerated in the first part of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853. He says: "And when one comes to examine that section carefully"—that is, section 7—"it seems clear that it is directed only against advertisements of houses kept for the purpose mentioned in the first part of section 1—that is to say, for the purpose of betting with persons physically resorting thereto—and is not directed against advertisements of houses kept for the purpose mentioned in the second part of section 1." I think, if you examine it carefully, you will see that section 7 is not exclusively confined to offences against the first half of section 1, because it says: "Any person exhibiting or publishing"—the things Phillimore, J., alluded to—"whereby it shall be made to appear that any house, office, room, or place is opened, kept, or used for the purpose of making bets or wagers in manner aforesaid"—that it is quite true, is all within the first part of section 1, but it goes on—"or for the purpose of exhibiting lists for betting"; now exhibiting lists for betting is not forbidden by section 1 at all, neither by the first nor the second part of it. Therefore section 7 deals with an offence for which one may be prosecuted, which is certainly not mentioned in the first part of section 1 of the Betting Act of 1853. Now, to hold that section 7 applies only to the first part of section 1, and to nothing more, is obviously to put a most technical and a most limited construction on this Act of Parliament. Why should one put it? It is not necessary to do so, as was shown by the case to which my lord has alluded. But on general grounds I can see no reason for holding that this section 7 was necessarily cut down to those offences in the first part of section 1, and left undealt with all the offences mentioned in the second part of section 1, and therefore reduced the second part of section 1 to a nullity. It seems to me that what one must do in these cases is to have some regard to what the Legislature was aiming at. The Legislature was not aiming merely at a person who goes to a house to bet, and bets with a person in a house, or bets with a person who comes into a house. It was really trying to put down what it considered was a public vice. This is shown by the fact that it did prohibit such things as the advertising, the publication, or the exhibition of lists for betting. You need not go into the house to look at the list. The Act does not say so, and therefore I cannot say that we ought, in construing such an Act as this, to assume that the Legislature meant to forbid things, and then to make it impossible that anybody should be prosecuted who did the thing which was forbidden. It seems to me that Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co. was wrongly decided. I do not wonder that it was decided as it was. It was brought before the court in a most unsatisfactory way. It was a mock battle altogether. The plaintiff and defendants engaged one another in order that no genuine person should sue either of them; they were both desirous of the same result being arrived at. That was the object of it. I feel bound to say that the argument in that case on behalf of the defendants, which did not prevail, was a very short and perfunctory one. It did not draw attention to the point to which I have drawn attention.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I only want to add that as to the expression "bets and wagers," in section 7, I think bets refer to the first part of the 1st section, and wagers to the second part of that section. Then, as an additional reason why we are not bound by the decision in Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co., I may point out that there is no appeal from our present decision, it being in a criminal matter; and I understand where you have conflicting cases, in such a case as that the court is bound to form its own opinion.

HAWKE v. MACKENZIE (No. 3). (a.)

Criminal law — Penalties — Informer — Discretion of magistrate to deprive informer of portion of penalty—Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 71), s. 34—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 9.

Notwithstanding section 9 of the Betting Act, 1853, which says that one-half of every pecuniary penalty which shall be adjudged to be paid under that Act shall be paid to the informer, a Metropolitan police magistrate has, under section 34 of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, a discretion to deprive an informer in proceedings under the Betting Act, 1853, of any share in the penalty imposed under that Act, even though the informer has not been guilty of any corrupt practice.

Case stated.

This was an appeal from the decision of R. H. B. Marsham, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Bow-street police-station.

An information was preferred by the appellant, John Hawke, against the respondent, Donald

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mackenzie, under section 7 of the Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), for that he being the occupier of a certain office or place—to wit, an office or place situate at 23, Bedford-street, Strand—did on the 12th of November, 1901, at 23, Bedford-street, Strand, knowingly and wilfully permit the office to be used by H. T. Terry, a person using the same for the purpose of money or valuable things being received by or on behalf of H. T. Terry as and for the consideration for an undertaking or promise to pay or give thereafter money on events or contingencies of or relating to the game of football, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

At the respective hearings on the 5th and 7th of December, 1901, the two summonses issued on the above informations were heard, and on the 11th of December the magistrate convicted Donald Mackenzie on these informations and fined him £100 on (1) and 1s. on (2) and ordered him to pay twenty guineas costs. The magistrate found also as a fact that the informer, the present appellant, was not guilty of corrupt practices, but he considered this to be immaterial (see 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 34), and he adjudged that the appellant should not receive any part of the penalties.

Upon the above facts counsel for the appellant contended: That under the above circumstances the informer was by virtue of section 9 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119 entitled to one half of the penalties, notwithstanding section 34 of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 71).

The magistrate was of opinion that he had discretion to deprive the informer of the whole or any part of the moiety of the penalties although he did not think that the informer was guilty of corrupt practices.

The question on which the opinion of the court was desired was whether the magistrate upon the statement of facts came to a correct determination in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

The Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119): Section 9 enacts: "One half of every pecuniary penalty which shall be adjudged to be paid under this Act shall be paid to the informer, and the remaining half shall be paid or applied in aid of the poor rate of the parish in which the offence shall have been committed."

The Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 71), section 34, provides: "And whereas by divers Acts the moiety or other fixed portion of the penalties to be thereby recovered is directed to be adjudged to the informer, and the same has been found to encourage corrupt practices of common informers; for prevention thereof be it enacted that where, by any Act now in force or hereafter to be passed, a moiety or other fixed portion of the penalty or penalties thereby imposed is or shall be directed to be paid to the informer, not being the party aggrieved, it shall be lawful for any one of the said magistrates before whom the conviction shall be had to adjudge that no part, or such part only of the penalties as he shall think fit, shall be paid to the informer."

By the Statute Law Revision Act (No. 2), 1890 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 51), Schedule, Part II., section 34 of the Act of 1839 is repealed from the beginning down to the words "enacted that."

Avory, K.C. (J. M. Mackay with him), for the appellant.

He cited Reg. v. Titterton, [1895] 2 Q. B. 61, 44 W. R. Dig. 7.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case raises an entirely different point. The magistrate has convicted Mr. Mackenzie and fined him £100, and ordered him to pay twenty guineas costs; and then he said: "I found also as a fact that the informer, the present appellant, was not guilty of corrupt practices; but I considered this to be immaterial" (referring to the Act of 1839), "and I adjudged that he"—that is to say, Mr. Hawke, the present appellant—"should not receive any part of the penalties." The question in this case arises under two sections. Under section 9 of the Act of 1853, "one half of every pecuniary penalty which shall be adjudged to be paid under this Act shall be paid to the informer, and the remaining half shall be applied in aid of the poor rate." If the matter had stood there, of course the appellant would have been entitled to succeed; but there was at the time the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, s. 34, of which enacts: "And whereas by divers Acts the moiety or other fixed portion of the penalties to be thereby recovered is directed to be adjudged to the informer, and the same has been found to encourage the corrupt practices of common informers; for prevention thereof be it enacted that where, by any Act now in force or hereafter to be passed, a moiety or other fixed portion of the penalty or penalties thereby imposed is or shall be directed to be paid to the informer, not being the party aggrieved, it shall be lawful for any one of the said magistrates before whom the conviction shall be had to adjudge that no part, or such part only of the penalty as he shall think fit, shall be paid to the informer." Now, the learned magistrate here has justly and rightly in the interests of the appellant negatived the existence of corrupt practices, and he has found that there were none, but he has exercised a discretion.

Mr. Avory makes two points. He first says that because the Act of 1853 was passed some fourteen years later than the Act of 1839, full effect must be given to the words "one half shall be paid to the informer," and that it is an enactment inconsistent with there being any discretion on the part of the learned magistrate. I think that goes too far. Section 34 of the Act of 1839 says in terms it is to apply to Acts hereafter to be passed; and it further says this, it is to apply in every case where a moiety is or shall be directed to be paid to the informer. The words are express. Therefore to the main argument of Mr. Avory I am not able to accede.

Then he said, but at least if there is a discretion, that discretion can only be exercised for good cause, and that good cause must be either something that amounts to corrupt practices, or some other good cause which the magistaate has in his mind, and which can be, so to speak, appreciated by us. Now, I think it is quite impossible to confine it to corrupt practices. I may say parenthetically that I attach no importance to the repeal of this preamble of the section by the Statute Law Revision Act. I am dealing with the Act as though it had not been repealed, but the motive of the section is one thing, the enactment is another. The motive is that it had been found to encourage corrupt practices, but, instead of limiting the enacting part to the case of corrupt practices, the Legislature says there shall be a discretion. Now, I wish to say that I do not want to lay down the rule that the magistrate has an arbitrary discretion which he can exercise without good reason. I think, if no corrupt practices are suggested or established, that under ordinary circumstances most certainly the magistrate ought to give the informer half the penalty; but it seems perfectly impossible to say that he has not got a discretion upon other grounds, and I can well imagine, not to repeat the cases that were put in argument, that either from the amount of the penalty in cases that have been before him, or other considerations, he might be of opinion that the informer, who was appearing and performing a public duty, ought not to make a profit by receiving a part of the penalty. At any rate, I think it is impossible for us to say that the magistrate had no discretion, and I certainly think there is no ground for our interfering with his discretion. All I do say is this, that of course where there is no case of corrupt practices the magistrate must exercise a judicial discretion as to whether or not he will deprive the informer of his penalty. But I think we should be wrong if we were to overrule, or attempt to overrule, the discretion of the magistrate in this case, there being no ground for our so doing. Therefore I think that the appeal by Mr. Hawke must be dismissed.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion.

WISE v. PERPETUAL TRUSTEE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Club—Trustee—Indemnity—Position of members of club.

It is an implied, but fundamental, condition in the constitution of every ordinary club that the members thereof incur, as such, no liability to pay anything beyond their subscriptions as members, either to the club funds or to anyone else.

Consequently, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary in the rules of the club, the members of an ordinary club are not personally liable as such, to indemnify the trustees of the club against liabilities incurred by the latter as such trustees.

Hardoon v. Belilios, 49 W. R. 209, [1901] A. C. 118, distinguished.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

The facts are set out at length in their lordships' judgment.

Scott Fox, K.C., and Shearman, for appellants.

Haldane, K.C., and C. James, for respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN and LINDLEY, Sir FORD NORTH, Sir ARTHUR WILSON, and Sir JOHN BONSER) was delivered by Lord LINDLEY.—This appeal raises the extremely important question whether the members of an ordinary club are personally liable to indemnify the trustees of the club against liabilities incurred by them as such trustees, where there is no rule expressly imposing such liability upon the members.

The undisputed facts are shortly as follows:

In the year 1886 certain persons including a Mr. Paling, now deceased, formed a club in Sydney, New South Wales, which was known as the Cercle Français. The appellant became a member of the club in July, 1886, and remained a member of the club until its dissolution. In January, 1887, the club adopted certain rules, the 12th and 17th of which were as follows:

"12. The administration of the affairs of the club is entrusted to a committee elected at the first general meeting in each year. The duties of the members of the committee are purely honorary.

"17. The committee disposes of the funds of the society and has full power to take all measures for the internal management which it may deem necessary."

Between July and December, 1887, it was considered by some members of the club that the premises then occupied by the club at No. 50, Wynyard-square were too small and steps were taken to provide increased accommodation. A general meeting was called to consider the subject; and a meeting was held on the 9th of December, 1887. Too few members attended to bind the club; but the subject of obtaining a lease of new premises of the club was discussed and the members present resolved that the matter be left in the hands of M. Lachaume, the president of the club, to make the best arrangements in the interests of the club; and the said Lachaume and the said W. H. Paling and Messrs. Doublet and Van de Velde were appointed trustees of the club.

A general meeting of the club was held on the 13th day of January, 1888, at which the minutes of the meeting of the 9th day of December, 1887, were read and confirmed.

On the 12th day of July, 1888, the above-mentioned Messrs. Paling, Lachaume, Doublet, and Van de Valde became lessees of certain premises known as 50, Wynyard-square and 9, Wynyard-lane for a term of ten years from the 9th day of July, 1888, at a rental of £555 per annum and subject also to certain onerous covenants set out in the said lease. After the execution of this lease the above-mentioned premises were used for the purposes of the club and the club remained in possession thereof until it was dissolved. In July, 1888, after the execution of the lease the old rules of the club were repealed and new rules were adopted. The 3rd, 4th, 14th, and 15th were as follows:

"3. The property of the club, subject to the liabilities thereof, shall belong to the members for the time being.

"4. No member shall by reason of his membership have any transmissible or assignable interest, by operation of law or otherwise, in any of the property of the club. On any member ceasing by death, resignation, or otherwise to be such, all his interest shall survive, accrue, and belong to the other members for the time being.

"14. The affairs of the club shall be under the management of the following office bearers—viz.: a president, vice-president, four trustees, a committee, and a treasurer.

"15. All purchases, investments, leases, conveyances, securities, or contracts, by, to, or on behalf of the club, shall be made, taken, or entered into in the names of the trustees. All the real and personal property of the club shall be vested in, and shall be held by them upon trust for the members for the time being, and shall (except as to the real property) be subject to the disposition of the committee, whose order, certified in writing under the hand of the chairman of the day, and attested by the secretary, shall be obligatory upon and a justification to the trustees as to making, taking, or entering into any such purchase, investment, lease, conveyance, security, or contract, or any disposal of any personal property vested in them as such trustees. And the orders of the committee certified in like manner as to any purchases necessary for carrying on the internal management of the club shall also be obligatory upon and a justification to the trustees for making the same. The real property of the club shall not be dealt with except by the resolution of a general or special general meeting of the members of the club."

The rules prescribed the entrance fees and subscriptions, but there was no rule imposing any liability on any of the members to pay more.

The club continued to exist until February, 1891, when it was dissolved. It had eighty members when the lease was obtained and ninety more joined afterwards.

In April, 1891, the above-mentioned lessees sublet the premises comprised in the lease of the 12th of July, 1888, to the Cosmopolitan Club Co. for the unexpired portion of the ten years' term less one day, the underlessees covenanting to pay the same rent and perform the lessees' covenants. The Cosmopolitan Club Co. remained in possession until January, 1894, and paid the rent up to that date, when they went into liquidation. The lessees then re-entered into possession of the premises and from time to time re-let them, giving the club the benefit of all rentals received. Finally all the trustees, except the said William Henry Paling, being unable to pay the rent, the said Paling in his lifetime, and his executors (the respondents to this appeal) after his death, paid under the lessees' covenants, various sums amounting in the aggregate to £2,350 or thereabouts in excess of moneys received by them by sub-letting the premises.

On the 22nd of April, 1897, the executors of the said William Henry Paling, deceased, filed a statement of claim in an action in the Supreme Court of New South Wales in equity against certain members of the club selected to represent them all, and the plaintiffs prayed as follows:

"(1) That it may be declared that all persons who were members of the said Cercle Français on the 12th of July, 1888, and all persons who became members of the same Cercle Français subsequent thereto, and the personal representatives of any such persons respectively who are now deceased became and are jointly and severally liable to contribute to and indemnify the plaintiffs and the estate of the said William Henry Paling against the rent paid and expenses incurred by the said William Henry Paling during his lifetime and by the plaintiffs since his death in respect of the said lease and the covenants thereof and the future rent and expenses to which the plaintiffs as executors of the said William Henry Paling are or may become liable under the said lease and the covenants thereof, and that the defendants and all such other persons and representatives as respectively aforesaid may be jointly and severally decreed to repay to the plaintiffs and indemnify them against such rent and expenses with interest on the same at such rate as this honourable court shall direct and also to pay the plaintiffs' cost of suit.

"(2) That an account be taken under the direction of this honourable court of the rent and expenses respectively aforesaid.

"(3) That an inquiry may be directed as to the persons constituting the said several classes of members and whether any and which of such persons are dead and if so who are their respective legal personal representatives."

The appellant was not a party to the said suit nor was he served with notice of the said statement of claim nor of the proceedings therein. In the statement of claim the plaintiffs set out the various classes of members which each defendant was to represent. They were as follows:

(i.) a'Beckett as representing members of the committee at the time of the making of the lease.

(ii.) Fesq as representing members of the club present at the general meeting of the 13th day of January, 1888.

(iii.) Burne as representing members at the time when the lease was made, but who were not present at the meeting of the 13th day of January, 1888.

(iv.) Woolcott-Waley as representing members of the committee at a date subsequent to the lease being made.

(v.) Henderson as representing the members of the club elected at a date subsequent to the date of the lease.

On the 25th day of May, 1897, Manning, Chief Judge in Equity, made an order authorising the above-mentioned defendants to defend the proceedings respectively on behalf of the above specified classes. The appellant was not served with and was no party to the said order.

On the 27th day of October, 1898, Simpson, Chief Judge in Equity, made a decree dismissing the suit against the defendants Woolcott-Waley and Henderson with costs, and declaring (inter alia) that the defendants a'Beckett, Fesq, and Burne and all other persons who were members on the 12th day of July, 1888, and who assented to or subsequently ratified the action of the trustees of the club in taking the lease of that date are and each of them is bound to indemnify the late William Henry Paling and his estate against the rent and other moneys paid by the said William Henry Paling or his executors under the said lease. By the said order it was further decided that the master in equity should inquire as to what persons were liable to contribute on the basis of the above decree.

On the 5th day of August, 1899, the defendants gave notice to the appellant that the master in equity was proceeding to settle the said list and that the appellant's name had been submitted to the master for inclusion therein.

On the 25th day of August, 1899, the appellant filed an affidavit objecting to his inclusion in the said list and on the 21st day of November, 1899, the appellant filed a notice of further objections.

In November, 1899, evidence was taken upon the said matter, and the master found that the appellant had assented to or ratified the action of the trustees in taking the lease and that he ought to indemnify the plaintiffs with costs to be taxed; and on the 15th day of December, 1899, the master made a separate certificate to that effect. On the 15th day of February, 1900, the appellant took out a summons to vary the master's certificate. The said summons was heard by the Chief Judge in Equity; and on the 5th day of March, 1900, the said summons was dismissed with costs.

On the 19th day of March, 1900, the appellant filed a notice of appeal against the said order to the full court; and on the 23rd day of July, 1900, the said appeal was dismissed with costs.

The present appeal is from these last orders. There is no appeal from the decree of the 27th of October, 1898. In the case lodged by the appellant he stated, and his counsel repeated before their lordships, that the appellant was always willing to share with all the other members of the club the liabilities under the said lease, but as the form of the suit and the declarations in the decree rendered only four or five persons liable to make good a sum which (by the addition of costs) amounted to over £5 000, he objected and objects to take upon himself an individual liability not shared by other members of the club.

The decree of the 27th of October, 1898 was not made upon the broad ground that the members of the club as cestuis que trustent were bound to indemnify their trustees, it was made upon the theory that only those members of the club were liable to indemnify the plaintiffs who had assented to or ratified the taking of the lease; and the master's certificate found that the appellant had assented to and ratified it. The chief judge refused to vary the certificate, thinking it right. The full court on appeal affirmed the decision, but not unanimously nor on the same grounds. The Chief Justice considered it proved that the appellant had become one of the cestuis que trustent of the lease and was therefore liable to indemnify the plaintiffs. Cohen, J., considered that the appellant had assented to and ratified the taking of the lease, and had therefore become liable. Owen, J., differed. He thought the master's certificate wrong and that the appellant ought to succeed.

With respect to the appellant's assent or ratification to the taking of the lease much discussion took place as to what was meant in this case by ratification, and it was contended that no ratification as distinguished from approval could be established. It is not, however, necessary to do more than to say that it became plain to their lordships when the evidence had been examined that although there was ample evidence to prove that the appellant knew that a lease had been taken for the club and that the club had the use of the property and that the lease might become a burden to the club, yet that the appellant had done nothing whatever to incur any liability to indemnify the trustees, unless such liability attached to him as a member of the club and as one of the cestuis que trustent of the lessees. It further appeared to their lordships to be proved that notwithstanding the irregularities of the meeting of December, 1887, and the doubts thrown on the legal validity of its subsequent confirmation, yet that the members of the club generally and the appellant with the others, through the committee of management and otherwise, so far assented to what had been done as to have become cestuis que trustent of the lessees. Their lordships were satisfied that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust had been created. It follows from this that the lessees as trustees were entitled to be indemnified out of any property of the club to which their lien as trustees extended. But the evidence against the appellant did not prove anything more than the existence of the above relation; and their lordships intimated that in their opinion the real question for decision was whether the appellant was liable to indemnify the trustees under the circumstances thus proved. This view was ultimately accepted by counsel, and their lordships do not therefore think it necessary to allude further to the evidence on the present occasion.

In Hardoon v. Belilios, 49 W. R. 209, [1901] A. C. 118, this board had to consider the right of trustees to be indemnified by their cestuis que trustent against liabilities incurred by the trustees by holding trust property. The right of trustees to such indemnity was recognized as well established in the simple case of a trustee and an adult cestui que trust. But, as was then pointed out, this principle by no means applies to all trusts and it cannot be applied to cases in which the nature of the transaction excludes it.

Clubs are associations of a peculiar nature. They are societies the members of which are perpetually changing. They are not partnerships; they are not associations for gain; and the feature which distinguishes them from other societies is that no member as such becomes liable to pay to the funds of the society or to anyone else any money beyond the subscriptions required by the rules of the club to be paid so long as as he remains a member. It is upon this fundamental condition, not usually expressed, but understood by everyone, that clubs are formed; and this distinguishing feature has been often judicially recognized. It has been so recognized in actions by creditors and in winding-up proceedings: see Flemyng v. Hector, 2 M. & W. 172; In re St. James' Club, 2 De G. M. & G. 383. Apart from an observation of Lord St. Leonards in the last case, and which observation is in favour of the appellant, the only reported case in which a court has had to consider the application to a club of this right to indemnity is Minnitt v. Lord Talbot, 7 L. R. Ir. 407. In that case some members of a club who had guaranteed the repayment of money borrowed for the club sought indemnity not only out of the property of the club but from the members personally. The court which had already given effect to their lien (see 1 L. R. Ir. 143) afterwards made an additional order and inquiry similar to those made in this case. The grounds upon which this addition to the original decree was made do not appear; nor does it appear what were the grounds on which any member was held to have incurred liability nor indeed whether any member had incurred such liability. This case does not therefore assist their lordships on the present occasion.

The question now to be decided may be regarded as not yet covered by authority; and a choice must be made between either ignoring the essential features of a club or holding that the general rule established in Hardoon v. Belilios is inapplicable to such a body of persons. Their lordships feel no difficulty in making this choice. The trustees of a club are the last persons to demand that the fundamental conditions on which their cestuis que trustent have become such, shall be completely ignored.

The appellant in this case is not in their lordships' opinion under any legal or equitable obligation to pay or contribute anything towards the indemnity of the plaintiffs; but he has offered to do so, and the plaintiffs are not satisfied with his offer. Their endeavour to obtain more is to be regretted and cannot succeed. This may seem hard on the trustees; but they have only themselves to blame for their own imprudence in not seeing to their own safety. A decision in their favour would not only be hard on the members of the club, but would be inconsistent with the terms on which they became members.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty to set aside the certificate of the master and to reverse the orders of the 5th of March, 1900, and the 23rd of July, 1900, with costs.

The respondents will pay the costs of the appeal.

Lowe v. Pearson, 47 W. R. 193, [1899] 1 Q. B. 261, followed.

This was an appeal from an award of his Honour Judge Shand at the St. Helens, Widnes, County Court, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was a "brow" girl, and had been employed by the respondents at their Lee pit at Haydock for a fortnight, and her duty on the day of the accident was to pick out from the coal as it passed along on a "band" the slate and dirt before the coal was discharged into wagons.

During the day the band engine had to be stopped and started again several times. The applicant had herself stopped or started it about three times.

During the temporary absence of the man in charge of the engine—a man named Dixon—the applicant, hearing the signal to start the engine, started it again, and in doing so her dress was caught, and she sustained serious injuries.

The county court judge found that the accident did not arise out of or in the course of the applicant's employment, and he accordingly made his award in favour of the respondents.

The applicant appealed, and on the original hearing of the appeal the court directed that the case should go back to the county court judge in order that he might prepare a statement of the grounds of his decision.

The county court judge made the following report: "I found as facts that the applicant was on the day of the accident employed by the respondents at their Lee pit as a brow girl. As such, her duty was to pick out 'bass' from the 'slack,' while it passed over a band which discharged the slack into railway wagons. The band was worked by a steam engine which was stopped and started by turning a wheel. In starting the engine it was frequently necessary to go some distance into the machinery in order to pull the fly-wheel round. Thomas Dixon was the man in charge of the belt engine. It was no part of the duty of the applicant to touch or interfere with the belt engine. On the 8th of March, 1899, the pit had become blocked. Dixon, having stopped his engine, had gone to assist the shunt man in order to set the pit working again. While Thomas Dixon was away the applicant, clothed in a skirt, having heard a signal which referred to the engine, went to the belt engine. In pulling the large fly-wheel round to start the engine she became caught in the machinery and was injured. Several of the girls at work on the belt, seeing the applicant going to the engine, told her not to touch it. The applicant, who had been at the pit a fortnight, had not herself been warned by Dixon not to touch the engine, but the girls who told her not to do so had received express instructions to that effect. The operation of setting the engine in motion was a dangerous one and unfitted for a woman clothed in a skirt. At the date of my award, the 10th of January, 1899, the case of Lowe v. Pearson, 47 W. R. 193, [1899] 1 Q. B. 261, had just been decided. Acting upon that decision I was of opinion that the applicant's duty being to pick bass from the belt, and having been told not to touch the engine, the accident could not be held to have arisen out of, or in the course of, her employment."

The appeal was re-argued on the 12th of December, when judgment was reserved.

Dec. 19.—COLLINS, M.R.—In this case the county court judge has held that the applicant is not entitled to compensation, on the ground that the accident did not arise out of or in the course of her employment. The question we have to decide is whether, on the evidence as to the way in which the accident happened, the respondents are liable to pay her compensation, and that depended upon whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the applicant's employment with the respondents. It is, then, a question really purely of fact.

The principle in such cases which this court had laid down is that in every instance where the judge decided a matter of fact on evidence that was capable of supporting his finding, then, unless this involved a misdirection on a matter of law, his decision cannot be questioned by this court. Here the county court judge, on the invitation of this court, has given his reasons for his decision. It is clear that, as an employer is at liberty to define the sphere of duty of his workmen, and to divide the labour of his workmen into mere labour and skilled labour, if a workman in the former class, without experience, voluntarily undertook to do something in the latter class, and an accident happened, the workman was doing something which was not in the course of his employment. Here the applicant's own evidence did not furnish any suggestion that her sphere of duty extended beyond the simple work of picking "bass" out of the coal. The case of Lowe v. Pearson decides that a workman employed in one sphere of work cannot make his master liable for injuries accidentally received by him while acting in another sphere. The question of how far one sphere is marked off from another is a question of fact. Reading the report of the learned county court judge it is clear that he finds as a fact that it was no part of the applicant's duty to start the belt engine and that she was told not to touch it. In my opinion there is evidence justifying the county court judge in finding as he did, and we ought not to interfere with his decision.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the judgment delivered by the Master of the Rolls, and for the reasons he has stated I think this appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I regret that I cannot concur in the judgment of the other members of the court. The sole question here is whether on the evidence the accident is shown to be one that within the meaning of the section reasonably construed, was one that "arose out of and in the course of" the applicant's employment. Now that is an elastic phrase, and in my judgment covers the present case. For the masters it was said that it did not. Why? They said it was no part of the girl's duty to handle the engine. But there is nothing in the Act limiting the liability of the masters to accidents that occur to workmen doing that only which it was their express duty to perform. The county court judge, in the reasons which he gave for his decision, said there was evidence that led him to hold that it was no part of the applicant's duty to touch or interfere with the engine. I have read all the evidence in the case, and I cannot see any evidence of the existence of any duty on the part of the applicant not to stop or start the engine. She was not told in express terms, at the time when she was engaged, that she was not to stop or start the engine. It was admitted, indeed, that she never received any precise directions on the matter. The respondents had means of knowing what ordinarily went on when the girls were at work, and the evidence showed that it was the usual practice, when the man Dixon was away, for the girls to obey the signals and stop or start the engine. For this reason I think the county court judge's finding is not supported by the evidence, and I therefore with regret take the unusual course of differing from my brethren on a question as to the effect of evidence, but although my decision does not alter the result of this appeal I feel bound nevertheless to express my opinion.

EASTON v. ISTED. (a.)

Light—Ancient lights—Consent or agreement—Window—Skylight—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3.

In 1873 the predecessor in title of the plaintiff erected a conservatory abutting on the defendant's property, and entered into an agreement with the defendant's predecessor in title whereby he agreed to pay one shilling a year to defendant's predecessor for allowing the window of his conservatory to overlook and open on to the defendant's property. The sloping top of the conservatory was of glazed glass, as also was the whole of the vertical side adjoining the defendant's property above a few feet from the ground. Portions of the glazed side of the conservatory were movable, so that when opened they overhung the defendant's property. The yearly rent was duly paid until 1888, when the conservatory was converted into a passage or corridor, the sloping top of the conservatory being retained and giving light to and forming the roof of the corridor. The defendant erected certain buildings which obstructed the access of light to the corridor through the glazed roof. The plaintiff brought an action for an injunction and damages.

Held, that the word "window" in the agreement referred to the sloping roof of the conservatory as well as the vertical side. Consequently the light was enjoyed only by virtue of the said agreement, which was a consent or agreement within the meaning of section 3 of the Prescription Act, and therefore the action failed.

Decision of Joyce, J. (50 W. R. 472), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J. (reported 50 W. R. 472), who had dismissed an action brought by the plaintiff, who was the owner and occupier of certain premises known as the Golden Fleece Hotel, Commercial-road, Portsmouth, against the defendant, who was the owner and occupier of adjacent premises in the same road, in respect of the obstruction by the defendant of the access of light over a yard at the back of his premises to a window or skylight over a passage or corridor on the north side of the plaintiff's hotel.

The plaintiff alleged in his statement of claim that the skylight was an ancient light, and that free and unobstructed access thereto of light had been enjoyed as of right for twenty years and upwards without interruption prior to the commencement of the action.

The defendant did not admit that the said skylight was an ancient light, or that free and unobstructed access thereto of light had been enjoyed as of right for twenty years without interruption before action brought; and he denied that the buildings recently erected by him (in respect of which the action was brought) seriously obstructed the access of light to the plaintiff's skylight.

The window or skylight in question was inclined at an angle of somewhat less than forty-five degrees to the plane of the horizon, and at somewhat more than forty-five degrees to the vertical plane, and its northern or lower side was practically on the boundary line between the plaintiff's and defendant's properties.

This window or skylight originally formed the sloping top of a conservatory erected by the plaintiff's predecessor in title in the year 1873 on the northern side of the hotel and abutting on the defendant's property. This top was entirely glazed, as was the vertical side of the conservatory adjoining the defendant's property to within a few feet of the ground. Portions of the glazed side of the conservatory, amounting to less than one half thereof, were movable, and opened out in such a way as to overhang the defendant's property. The rest of the side and the glazed top were immovable and could not be opened.

In the year 1873, at the time when the conservatory was built, an agreement in writing was entered into between the predecessors in title of the plaintiff and the defendant, but was only signed by the plaintiff's predecessor in title.

This agreement, which was dated the 13th of June, 1873, was as follows: "I hereby agree to pay Mr. Isted, of No. 43, Commercial-road, Landport, the sum of one shilling a year as an acknowledgment for allowing the window in my conservatory adjoining to open on to and overlook his property, and do also agree to close the same when required to do so." The yearly payments of one shilling were duly paid under this agreement until the year 1888, when the conservatory was pulled down, and the space converted into a passage or corridor in the hotel by building a brick wall where the glazed side of the conservatory formerly stood, to the height of the skylight, and retaining the skylight with its glazed glass in its original position.

The defendant had recently erected a wall along or close to the boundary line of the plaintiff's and defendant's properties. The plaintiff alleged that this wall was of such a height as to obstruct the access of light to the glazed roof of the passage or corridor in the hotel, and he brought the present action claiming an injunction or damages.

Joyce, J., held that the light was enjoyed by the plaintiff and his predecessor in title, only by virtue of the above agreement, which was a consent or agreement within the meaning of section 3 of the Prescription Act. He accordingly dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Hughes, K.C., and Coldridge, for the appellant, used arguments similar to those put forward in the court below.

Kenyon Parker, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not think we can differ from Joyce, J. I cannot doubt that this agreement was entered into with a view, among other things, of preventing the acquisition of a right of ancient light under the Prescription Act by the plaintiff's predecessor in title. That is clear to my mind from the use of the word "overlook" in the agreement. It was admitted that if once you arrive at the conclusion from the words of the agreement that this was the object of the agreement, the question cannot be debated. In these circumstances it is not necessary for me to say more than that I affirm the judgment and adopt the reasoning of Joyce, J.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) — Dec. 15.

In re BAKER, LEES, & CO. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Parliamentary agents—Bill of costs for work done by solicitor as parliamentary agent—Jurisdiction to tax—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.

A bill of costs of a parliamentary agent, who is also a solicitor, if it relates exclusively to work done by him as a parliamentary agent, cannot be taxed in the High Court under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843.

Appeal from an order of Ridley, J., for the taxation of certain costs.

In the Parliamentary session of 1902 a private Bill was introduced into Parliament and passed, which resulted in the Mexborough and Swinton Tramways Act, 1902. The promoters of the Bill were represented in the proceedings in Parliament by Charles E. Baker and Arthur J. Lees, who practised as parliamentary agents and also as solicitors under the firm name of Baker, Lees, & Co.

Baker, Lees, & Co. delivered their bill of costs, charges, and disbursements to the promoters and proceeded to take it in for taxation before the taxing officer of the House of Commons.

The promoters, being desirous to have the costs taxed under the Solicitors Act, 1843, in the High Court, took out a summons in the King's Bench Division for an order to that effect.

The master refused the application, but on appeal Ridley, J., made an order that the bill of costs should be taxed by one of the taxing-masters of the Supreme Court.

Baker, Lees, & Co. appealed.

The bill of costs related exclusively to the appellants' costs and charges in relation to the promotion of the said private Bill in Parliament, and the appellants' affidavit stated that the items therein contained related wholly to work done and expenses incurred by them as parliamentary agents properly taxable under the House of Commons Costs Taxation Act, 1847.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Vesey Knox, for the appellants.—Ridley, J., was of opinion that, as no part of the business charged for in this bill was transacted in any court of law or equity, the costs were taxable in the High Court under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, as modified by section 16 of the Judicature Act, 1873, but that the taxation must take place in the Chancery Division: see In re Pollard, 36 W. R. 515, 20 Q. B. D. 656; and In re Collyer-Bristow & Co., 50 W. R. 4, [1901] 2 K. B. 839. The Legislature, however, have enacted special provisions for the taxing of the costs of Bills in Parliament, to be found in 10 & 11 Vict. c. 69, and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 78, which have taken the place of the earlier Acts, 6 Geo. 4, c. 123, and 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 64. These provisions are inconsistent with the provisions of the Solicitors Act, and constitute an entirely separate jurisdiction. There is therefore no power to tax the costs of proceedings in Parliament in this court. The charges made by the appellants in this bill are made, and the expenses incurred by them for which they charge in this bill were incurred by them, not in their capacity as solicitors, but in their capacity as parliamentary agents. The fact that the appellants happen to be solicitors as well as parliamentary agents does not give jurisdiction to tax such a bill of costs as the present, in the High Court.

They referred to Allen v. Aldridge, 5 Beav. 401; In re Strother, 5 W. R. 797, 3 K. & J. 518; In re Sudlow and Kingdom, 11 Beav. 400; In re Oliver, 15 W. R. 331, 36 L. J. Ch. 261.

Warrington, K.C. (Tudor Howell with him), for the respondents.—The relationship of solicitor and client existed in this case, and the fact that the solicitors acted as parliamentary agents is not sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the Solicitors Act.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question in this case is whether a bill of costs charged by a person who is a solicitor and also a parliamentary agent, if it embraces exclusively such charges as might be made by a parliamentary agent who was not also a solicitor, is subject to taxation in this court. The Legislature has provided machinery for dealing with the taxation of the costs of proceedings in Parliament in two statutes—viz., 10 & 11 Vict. c. 69, and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 78. It is clear that those statutes provide facilities for the taxation of the costs of the work with which they deal, which are different from the procedure laid down in the Solicitors Act; and it seems to be also clear that, where a person who does such work is not a solicitor, there are no other means of obtaining taxation except the facilities provided by those statutes. The question is how to deal with the case where the work is done by a person who is a solicitor. The appellants do not contend that a solicitor has immunity from taxation in this court where his bill is a mixed bill consisting partly of items such as only a solicitor could charge and partly of items for work such as any parliamentary agent might do. In such a case they do not dispute that there is jurisdiction to tax the bill in this court. But they contend that where the charges relate exclusively to work done by a solicitor merely in the capacity of a parliamentary agent and not in that of solicitor, the special jurisdiction provided by the above-mentioned statutes is incompatible with the jurisdiction under the Solicitors' Act relating to work done by solicitors, and that the bill is not referable for taxation as a solicitor's bill under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843. We have had several cases cited to us, and I think that, when we come to criticize those cases, they are found to be capable of being reconciled by one principle—viz., that, in order that a bill may be taxable under the Solicitors Act, it must relate to business in which the solicitor was employed because he was a solicitor.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

And in my opinion, where we have to deal with work which could be performed either by a person who was a parliamentary agent alone or by a person who was a parliamentary agent and also a solicitor, we ought to look to see what was the real relation between the parties, and, if the person was employed because he was a parliamentary agent and not because he was a solicitor, that consideration ought to govern the case. On these grounds I agree with the order made by the master, and disagree with the order made by Ridley, J.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The circumstances of this case do not raise any real difficulty. The appellants are parliamentary agents; they were not employed by the respondent except as parliamentary agents, and the charges made by them are such as may properly be made by parliamentary agents. There is nothing to show that they ever came into the position of solicitors to the respondent; on the contrary, they acted solely in their capacity as parliamentary agents. Then does it follow that because they happen also to be solicitors their bill of charges can be taxed in the Supreme Court? I think not. The method of taking costs of this kind is dealt with by the special Acts which have been referred to. The principle on which the court ought to act when a question of this sort arises was laid down by Lord Langdale in Allen v. Aldridge. After pointing out that a bill of costs might be taxed under the Solicitors Act, though no part of the business to which it related had been transacted in a court of law or equity, he proceeded to describe the business, the charges for which were taxable: "It must be business connected with the profession of an attorney or solicitor—business in which the attorney or solicitor was employed because he was an attorney or solicitor, or in which he would not have been employed if he had not been an attorney or solicitor, or if the relation of attorney or solicitor and client had not subsisted between him and his employer." It seems to me to be clear that the work charged for in this case does not come within that principle, and this court ought not to take on itself to tax charges made by the appellants in their capacity of parliamentary agents. I do not think there is any inconsistency between this principle and the decisions in the cases of In re Strother and In re Sudlow and Kingdom.

REES v. PENRIKYBER NAVIGATION COLLIERY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Dependant—Father of deceased in workhouse at time of death—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 2, Schedule I., (1) (a) (ii.).

The father of a workman who was accidentally killed in the course of his employment was in the workhouse at the time of the death of the deceased. The deceased did not during the last six or seven months of his life contribute towards the maintenance of his father, though before that period he had so contributed. The father applied for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, as being a dependant, in part dependent upon the earnings of the deceased.

Held, that the county court judge was justified in holding that the applicant was not a dependant.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Glamorganshire County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the father of a deceased workman, who had been in the employment of the respondents, and who met with an accident on the 6th of September, 1901, arising out of and in the course of his employment, and died in consequence thereof on the 15th of January, 1902.

The applicant claimed as having been a dependant in part dependent upon the deceased man's earnings at the time of his death.

The applicant had been blind for some years. In the course of the year 1897 he first went into the workhouse, and remained there until the end of the year. During this period the deceased man, under an order, contributed 1s. 6d. a week through the relieving officer towards his father's maintenance in the workhouse. In 1899 the father lived for about three months with a married daughter, and the deceased man paid her 8s. a week towards his maintenance. The deceased man also lived in the same house. From May, 1900, to May, 1901, the father lived with another married daughter, and the deceased man paid her from 7s. to 8s. a week towards his maintenance and paid for his clothes. In May, 1901, the father went to the workhouse, and remained there until the 16th of January, 1902, the day after the death of his son. During this period the deceased man did not contribute towards his father's maintenance, nor was any order made against him for that purpose. The deceased man at the time of his death was earning wages at the rate of 36s. a week, and was unmarried.

The county court judge made an award in favour of the respondents.

The applicant appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Sankey, for the applicant.—The county court judge made a mistake in point of law. The applicant was a dependant in part dependent upon the earnings of the deceased man at the time of his death within the meaning of Schedule I., par. 1 (a) (ii.) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The son was under a legal obligation to contribute towards his father's maintenance when his father became chargeable under the Poor Law Acts; and he was able so to contribute. That is sufficient to constitute dependency; it is not necessary that the son should have been actually contributing up to the time of his death.

They referred to Main Colliery Co. v. Davies, [1900] A. C. 358; 48 W. R. Dig. 113; and Cunningham v. McGregor & Co., 3 Ct. Sess. Cas. 5th Ser., 775.

Ruegg, K.C., and A. Parsons, for the respondents, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by a person claiming to be a dependant of a deceased workman. The county court judge has found that he was not a dependant. Unless this finding involves a mistake in point of law we cannot interfere; we are bound by the decision of the county court judge on a question of fact, especially on a question of dependency, which we now have the authority of the House of Lords for saying is entirely a question of fact. The applicant, who was the father of the deceased man, was in the workhouse at the time of the death. That is the only ground set up to support the claim of the applicant.

The argument comes to this—that, where a person is in the workhouse, and there is a person outside the workhouse against whom the guardians could enforce the obligation of maintenance by exacting contributions, then the person in the workhouse must be a dependent on the other person. In my opinion that contention involves a straining of the language of the Act. By section 7, sub-section 2, "dependants" are defined to be "such persons of the workman's family specified in the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death." And by Schedule I., par. 1 (a) (ii.), where the workman leaves dependants in part dependent upon his earnings, the amount of compensation is to be such sum as may be determined on arbitration to be reasonable and proportionate to the injury to the said dependants. The words of the Act contemplate an actual dependency of the claimant on the deceased workman, and no such dependency exists where the claimant is being maintained by the guardians in the workhouse. It is clearly a matter of indifference to the claimant whether the guardians are entitled to be reimbursed by anyone else. I am of opinion that it cannot be laid down as a matter of law that there must be dependency in such circumstances. It is sufficient to say that the question is one of fact, and is concluded by the finding of the county court judge.

Summons.

At the time of his death, which occurred in the year 1875, William Sawrey Rawlinson was the owner of a certain estate known as the Duddon Hall estate in Cumberland and Lancaster, and lord of the manor of Dunnerdale with Seathwaite, in the county of Lancaster. The said estate, which consisted of lands of freehold and copyhold or customary freehold tenure respectively, included a small lake called Seathwaite Farn, which formed part of the manor. Part of the said estate was subject to a mortgage created by an indenture dated the 30th of December, 1865, and the legal estate in the freehold hereditaments comprised therein was at the time of William Sawrey Rawlinson's death outstanding in the mortgagees and has ever since remained outstanding. Other parts of the said estate were subject to a jointure deed dated the 25th of June, 1862, whereby a rent-charge of £800 a year was reserved in favour of Elizabeth Mary Rawlinson, the wife of William Sawrey Richardson.

By his will, which was dated the 17th of October, 1872, William Sawrey Rawlinson appointed his wife and Robert Rawlinson and Crayston Webster, therein referred to as his trustees, to be executrix and executors of his will, and after bequeathing certain legacies, the testator bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion and directed that if the moneys to arise from the conversion of his residuary personal estate should be insufficient to provide for the payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and legacies then, and in such case he thereby charged his residuary real estate thereinafter devised with the payment of such deficiency, and he authorized his trustees to raise such deficiency by mortgage of all or any part of his residuary real estate, and the testator devised all his manors and all the residue of his freehold estates subject and charged as thereinbefore mentioned to the use of his eldest or only son living at his death in case such son should have attained the age of twenty-five years in fee, but if there should be no son of his living at his death who should have attained the age of twenty-five years, then to the use of such son of his as after his decease should first attain the age of twenty-five years in fee, with remainder as therein mentioned. And the testator further devised his copyhold or customary estates to the said Robert Rawlinson upon trusts corresponding to the uses therein declared of and concerning his residuary freehold estates.

The testator died on the 29th day of June, 1875, and his will was duly proved on the 26th day of July, 1875. The testator's personal estate after payment of the testator's funeral and testamentary expenses and debts proved insufficient for the payment of all the legacies bequeathed by the said will.

None of the children of the testator had attained the age of twenty-five years at the date of his death, but his eldest son, William Millers Rawlinson, attained that age on the 20th day of April, 1888.

By an indenture dated the 18th of June, 1889 (being a settlement made on his marriage with Rosella Ellen Rigge), William Millers Rawlinson conveyed the Duddon Hall estate to trustees subject to the said mortgage of the 30th of December, 1865, and to the said jointure rent-charge and to the unpaid legacies, upon the trusts therein mentioned. Subsequently to the said settlement, William Millers Rawlinson effected mortgages of the said hereditaments which as to certain of the mortgaged hereditaments affected the legal estate therein.

By his will, dated the 9th of March, 1897, William Millers Rawlinson, after appointing George Brooke Millers Rawlinson and Frederick Maurice Dickson to be trustees and executors thereof, devised to his trustees all his manors or lordships and all the real estates of which he had power to dispose by his said will upon certain trusts thereby declared, during the life or widowhood of his wife, with remainders over, and he directed that they should have a power of sale over the said hereditaments.

William Millers Rawlinson died on the 20th of March, 1897, and his will was proved on the 12th of June, 1897.

By an agreement dated the 3rd of June, 1901, and made between the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough of Barrow-in-Furness (hereinafter called the corporation) as purchasers, of the one part, and Elizabeth Mary Rawlinson (who was then the sole surviving trustee of the will of William Sawrey Rawlinson), the vendor, of the other part, after reciting that the corporation were promoting a Bill in Parliament to enable them to bring water from Seathwaite Farn by a line of pipes to the borough of Barrow-in-Furness, it was agreed that the said Elizabeth Mary Rawlinson should sell to the corporation for the sum of £15,000 (a) the fee simple of and in 93 acres of land in the said agreement mentioned, and (b) the right to lay down and maintain in perpetuity a line of pipes through the estates known as the Duddon Hall and Thwaite Flat estates. The 93 acres of land mentioned in the above agreement formed part of the waste lands of the Manor of Dunnerdale with Seathwaite, and the line of pipes was to traverse the lands included in the jointure deed of the 25th of June, 1862. The said agreement was confirmed by section 22 of the Barrow-in-Furness Corporation Act, 1901, which received the Royal Assent on the 9th of August, 1901.

In the requisitions on title the corporation objected that under the will of the testator W. S. Rawlinson the trustees took no estate in the residuary real estate, and that the will did not show any power of sale in the trustees; and, further, that the vendor was not authorized to grant easements by statute or otherwise, and they accordingly insisted that all persons having a legal interest in the property should concur in the conveyance and grant. The vendor, however, asserted that, as the personal estate of the testator was insufficient to pay the legacies, she, as sole surviving trustee, had an overriding power of sale over all charges created subsequently to the death of the testator, and she declined to procure the concurrence of such incumbrancers, but consented to obtain the concurrence of incumbrancers whose charges were in existence at the date of the testator's death.

The present summons was taken out by the corporation, asking for a declaration that the vendor was not competent to convey the land nor grant the easement comprised in the said agreement of the 3rd of June, 1901, without the concurrence of all persons having a legal title or legal remedy against the said land and the hereditaments over which the said rights were agreed to be granted.

The vendor relied on her common law right to sell as executrix under the general charge of debts given by the said will and also on the powers conferred on executors by sections 14 and 16 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35 (Lord St. Leonards Act), and further that she was empowered to grant the easement by virtue of the powers given her by section 32 of the Barrow-in-Furness Corporation Act, 1901, and the Land Clauses Acts incorporated therewith.

Section 22 of the Barrow-in-Furness Corporation Act, 1901, confirmed the agreement of the 3rd of June, 1901, and section 31 empowered the corporation to acquire easements. Section 32 provided as follows: "Persons empowered by the Lands Clauses Acts to sell and convey or release lands may if they think fit, subject to the provisions of those Acts and of this Act, grant to the corporation any easement, right, or privilege . . . required for the purposes of this Act in, over, or affecting any such lands, and the provisions of the said Acts with respect to lands and rent-charges so far as the same are applicable on this behalf shall extend and apply to such grants and to such easements, rights, and privileges as aforesaid respectively."

Section 7 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, enacts as follows: "It shall be lawful for all parties being seised, possessed of, or entitled to any such lands—(i.e., lands authorized to be taken by the special Act)—or any estate or interest therein to sell and convey or release the same to the promoters of the undertaking, and to enter into all necessary agreements for that purpose; and particularly it shall be lawful for all or any of the following parties so seised, possessed, or entitled as aforesaid so to sell, convey, or release—that is to say, all corporations . . . trustees, or feoffees in trust for charitable or other purposes, executors and administrators and all parties for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of any such land in possession . . . and the power so to sell, convey, or release as aforesaid may lawfully be exercised by all such parties . . . not only on behalf of themselves and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and successors, but also for and on behalf of every person entitled in reversion, remainder, or expectancy after them or in defeasance of the estates of such parties . . . and as to such trustees, executors, and administrators on behalf of their cestui que trusts . . . and that to the same extent as such cestui que trusts respectively could have exercised the same powers under the authority of this and the special Act if they had respectively been under no disability."

Warrington, K.C., and Attwater, for the purchasers.—Two questions arise—firstly, as to the vendor's power to sell the land; secondly, as to her power to grant an easement. With regard to the sale of land, the vendor has no power of sale under the statute. She could only sell under section 16 of Lord St. Leonards' Act, but that section is not applicable here, as the present case falls within the express exceptions mentioned in section 18, as William Millers Rawlinson was devisee in fee. But assuming William Millers Rawlinson was not devisee at the time of the testator's death, yet he clearly became so in 1888, when he attained twenty-five years of age, and from that date he could have sold as devisee under sections 15 and 18 of the Act. (They referred to In re Wilson, Pennington v. Payne, 34 W. R. 512, 54 L. T. Rep. 600;

In re Rebbeck, Bennett v. Rebbeck, 42 W. R. 478, 71 L. T. Rep. 74, and Lippincott v. Smyth, 8 W. R. 336, 29 L. J. Ch. 520). With regard to the grant of the easement, the vendor has no power to grant the easement. Sections 31 and 32 of the Barrow-in-Furness Corporation Act, 1901, only apply to persons empowered by the Lands Clauses Act to sell and convey or release lands, and section 7 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, only authorizes persons "seised, possessed, or entitled to lands to sell, convey, or release," and it has no application to an executor with a power of sale.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Dickinson, for the vendor.—Firstly, with regard to the sale. Apart from the statute the vendor has a power of sale as executrix under the ordinary or common law. But she has also a power under section 16 of Lord St. Leonards' Act. Section 18 does not apply in the present case. The son eventually entitled as devisee could not at the testator's death sell, and therefore the vendor as executrix had power to sell under section 16. In re Wilson is a somewhat similar case to the present, and is in our favour. Section 16 is not excluded by section 18 unless at date of the testator's death there is a devisee then actually in existence and ascertained. They also referred to Wrigley v. Sykes, 4 W. R. 228, 21 Beav. 337; Sabin v. Heape, 8 W. R. 120; 27 Beav. 553; and In re Tanqueray-Willaume and Landau, 30 W. R. 801, 20 Ch. D. 465). As regards the grant of the easement, the vendor is clearly entitled to grant the easement by virtue of sections 31 and 32 of the Barrow-in-Furness Corporation Act, 1901, and section 7 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. Section 7 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, expressly mentions executors.

Warrington, K.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—In this case there are two questions for decision, which it will be convenient to treat separately. The executrix of William Sawrey Rawlinson has contracted to sell land, and the first question is whether she has made a good title to the purchaser. [His lordship then read the material parts of the testator's will.] The question is, can the executrix sell the land which is charged with the debts and legacies. For some purposes it is immaterial whether the legacies are charged or not, but for the purposes of Lord St. Leonards' Act there must be a charge of debts or legacies. It has been argued that the executrix has a power of sale under the ordinary or common law quite independent of Lord St. Leonards' Act, and that really the two questions are the same, and that is, I think, correct. It is not competent for me to cast any doubt on the authorities which have decided that where there is a charge of debts an executor can sell, and it necessarily follows that an executor selling under such a charge can vest in the purchaser such estate as his testator had, whatever that may have been, so as to give the purchaser as good a title as the testator would have been competent to give.

It is not necessary for me to refer to the cases cited, but I will assume that independently of the statute there was a power of sale; but the main question is whether there is a power of sale under the statute. This is, I think, not only an open, but in its precise form an entirely new point. If the executrix here has a power of sale, it is under section 16 of the Act, which to some extent operates by reference to the preceding section 14. The 16th section takes the case of no devise of the land to other persons or to the executor himself as trustee. It is the case we have here, of an executrix selling and being entitled to sell by exercise simply of a power and not by virtue of any property whatever. The difficulty, however, arises under section 18, which places a limit on section 16. By section 18 the provisions of section 16, as also of sections 14 and 15, are not to extend to a devise to any person or persons in fee or in tail. It is said that as here there was a devise to the first son who should attain twenty-five in fee, there was no occasion or opportunity for the operation of section 16, which was excluded by the devise. The obvious purpose of the Act was to enable property which was charged with debts and legacies to be sold in any event, by the devisee if there was a devisee, by the executor if there was no devisee. Under which class does the present case fall? There is a devise here to a person in fee, but it is a devise by way of executory gift. It is a springing use. It is a devise to the first son who should attain twenty-five. In the present case the son attained twenty-five about thirteen years after the testator's death. What happened in the meantime. There being no provision in the will, the estate descended. It was vested in the heir. To that extent there was no devise. There was a devise eventually, but there was no devise then in operation. The result was that during those thirteen years there was no power in the devisee to sell, and it is said that there was no power in the executrix to sell. That, however, seems to me to contradict the purpose of the Act, it being inconsistent with the provisions of the Act. The precise case has never arisen, but a case somewhat similar arose in In re Wilson, before Kay, J. There there was a devise in fee, but in settlement—that is to say, it was a devise to a tenant for life, and then to other persons in remainder. They might or might not have between them disposed of the whole fee; it is immaterial to consider this, but the learned judge held that that was not a devise to any person or persons in fee or in tail. In other words, a devise to a person or persons or in tail does not mean a devise of a particular estate followed by a remainder, nor a number of particular estates followed by a remainder, nor does it mean anything else but one devise in fee or in tail to a single person or to a number of persons as tenants in common or joint tenants. The principle of the decision in In re Wilson seems to me to be entirely in accord with the vendor's argument. The decision proceeded on the construction of the Act, meaning, as I have said, that either the executor or the devisee is to have the power of sale, and if you have a settlement with any disposition of the fee which does not enable the devisee to sell—that is to say, does not necessarily vest the disposition, the conveyance, and the control of the whole legal fee in some person or persons competent to deal with it—then it seems to me the Act applies, and the exception in section 18 does not apply. But there was an argument on the concluding words of section 18, "nor shall they"—that is, the provisions of section 16 amongst others—"effect the power of any such devisee or devisees to sell or mortgage as he or they may by law now do," and it was agreed that even if the son who ultimately took was not a devisee in fee immediately under the will, still he became a devisee in fee when he attained twenty-five, and from that time forward he must have been capable of selling, because the statute says that a devisee may sell, of and care is taken to provide that the powers such a devisee shall not be affected. To my thinking that is not the right interpretation. I think the section looks to the point of time when the will comes into operation. It is then, and not during the uncertain period (which may be any number of years during which it has to be ascertained whether there is a devisee or not), that the power is vested in the executor for that time. It seems to me that, "any such devisee or devisees," in the concluding words of the section means a devisee of that character, devisees who take on the death of the testator, and by virtue of his will, the estate in fee or in tail thereby devised to them, and I see no reason for saying that if the executor once has the power it shall be taken away from him merely because it is ultimately found that the heir is displaced by the springing use, and that the son becomes entitled to the fee on attaining twenty-five. It is not necessary for me to say what his powers would be. That, I think, disposes of the first point, and I have intentionally disposed of it almost entirely under the statute because, as I have said, that was really the point for decision.

Now the other question is one of an entirely different character, and it has nothing whatsoever to do with the branch of law with which we have hitherto been dealing, though it is part of the law of real property. The executrix, besides contracting to sell the land, has contracted to sell an easement, the right to convey water over other land; and the question is whether she can do that. It is not suggested that there is any common law power, any power by virtue of charge of debts and legacies, or any power under Lord St. Leonards' Act to grant an easement. That is entirely beside the mark. What is said is that under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and the special Act of this corporation there is this power to grant an easement. Before the special Act was passed the parties entered into an agreement—the agreement which has given rise to this discussion — and by that agreement this executrix purports to sell and the corporation to buy this land and easement. The agreement is made binding on those parties by the 22nd section of the special Act, but it has not been argued that that statutory confirmation does anything more than make it a binding agreement—that is to say, neither, on the one hand, does it empower the corporation to buy anything which they could not properly buy; nor, on the other hand, does it empower the vendor to sell anything which she could not properly sell; still less does it enable her to convey any estate which is not vested in her. It merely makes it a binding agreement to be dealt with like any other binding agreement by an argument and decision in the courts. So we put that aside. Then the special Act incorporates the Land Clauses Act, and the special Act also says in section 32: "Persons empowered by the Lands Clauses Act to sell and convey or release lands may, if they think fit, subject to the provisions of those Acts and of this Act, grant to the corporation any easement." I need not read any further. It is said that under these sections this executrix can grant an easement to the corporation. It is quite clear that under the Land Clauses Act no railway company or other corporation simply having the powers of that Act could purchase an easement at all, and that no person, even an owner in fee, could grant them an easement so as to give them an indefeasible title to it. It cannot be suggested that the Lands Clauses Act gives the slightest power to any limited owner—that is to say, any owner who is not an owner in fee, to grant an easement, so that we approach this special Act and the Lands Clauses Act from that point of view.

I think we must deal with the two sections rather each by itself, the 32nd second of the special Act, and the 7th section of the general Act. The 32nd section of the special Act says: "Persons empowered by the Lands Clauses Acts to sell and convey or release lands." This lady is not empowered by the Lands Clauses Act to sell unless the construction which is contended for on the 7th section gives her that power. That I must turn to directly. She is not otherwise empowered by the Lands Clauses Act to sell, and if she is not empowered by the Lands Clauses Act to sell, then the 32nd section does not apply, and she is not one of the persons thereby authorized to grant to the corporation any easement. So now we must turn to the 7th section of the Lands Clauses Act. It is a long section, but it is not open to the objection which often applies to a lengthy section, because, though there are a great many words, they are (at least I have always found them to be) exceedingly well arranged, and they fall under different heads very easily. We have at the very beginning of the section a description of the persons to whom authority is given—namely, parties seised, possessed of, or entitled to any such land or any estate or interest therein. Well, they are to sell and convey and enter into all necessary agreements and then "particularly it shall be lawful for all or any of the parties so seised, possessed, or entitled as aforesaid. . . . Trustees or feoffees in trust for charitable or other purposes, executors or administrators, and all parties for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of any such lands in possession, or subject to any such estate in dower, or to any lease for life." Then the argument is: Executors and administrators are not entitled to land, and that shows that notwithstanding this strong language pointing in the other direction, the Legislature did contemplate a sale by persons who were not seised, possessed of, or entitled to the land. The answer is that land includes chattels real and also, of course, an estate pur autre vie which might be vested in the executor, and even an administrator might become so entitled as in the instance I suggested to Mr. Lawrance in the course of the argument as the legal personal representative of the sole or surviving executor of the original testator. So that we have a meaning which we can give those words without committing the extravagance of saying that they are not to be necessarily seised, possessed, or entitled. I pass on to the concluding words because I think they are important—"and as to such trustees, executors, and administrators on behalf of their cestui que trusts, whether infants, issue unborn, lunatics, femes covert, or other persons." Now creditors, legatees, and so forth might possibly be included under the "other persons," but I do not think that the language points in that direction. There is nothing to assist me in saying that by "other persons" is meant creditors, where there is a charge of debts, and legatees where there is a charge of legacies, and I think that such a construction is excluded by the following words: "and that to the same extent as such cestui que trusts respectively could have exercised the same powers under the authority of this and the special Act if they had respectively been under no disability." In order to apply that to such a case as we are dealing with you must conceive the legatee to be under disability, which there is no reason for supposing at all, and you must treat creditors as cestui que trusts and also as possibily under disability. I think it would be an extravagant construction of the Act to suppose that the Legislature ever meant this to apply to an executor or an administrator without any estate or interest in the land which he purported to sell and convey.

Therefore, that being so, this vendor is not a person empowered by the Lands Clauses Act to sell and convey. She can sell and convey—I have held that in her favour—not because she comes within the 7th section, but because she has power which is vested in her either at common law or under Lord St. Leonards' Act. But as she is not a person empowered by the Lands Clauses Act to sell and convey, she is not competent to grant an easement.

Having regard to the importance of both questions, the time which has been occupied by them and the result, I think the proper order as to costs will be that each party pay his own costs.

Will—Construction—Devise of "my freehold land and hereditaments"—Customary freeholds.

A testatrix devised "my freehold land and hereditaments at M" to A., and the residue of her real and personal estate to trustees. Testatrix was entitled at the date of her death to four closes of land at M, of which two were freeholds and two were customary freeholds. The four closes were in the occupation of A.

Held, that the words "my freehold land and hereditaments" included the customary freeholds.

Originating summons.

By her will, dated the 22nd of September, 1899, Ann Steel, of the Town Head, Bolton, in the parish of Morland, in the county of Westmoreland, made the following devise:

"I give and devise my freehold land and hereditaments at Morland Field, in the said parish of Morland, unto and to the use of Mrs. Ann Robinson, of Morland . . . and her heirs, but if the said Ann Robinson shall die before me I give and devise the said land and hereditaments unto the person or persons, and if more than one in the proportions and for the estate or estates, and generally in the manner, to whom and in and for which, the same would have devolved if the said Ann Robinson had died immediately after me, and if her last will (if any) had first taken effect."

Testatrix then devised the residue of her real and personal estate to the plaintiffs as trustees upon trusts for sale, the proceeds to be divided between several beneficiaries.

The testatrix died on the 29th of January, 1902, and her will was proved on the 1st of March following.

The testatrix was at the date of her will, and thenceforth until her death, entitled to four pieces of land at Morland Field. Two of these pieces were of freehold tenure, and the other two were copyhold of the manor of Morland, of which the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle were the lords.

Testatrix had derived the lands as heiress-at-law of her brother William Steel, who died in 1886, seised in fee simple in possession of the freehold pieces of land and in customary fee simple of the copyhold pieces of land, of which he was tenant on the rolls of the said manor.

Testatrix had never been admitted tenant of the copyhold pieces of land on the roll of Morland Manor.

The four pieces of land were at the date of the will and for many years previously in the occupation of the defendant Mrs. Ann Robinson, the devisee in the will, and who then held and had for many years held the same as testatrix's tenant at a yearly rent of £12.

The said pieces of land all lie together in close proximity to another farm held by Ann Robinson.

The question to be decided by the court was whether the specific devise in the will to the defendant Ann Robinson of the testatrix's freehold land and hereditaments at Morland Field included the two copyhold fields held from the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle as Lords of the Manor of Morland, to which the testatrix was entitled as customary heiress of her late brother William Steel (deceased), the tenant then on the roll of the said manor, but to which she had never been admitted tenant; or whether such copyhold fields passed to the plaintiffs under the devise to them of the testatrix's residuary estate.

A. Whitaker, for the trustees, argued that the copyhold lands passed under the residuary devise: Stone v. Greening, 13 Sim. 390; Arkell v. Fletcher, 10 Sim. 299. In re Bright-Smith, Bright-Smith v. Bright-Smith, 34 W. R. 252, 31 Ch. D. 314, could be distinguished, as in that case there was no residuary devise.

J. Gatey, for the defendant, contended that the term "freehold land and hereditaments" included the customary freeholds.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—It appears that the testatrix derived these closes of land as heiress on the death of her brother. The fields have been let in one entirety to Mrs. Robinson. Part of the land was freehold and part was customary freehold of the manor of Morland belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle. Testatrix was never admitted as tenant and never paid the manorial rent of 1s. and 1s. 2d. per year payable in respect of these lands, and although she was not only heiress-at-law, but also customary heiress to her brother, she herself does not appear to have been aware of the distinction. These lands have been usually known as freeholds or customary freeholds in the locality. I am of opinion that the testatrix in the clause devising her "freehold lands and hereditaments" to the defendant, was not using the words in the strict technical sense of tenure, but intended in fact that these lands in their entirety should pass under the word freeholds. I therefore hold that both classes of fields, those properly called freehold, as well as those locally called freehold or customary freehold, pass to the devisee of her "freehold lands and hereditaments."

Case stated by the court of general quarter sessions for the peace for the county of Durham.

At a court of summary jurisdiction in the county of Durham the appellant was convicted for an offence alleged to have been committed by him under section 7, sub-section 1, of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, which enacts that "Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority (i.) . . . injures his property . . . shall on conviction" be liable to pay a fine or imprisonment.

The conviction, so far as material, was in the following terms: "Cummings Smith, hereafter termed the defendant, is this day convicted for that he, on the 4th day of February, 1902, at the parish of Heworth, in the said county, with a view to compel Thomas William Moody to abstain from working for Messrs. John Bowes & Partners (Limited) at Felling Colliery, in the said county, which he had a legal right to do, unlawfully, wrongfully, and without legal authority did injure the property of the said Thomas William Moody, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided," &c.

The appellant appealed against this conviction to the quarter sessions, when the point was taken on his behalf that the form of the conviction was bad and ought to be quashed on two grounds: (1) That the conviction contained no sufficient definite specification of any act which the respondent had a legal right to do, or of any act which the appellant intended to compel the respondent to abstain from doing. (2) That the property of the respondent alleged to have been injured by the appellant ought to have been particularly specified in the conviction.

The quarter sessions, overruling both objections, affirmed the conviction.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 39, sub-section (1) provides that in proceedings before a court of summary jurisdiction "the description of any offence in the words of the Act . . . creating the offence, or in similar words, shall be sufficient in law."

R. I. Simey, for the appellant.—The conviction is bad because it is too vague. It should have stated the work which the respondent had been prevented doing by the alleged wrongful act of the appellant: Reg. v. McKenzie, 41 W. R. 144, [1892] 2 Q. B. 519. Moreover, the property which it is alleged that the appellant had injured is not stated. That such an indictment is bad has been held in a series of cases from the time when Holt, C.J., so ruled in Rex. v. Chandler, 1 Ld. Raym. 581. That inherent defect is not cured by section 39 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which has not changed the law in this respect, for, while that section provides that "the description of any offence in the words of the Act creating the offence or in similar words shall be a sufficient description in law," it does not do away with the rule that in a conviction, as in an indictment, all the facts and circumstances constituting the offence must be specially set out.

Shortt (Mitchell Innes with him). for the respondent.—As to the first ground of objection, Ex parte Wilkins, 64 L. J. M. C. 221, 43 W. R. Dig. 57, is an authority for this court to hold that it is one without substance. The conviction states that the appellant was going to work for a particular specified person, and it was unnecessary to add a description of the work he was going to do and was prevented from doing for that particular person. The offence is the unlawful preventing another from working, and it is not necessary to set out the means by which the workman was prevented from doing that which he had a right to do, Ex parte Perham, 29 L. J. M. C. 33. As to the second ground of objection the conviction states that the property injured was that of Thomas Wm. Moody, and that is a sufficient description by virtue of s. 39 (1) of the Act of 1879, as it follows the words of the Act of 1875 creating the offence.

Simey replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case two objections are taken to the form of the conviction. The first is that the conviction does not sufficiently state the act from the performance of which the respondent was induced to abstain. It is contended that the conviction should have stated the work which the respondent was going to do or the nature of the act which he was going to do, so to speak, in the furtherance of working for the firm named. I am of opinion that this objection fails. As regards this point no material fact has been omitted from the conviction and the offence is sufficiently stated. It is clear that the Act would apply to the case of a man who, not having in fact been employed by the employer named, is intending to try and obtain work from him at a particular place, and who therefore may not know the precise nature of the work which he will have to do; but it would be impossible in such a case to set out in the conviction the exact nature of the act which the workman was compelled to abstain from performing. It is said on behalf of the appellant that this view is contrary to that expressed by the present Master of the Rolls (then Collins, J.) in Reg. v. McKenzie, but I am of opinion that there is nothing in that decision contrary to the view which I am now expressing. The conviction there merely stated that, with a view to compel the informant from doing acts which he had a legal right to do, the defendant followed the informant in a disorderly manner. No information whatever was given; neither the name of the employer nor the place of employment was mentioned, and the conviction did not even allege that the man wanted to work at all. The court held that the conviction was bad because it ought to have set out some particular and definite act which the defendant had intended to compel the informant to abstain from doing, but there is nothing in the judgment to show that Collins and Bruce, JJ., thought that a statement that an endeavour had been made to compel a man from working for a particular employer at a specified place would have been insufficient. A similar question came before Cave and Lawrance, JJ., in Ex parte Wilkins, and the conviction in the present case is quite as specific for the purpose of stating the offence as it was in that case; and Cave, J., in referring to Reg. v. McKenzie made use of an observation, which showed that he, at any rate, declined to accept the broad principle which has been contended for in this case on behalf of the appellant. For these reasons I think that this objection fails.

The second objection to the conviction is that it does not sufficiently specify the property of the respondent which the appellant is alleged to have injured, the only words used being "did injure the property of" the respondent. I have come to the conclusion that this objection is good and must prevail. I was at first inclined to think that the defect was cured by section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which provides that "the description of any offence in the words of the Act . . . creating the offence or in similar words shall be sufficient in law"; but on further considering the question, which is undoubtedly one of importance, it seems to me that it could not have been intended by that section to do away with the old rule of criminal practice which requires that fair information and reasonable particularity as to the nature of the offence must be given in indictments and convictions. All that is meant by section 39 is that the offence itself need only be described in the words of the statute creating it. As was put forward in the argument for the appellant, it clearly would not be sufficient to say in a conviction for larceny "did steal the property of" the prosecutor without any further particulars; and in my opinion section 39 does not cure the omission from a conviction of such particularity in the description and details of the offence as has always been required. I therefore come to the conclusion on this point of the case, that the conviction insufficiently described the offence, and that it is no answer to the objection to say that in using the words "did injure the property of" the respondent, the language of section 7 of the Act of 1875 has been followed, and therefore that no further information is required. I have come to this conclusion with some reluctance because I have very little doubt that actual injury to the respondent's property was proved, but in giving our decision we have to consider how far it may have a bearing on other proceedings. The second objection is, in my opinion, fatal, and the conviction must therefore be quashed.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I think that section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which provides that it is sufficient to describe the offence in the words of the statute creating the offence cannot be supposed to have been intended to break down the very important rule which has prevailed now for at least 200 years in the administration of justice with respect to the sufficiency of particulars in a conviction. I do not think for a moment that it was intended to relieve persons who had to draw convictions from inserting anything that was necessary as an ingredient of the offence of which the particular defendant had been found guilty. When one comes to the description of the offence itself, then it is quite sufficient if it is described in the terms of the statute, however general they may be. At the same time, the old rule must prevail that whatever is necessary to show that the person convicted has done something which brought him within the words of the statute must still be specified.

With regard to the first question I feel no difficulty, because that which the appellant intended to prevent the respondent from doing—namely, working for an employer—is necessarily of a somewhat vague character. It may be that the object of the appellant was to prevent the respondent from doing any work at all, and in such a case it would be impossible to state any specific act which the appellant sought to compel the respondent to abstain from doing. The act is described in the conviction as "working for Messrs. John Bowes & Partners (Limited), at Felling Colliery, in the said county," and I do not know how a more specific or appropriate description than that could be given. If it were necessary to choose between the two decisions Ex parte Wilkin and Reg. v. McKenzie, I should certainly be disposed to say that I agree with the former rather than with the latter. But for the reasons which my lord has given I do not think that there is any real inconsistency between the two decisions, though no doubt some of the observations of Collins, J., in Reg. v. McKenzie, when divorced from the particular circumstances to which they refer, do appear to go further than the case then before the learned judge required, and to apply to such a case as the present. Nor do I think that Cave, J., in Ex parte Wilkin meant to depart from a case which was binding on him.

But when we come to the second branch of this case it does appear to me that there is a very important question involved. I can well understand the reason of this necessity for holding magistrates and other tribunals to strictness in this matter of describing the elements in an offence, because if laxity is allowed in the statement of the offence in the summons or in the conviction, it is a great encouragement to those who have to deal with such matters to take refuge in generalities, and not to apply their minds to the specific question. Here the appellant has committed a specific offence, but it does seem to me that merely saying that he "wrongfully injured the property" of the respondent without anything further is not sufficient. It is not that there is any insufficiency in the description of the offence itself. The description of the offence follows the words of the statute, but there is insufficiency with respect to the ingredients of the offence which the appellant has committed, and for which he has been convicted. I think specific information as to the injury to property ought to have been given in the conviction.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I have a very clear opinion on the first point. In all probability the actual thing that was proved was that there was a desire to compel the respondent from doing any work of any kind whatever for the particular firm at the particular place, and if that was proved that is clearly an offence within the meaning of this statute, and it would be impossible to state it otherwise than in the way in which it is stated. I do not suppose that the intention was to prevent the respondent from working in one particular capacity and to allow him to work in another; at any rate, if that which I have suggested was proved the offence was committed, and the conviction, as stated, is not in any way defective. It is unnecessary to go through the cases in detail, but there is nothing in them which is contrary to the view I have expressed.

On the second point I have a good deal of doubt. I do not see the mischief that my brother Wills, J., seems to think there is with regard to the form of the conviction; because the form is necessarily drawn up after the conviction, and it does not seem to me that our holding that the conviction might be recorded in general terms would induce magistrates not to be particular as to what was proved. The principle, however, seems to be that, subject to statutory provisions making certain things unnecessary in certain cases, the conviction must be as precise as the summons, and if there were a charge against a man—either by an indictment or by summons made in the vague way in which this conviction is drawn up—a charge against a man of injuring the property of another without specifying what property or giving any further information, it does seem to me that that would be insufficient. Therefore, following the rule that the conviction must be as precise as an indictment,

I think that this conviction is wrong in form unless it is met by some statutory provision on the point. Section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, is the one relied on, but that seems to be a repetition of previous enactments, and although section 39 provides that it shall be sufficient so far as regards the description of the offence to follow the statute, I do not think the section in any way dispenses with the usual necessity for specifying time and place and matter in the way in which it has been hitherto specified. It could not possibly suffice in a case of larceny simply to specify the name of the person whose property was stolen. There must be facts relating to the particular matter, such as the time when and the manner in which the offence was committed, which would have to be inserted in the charge, and the omission of which cannot be cured by stating the offence in the words of the statute. No doubt the conviction might have been amended at quarter sessions, assuming, of course, that some specific property of the respondent was in fact proved to have been injured, and therefore I am rather reluctant to give effect to the objection, but we have no materials on which to make an amendment and there is therefore nothing for us to do but to quash the conviction.

By section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, promoters of undertakings are liable to make good the deficiency in the poor rate caused by their taking lands for the purposes of the undertaking, and by section 10 of the London Government Act, 1899, the general rate and the poor rate are to be made and levied as one rate as if it were a poor rate.

Held, that section 10 of the London Government Act, 1899, did not impose any fresh liability upon promoters of undertakings under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and that the defendants as promoters of an undertaking were only liable to make good the deficiency in that proportion of the general rate, which represented the poor rate.

Case stated by consent under ord. 34, r. 1, in an action brought for (1) a declaration that under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the London Government Act, 1899, the defendants were liable to make good to the plaintiffs the deficiency in the assessment to the general rate as defined by the last-mentioned Act on a house and lands known as No. 7, Barnsbury-park, Islington, by reason of those premises having been taken and used for the purposes of the works of the defendants, until the works should be completed by the defendants and assessed to the general rate; (2) for payment of the sum of £5 7s. 7d., being the second instalment of a general rate made the 28th of September, 1901, for the period ending the 25th of March, 1902, and payable on the 1st of January, 1902.

By section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, "If the promoters of the undertaking become possessed by virtue of this or the special Act or any Act incorporated therewith, of any lands charged with the land tax or liable to be assessed to the poor rate, they shall, from time to time, until the works shall be completed and assessed to such land tax or poor rate, be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land tax and poor rate by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the works.

By section 20 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, as amended by section 15 of the Elementary Education Act, 1873, it is enacted that with respect to the purchase of the land by school boards for the purposes of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, the following provisions shall have effect—that is to say: (1) The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same, shall be incorporated with this Act except the provisions relating to access to the special Act; and in construing those Acts for the purposes of this section the special Act shall be construed to mean an Act confirming an order of the Education Department for the purchase of land, together with the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and the promoters of the undertaking shall be construed to mean the school board; and (2) the school board before putting into force any of the powers of the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement are to give the notices prescribed by section 20 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870; and by the same section the Education Department may make an order authorizing the school board to put in force with reference to the land referred to in such order the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same with respect to the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement, but no such order is to be valid until it is confirmed by Parliament.

By a provisional order duly made and confirmed by the Education Department Provisional Order Confirmation (London) Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. ccix.), after section 20 of the Elementary Education Act had been complied with, the Education Department ordered that the defendants be authorized to put in force the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement with reference to (inter alia) the premises known as No. 7, Barnsbury-park aforesaid.

On or about the 12th of December, 1900, the defendants, under the powers conferred by the order, became possessed of the said premises, which consisted of a private dwelling-house and garden, which were then liable to be assessed to the poor rate, and were not exempt from that or any rate, or liable to be assessed thereto at a less amount than other hereditaments, and in respect thereof the defendants became the promoters of an undertaking within the meaning of the said section 133; and the said Confirmation Act, together with the Elementary Education Act, 1870, became the special Act within the meaning thereof; and the works within such meaning in connection with the said premises have not been completed and assessed to such poor rate.

By virtue of the London Government Act, 1899, the plaintiffs became and are the borough council for the borough of Islington, and the collectors of the assessment for poor rate mentioned in section 133. By section 10, sub-section 1, of the London Government Act, 1899, it is enacted that a scheme under that Act (which was duly made and passed as regards the borough of Islington) shall provide for all expenses of a borough council being paid out of the general rate, and for the discontinuance of a separate sewers rate and a separate lighting rate, but shall make provisions for protecting the interests of owners and occupiers of any hereditaments which is exempt from any rate, or liable to be assessed thereto at a less amount than other hereditaments; and by sub-section 2 of the same section it is enacted that after the appointed day, which has long since passed, the general rate and the poor rate shall be assessed, made, and levied together by the borough council as one rate, which shall be termed the general rate, and shall be assessed, made, and collected and levied as if it were a poor rate, and all enactments applying or referring to the poor rate shall, subject to the provisions of this Act as to audit, be construed as applying or referring also to the general rate. A copy of the scheme was annexed to and formed part of the case.

By reason of the lands having been taken and used by the defendants for the purposes of their works, there was prior to the 28th of September, 1901, and still is, an entire deficiency in the assessment for the general rate in respect of the said lands, and the plaintiffs, as such collectors have demanded from the defendants £5 7s. 7d., the amount of such deficiency for the period ending the 25th of March, 1902, but the defendants have neglected to pay the same. The proportion of such £5 7s. 7d. representing that portion of the general rate which is applicable to the relief of the poor is £3 3s.

The deficiency has been computed according to the rental at which the lands with the buildings thereon were valued and rated at the time of the passing of the Confirmation Act, 1898.

The plaintiffs' claimed that the defendants were liable to make good to the plaintiffs the said deficiency in the general rate, but the defendants contended that they were not liable to make good any part of such deficiency, or at any rate that they were only liable to make good such part of such deficiency as arose with respect to that part of the general rate which represents the poor rate.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether under the provisions of the said Acts of Parliament the defendants are bound to make good to the plaintiffs the whole of the deficiency in the general rate. (2) If the last question is answered in the negative, whether the defendants are bound to make good to the plaintiffs the deficiency in the proportion of the general rate which represents the poor rate.

Ryde (Danckwerts, K.C., with him), for the plaintiff.

Avory, K.C. (Layman with him), for the defendants.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

WRIGHT, J.—Under section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the promoters of undertakings to whom that Act applies are made liable, not to be rated to the poor rate, but to make good the deficiency in the poor rate caused by their taking under their statutory powers lands and buildings assessed to that rate; they are liable also to make good the deficiency in the land tax. The defendants have taken land under circumstances which render that section applicable, and the only question for my decision is what, in relation to the present case, is the meaning to be given to the expression "poor rate" in the section. The answer depends upon section 10 of the London Government Act, 1899. The Lands Clauses Act itself selected the poor rate as the rate the deficiency in which had to be made good; it left other rates, such as the county rate, the watching and lighting rate, &c., entirely outside its scope. I do not think that at that time the borough rate was payable out of the poor rate; certainly in some boroughs it was not so payable down to a very recent period. It is useless, however, to conjecture why the same principle was not applied to all rates; it may have been that the poor rate was a mere burden upon land, of which it was thought that everybody ought to pay his share, and that the rate ought to be paid even in a case like this where the land might be temporarily unprofitable, because then it would be a burden undertaken with a view to the future profitable user of the land. Again, it may have been thought that there should not be a similar liability in the case of charges which were not strictly a burden upon the land, but were rather charges in respect of the value of something provided by the local authority, such as sewerage, water, or lighting, &c., for in such a case the land might lie idle in the hands of the promoters of the undertaking, and they would receive no benefit from what was provided.

But the real question is what is the effect of section 10 of the Act of 1899; now, sub-section 2 of that section provides that the general rate and the poor rate are to be assessed, made, and levied "as one rate," which is to be called the general rate, and is to be assessed, made, collected, and levied as if it were the poor rate; it does not abolish either the general rate or the poor rate, but leaves them together side by side; it does not say that all these expenses are to be provided for by a levy which is to be part of the poor rate: it says "as if it were the poor rate," which is very different from saying that these expenses are to be treated as part of the outgoings of the poor rate. It is that difference of expression which prevents Farmer v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 36 W. R. 590, 20 Q. B. D. 788, from being an authority in the present case. There it was decided, and properly decided, that everything which was chargeable on the poor rate was to be regarded as being within a provision of this kind.

Pausing at this point in the section, I do not think there is enough to establish the conclusion that all these purposes are to be treated as purposes of the poor rate. The section then provides that all enactments applying or referring to the poor rate are, subject to the provisions of the Act as to audit, to be construed as applying or referring, also to the general rate; I think that this carries the matter no further. The words in their natural sense mean that enactments relating to the machinery for assessment, for making, collecting, and levying the poor rate, and for appeals, are to apply in future to the general rate. The expression "all enactments applying to the poor rate" is, if taken literally, difficult of application; I do not think that the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, can be properly described as an enactment applying to the poor rate; it deals, not with the rate, but with the deficiency on the rate owing to the temporary non-rateability of certain premises. Then section 11, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1899 indicates that for some purposes the general rate and the poor rate are intended to be kept separate, for it provides for the separation in the demand note of the several purposes for which the rate is made, and for a statement of the approximate amount in the pound required for each purpose, including a proportionate amount of the costs of collection. In the scheme which has been made under this Act there is an express provision for the purpose of giving effect to exemptions. The borough council is to apportion the amount of the general rate so as to show approximately the rate from time to time for any of the purposes or the number of purposes in respect of which there is such an exemption, and the rates in the pound so apportioned and entered are to be treated as levied for the purposes in respect of which these sums are given. I am not clear that that does not apply to this very case, although the word "exemption" is not appropriate for this purpose; but it may be that the word is there used in a general sense, and would cover a case like the present. Apart altogether, however, from the scheme, I think that the claim of the plaintiffs is not made out; the form of sections 10 and 11 would be a strange form to adopt if the intention were to impose a novel burden of this kind, especially when it is remembered that section 133 of the Act of 1845 is not concerned with rating at all; for while sections 10 and 11 of the Act of 1899, are entirely concerned with rating, section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, is merely concerned with the making up of the deficiency in the rate. I think that the true meaning of the enactments when read together is that the school board must make up the deficiency of that part of the general rate which represents the poor rate, or represents anything chargeable on that rate. The first question must therefore be answered in the negative, the second in the affirmative.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Jan. 29.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN LORD MOSTYN AND FITZSIMMONS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Renewal of lease—"At the costs of the lessee"—Costs of arbitration to assess fine payable on renewal.

A lease contained a covenant by the lessor that he would at any time during the term "upon the request and at the costs of the lessee," and on payment of a fine calculated upon the number of years of the term which had expired and the full improved annual value of the premises at the time of the renewal (such value to be determined by the lessor's surveyor or at the option of the lessee by the award of two referees or their umpire), renew the term. The lessee required the lessor to renew the term, and gave notice of his desire to have the full improved annual value of the premises determined by the award of two referees or their umpire.

Held, that the costs of the reference must be paid by the lessee.

Judgment of Wright, J., ([1902] 1 K. B. 512, 50 W. R. Dig. 92, reversed.

Appeal by Lord Mostyn from the judgment of Wright, J., upon an award stated in the form of a special case (reported in [1902] 1 K. B. 512, 50 W. R. Dig. 92).

By two leases, dated respectively the 13th of October, 1860, and the 6th of January, 1863, two sets of premises at Llandudno were demised for terms of seventy-five years from the 25th of December, 1860, at the annual rent of 5s. reserved by each lease. Each lease contained the following covenant: "And also that the lessors, their heirs or assigns, will, at any time during the said term, upon the request and at the costs of the lessee, his executors and administrators or assigns, and on payment by him or them of a fine calculated according to the table hereunder written upon the number of years of the said term which have expired and the full improved annual value of the premises at the time of such renewal (such value to be determined by the said surveyor"—of the lessor—"or at the option of the lessee by the award of two referees or their umpire) renew or cause to be renewed the said term for a further term of seventy-five years from the date of such renewal at the like rent and subject to the like covenants and conditions as are herein reserved and contained, including this present covenant for renewal."

Fitzsimmons claimed to be entitled as lessee thereof to the premises comprised in the leases for the unexpired residue of the respective terms, and Lord Mostyn claimed to be entitled to the same hereditaments as the landlord thereof in reversion expectant on the determination of the respective terms and in the meantime subject to the leases. In 1900 Fitzsimmons (hereinafter called the lessee) applied to Lord Mostyn (hereinafter called the landlord) for a renewal of both the terms for further terms of seventy-five years from the 25th of December, 1900. Differences arose between the landlord and the lessee with reference to the assessment of the fines payable by the lessee to the landlord in respect of the renewal of the terms, and for the purpose of such assessment the lessee gave notice to the landlord of his desire that the full improved annual value of the demised premises should be determined by the award of two referees or their umpire as provided by the leases. The lessee and the landlord each appointed an arbitrator, and the arbitrators appointed an umpire. The arbitrators, having failed to agree, referred the matter to the umpire.

A question was raised before the umpire as to whether he had any power or discretion to deal with the costs of the reference and award, it being contended by the landlord that upon the true construction of the leases the lessee was only entitled to obtain a renewal of the terms at his own cost in all things, including the whole of the costs of both parties of and incidental to the reference and award, and that the costs of the reference and award had not been referred to the umpire to deal with. It was contended by the lessee that the reference, which was a costly and expensive one extending over three days, was not such a determination by the award of two referees or their umpire as was contemplated by the provisions of the leases; and, further, that, whatever construction was placed upon the leases in relation to the reference and award, the costs of the reference and award were in the discretion of the umpire, and that the umpire had power to deal with such costs under the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

The questions for the court were—(1) whether, upon the true construction of the leases, the costs of renewal to be paid by the lessee included the costs of the reference and award; and (2) whether (whatever construction was placed upon the leases in relation to the costs of the reference and award) the umpire had any power or discretion to deal with the costs.

Wright, J., held that the costs of the renewal which were to be paid by the lessee were the ordinary conveyancing costs only, and that they did not include the costs of the reference and award, which were in the discretion of the umpire.

Marshall, K.C., and E. P. Hewitt, for Fitzsimmons.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I wish to begin my judgment by stating that no question is raised in this case as to the reasonableness of these costs in point of amount. I therefore assume that they are reasonable. The only question which we have to determine is as to the construction of the covenant for renewal in the leases. The question which we have to determine is whether the costs, which are specially dealt with in that covenant in the lease as having to be paid by the lessee, include the costs of the reference and award. In my judgment, having regard to the wording of the covenant, those costs are included in the covenant. I cannot see the application of the cases cited with reference to the payment of costs by lessees and others, where the payment is independent of any special agreement. In such cases the obligation to pay the costs is governed by the interests of the party for whose benefit the costs are incurred. Take, for instance, a lease and a counterpart. The costs of the lease and of the counterpart follow the respective interests of the lessor and lessee in those documents. We have only in the present case to construe this particular covenant. I do not think that Wright, J., would have arrived at the conclusion at which he arrived if he had merely considered whether the words of the covenant were wide enough to cover these costs. The learned judge thought that it would be unreasonable to place what I may call the natural construction upon the words, because to do so would give the landlord the power to force on the lessee unnecessary costs by claiming an extravagant sum as a fine. The truth of the matter is that the lease does not contemplate the landlord making any such claim at all or having an opportunity to make one. The lease contemplates the lessee exercising his option of calling for a renewal of the term and of having the amount of the fine assessed either by the landlord's surveyor or by arbitration, and of doing that without the landlord having the opportunity of making any claim at all. The costs of the reference and award are the costs necessarily incurred in the renewal of the terms having regard to the way in which the lessee has chosen to have the improved annual value of the premises determined, upon which the amount of the fines depends. The costs of renewal to be paid by the lessee, in my opinion, include the costs of the reference and award. The appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J., concurred. By the clause which we have to construe the renewal is to be at the costs of the lessee. The lessee elected to have the amount of the fine payable upon renewal ascertained by arbitration, and in my opinion any costs necessarily and properly incurred by the lessor in that arbitration are such costs as are referred to in the clause. A totally different question might have arisen if the lessor had misconducted himself in relation to the arbitration. No such question arises here.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We do not decide that in every possible case the costs of arbitration proceedings would be thrown upon the lessee. I am far from saying that, if the lessor behaved obstinately and unreasonably and compelled the lessee to go to arbitration, the lessor might not have to pay the costs.

Decision of Buckley, J., 50 W. R. 614, affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J., dated the 30th of April, 1898, and reported in 50 W. R. 614.

The facts were as follows:

The London and Northern Bank (Limited) was incorporated on the 6th of April, 1898. Mr. Bowden was the promoter, and an agreement was made on the 9th of April, 1898, whereby he was to have a sum of £20,000, equal to one per cent. on the nominal capital, for promotion expenses. Subsequently it was resolved to purchase the business of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank. The Leeds directors, however, insisted on a deposit of £14,250, which was 10 per cent. on the purchase-money. Bowden agreed to find this deposit, and the London and Northern Bank in a letter of the 21st of September undertook to repay the amount of the deposit, together with a bonus of £7,500 for the loan. It was distinctly stated that Bowden alone was to take the risk of forfeiture. The letter was written on behalf of the bank by one Haddock and addressed to a Mr. Craig, who was Bowden's nominee.

On the 26th of September the purchase agreement was signed and the sum of £14,250 deposited.

On the 27th of September the matter was considered by the directors and it was resolved that the agreement dated the 26th of September should be read and adopted and the company's seal affixed, it being understood that the bank underwent no liability as to the deposit.

On the 1st of October the matter came up again for consideration. The contract of the 21st of September was ratified and a letter to that effect was sent on behalf of the bank to Mr. Craig.

Arrangements were now made for the meeting of the directors of both banks, it having been agreed that one or two of the Leeds directors should become directors of the London and Northern Bank. This led to a meeting on the 10th of October.

Stong objection was taken by two the Leeds directors—Messrs. Bray and Gaunt—to the bonus of £7,500, and they refused to go on with the purchase unless it was abandoned.

When this was pointed out to Bowden, and also that if he persisted in his demand he stood to lose, not only the amount of the deposit, but also the money which he was to receive under the promotion agreement, he consented to the cancellation of the contract contained in the letter of the 21st of September.

At the same meeting a resolution was passed in the following terms: "That after full discussion and hearing the views of the directors of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited), and upon the chairman giving Mr. Bowden assurance that his right to receive proper remuneration for commission on introducing the business of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited), and raising the necessary deposit, shall be honourably met at a future meeting of the directors of the London and Northern Bank (Limited), it is resolved, with the assent of Mr. Craig, that the contract contained in the letter of the 21st of September, 1898, be cancelled, and that the subject be adjourned to a future meeting of the board.

On the 18th of October, Craig wrote to the trustee of the London and Northern Bank a letter as follows: "Referring to the letter which you wrote to me, dated the 21st of September, 1898, I understand that the directors of the London and Northern Bank have passed a resolution to the effect that the claim which I may have for commission on introducing the business of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited), or for raising the necessary deposit, shall be honourably and properly met. Having regard to that assurance, I am quite willing to agree to the terms of your letter to me being cancelled, and the arrangement there suggested as being considered at an end."

The contract of the 21st of September did appear in the prospectus originally proposed to be issued, but on the advice of counsel it was left out in the final prospectus. This was issued on the 24th of October. It stated that the only contracts to which the bank was a party were the promotion agreement of the 9th of May and the purchase agreement of the 26th of September.

On the faith of the prospectus the plaintiff applied for and was allotted shares in the bank. Subsequently the bank went into liquidation, and the plaintiff brought this action against the chairman, Mr. Paul Speak, and two of the directors, Messrs. Shepheard and Clayton, claiming a declaration that the prospectus must be deemed fraudulent on the part of the defendants, who knowingly issued it without specifying the names of the parties to, and the dates of, certain contracts, and asking for relief consequent on that declaration.

Buckley, J., found for the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed.

The appeals of the defendants Shepheard and Clayton were heard first.

Haldane, K.C., and Felix Cassel, for the defendants Shepheard and Clayton.—The defendants honestly believed that after the 10th of the October there was no legal liability binding the company. The maxim ignorantia juris neminem excusat, where jus equals the general law, has no application when you are construing an agreement: Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 W. R. 1049, L. R. 2 H. L. 149, especially per Lord Westbury at p. 170; Earl Beauchamp v. Winn, L. R. 6 H. L. 223, 21 W. R. Dig. 269. All that remained after the 10th of October was an honorary obligation, not a legal obligation: Taylor v. Brewer, 1 M. & Sel. 290; the dissenting judgment of Parke, B., in Bryant v. Flight, 5 M. & W. 114; Roberts v. Smith, 4 H. & N. 315, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 54; Loftus v. Roberts, 18 Times L. R. 532. This interpretation was also put upon the arrangement of the 10th of October by Craig, Bowden's nominee, in the letter of the 18th of October. Further, we say that the alleged omission is not material; that the plaintiff did not rely upon it; that the plaintiff has not suffered damage. The true test of materiality is whether an intending investor would have been deterred if that which was omitted was stated. What the prospectus should state is not ancient history, but the state of things at the time the prospectus is issued. The plaintiff in his evidence stated that he paid no particular attention to contracts. The judgment of Thesiger, L.J., in Sullivan v. Mitcalfe, 29 W. R. 181, 5 C. P. D. 455, at p. 460, shows what materiality is. Can a man knowingly issue a prospectus not specifying the date and parties to material contracts, when he does not believe in the existence of such contracts? Section 38 must be construed as referring to existing contracts.

Astbury, K.C., and J. Roskill, for the plaintiff.—Even assuming the rescinding contract left merely an honourable obligation, yet it was a subsisting contract and should have been disclosed: Bayley v. Homan, 3 Bing. N. C. 915. But the rescinding contract did not entirely wipe out the previous contract. The result of the evidence is that the directors were simply substituting a more fit for a less fit sum. Bowden clearly thought that his right to £7,500 had not been put an end to. There is clear evidence of damage. The assets did not equal the payments in. In the phrase "knowingly issue," knowingly does not refer to the law: Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R. 586, 2 C. P. D. 469. The defendants knew the facts; they took an opinion as to the law. They were bound to set out the facts.

Haldane, K.C., in reply.—The defendants are not liable under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890. They were advised by counsel that no further contracts need be stated. If this not "reasonable ground," what is? The real case to meet is section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. The words of Thesiger, L.J., in Sullivan v. Mitcalfe, 5 C. P. D., at p. 460, are important for the purpose of showing what is the kind of contract which comes under the section. The defendant is entitled to put a wrong construction on an obscure document, although he is not excused for ignorance of the general law. The defendants are entitled to show the state of their minds; they did not knowingly issue. In any event the evidence shows that the plaintiff did not trouble himself about the contract.

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Leigh Clare, for the defendant Speak.—After the 10th of October Bowden would never have sued for the services he rendered; he had no legal right. Assuming the contracts had been set out they would never have operated to deter the plaintiff. The section must be confined to material contracts in the sense of contracts material to deter. It is impossible to say on the evidence that the plaintiff would have been deterred: Sullivan v. Mitcalfe. It is material to find whether the particular plaintiff was affected: Baty v. Keswick, 50 W. R. 15. The plaintiff must come into court with something more than a technical right.

Astbury, K.C.—The result of the resolution of the 10th of October was that something material did remain. It has never been anywhere suggested that material means anything except what a man might like to read and weigh before taking shares. The directors at the time of the cancellation recognized Bowden's services. They agreed that whatever he had earned he should be paid. The fact that a man was once a promoter does not prevent the company from subsequently entering into contracts with him. A contract between a promoter and an independent board of directors for remuneration of services performed at request is good unless those services are such as he is bound to perform qua promoter. After the 1st of October Bowden had a claim, not to a quantum meruit, but to a definite sum. On the 10th of October he was put in the same position which he would have had if the contract of the 21st of September had never been made. The resolution of the 10th of October amounted to a contract of cancellation and a contract of resuscitation of a common law right, and this affirmative part should have been put in the prospectus. It is never a protection for a man to say he does not know the law except in a matter of private right.

COLLINS, M.R.—The first important document for our purposes is the letter of the 28th of September, 1898, addressed by Haddock, who purported to be trustee for the London and Northern Bank, to Craig, who was Bowden's nominee, undertaking to repay the amount of the deposit together with a £7,500 bonus for the loan, "your taking the risk of forfeiture." This is a somewhat remarkable contract which might be significant in the attitude of the buying bank having to go to the promoter for the deposit. On the 1st of October the contract of the 21st of September was ratified. There was here a complete legal obligation binding on the directors. What was the effect of the resolution of the 10th of October? In my opinion it was not intended by the parties to and did not get rid of the obligation of the 21st of September, except with regard to the amount of the promoter's remuneration. It left the arrangement with regard to the deposit intact. It did, in my opinion, get rid of the obligation on the part of the directors to pay the fixed sum of £7,500, but it recognized a right on the part of the promoter to receive some sum by way of remuneration. It admitted an obligation and left the amount to be determined.

It is said on the defendants' part that they acted on the advice of counsel, and that they did not "knowingly issue" in the words of the section. This involves their not knowing of any contract. Were they conscious or not that the rescission itself involved a contract? Mr. Shepheard said he was aware of this. If he knew of the contract and yet relied on the advise of counsel, this is no excuse. But as a matter of fact counsel was consulted only as to whether the original contract need appear, and not as to this particular resolution of the 10th of October.

Again, it was argued that the plaintiff could not succeed unless he could show that he would have been deterred from buying his shares if he had known of the existence of the contract. This is putting the case higher than the authorities warrant. Does the section provide this? The standard is this: Did the defendants knowingly or intentionally issue the prospectus omitting a contract of which they were aware? The judgment of Baggallay, L.J., in Sullivan v. Mitcalfe gives the real meaning of materiality. Mr. Astbury has pointed out that you are demanding impossibilities of the court if you ask us to find whether a person would have been influenced by a contract which he had never seen. A person in considering whether he should take shares is entitled to have every material element clearly put before him, and the section deems it fraudulent if any material contract is not put before him. Coleridge, L.J., in Twycross v. Grant, 2 C. P. D., at p. 483, points out how important it is that an applicant for shares should know what sort of people are to have the control of his money. Buckley, J., has stated his view of the law in a manner which is absolutely sound. I cannot doubt but that this contract and its attendant circumstances would be material factors, and the learned judge who saw the witnesses was of the same opinion.

The last point urged by the defendants was that there are no damages. The fact that the company had gone into liquidation, in the words of the learned judge, does throw an after-light on the matter. Were the assets equivalent to the money paid at the time the money was paid? There was sufficient to satisfy the learned judge that substantial damage had been done. It is not necessary to consider the liability of the defendants under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890. The plaintiff's cause of action rests on section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and is fully established.

ROMER, L.J.—After what has been said by the Master of the Rolls I may be brief. I need only refer to the case of Shepheard, because if he cannot succeed the other defendants cannot. I reluctantly say the appeal must be dismissed. As I have frequently had occasion to say before, section 38 operates often very harshly, and I have been trying to find if there is any means by which Mr. Shepheard can escape. I am sorry to say that I have not succeeded. After the 1st of October, 1898, there was a contract binding Mr. Bowden and the company of a very material kind. Mr. Bowden had found the deposit, although he was not bound by any of his duties as promoter to find it; and the company had thrown upon Mr. Bowden the whole risk of forfeiting that deposit, although they were prepared to take the benefit. Not unnaturally there had to be some counter obligation. Mr. Bowden assented to the resolution of the 1st of October, and that resolution was subsequently confirmed by the company, although I do not know that it needed any confirmation. Then came the meeting of the 10th of October, the result of which is shown by the resolution entered on the minutes. I need not consider why the ambiguous letter of the 18th was drawn up. The resolution itself is sufficient, and it was subsequently confirmed on the 20th of October, when Shepheard and Bowden were present. I cannot myself have any doubt but that it constitutes a contract of a substantial material kind. It was a contract to rescind a previous contract in part. It left something still subsisting. It bound the company to carry out its assurance, and at the proper time to honourably meet the right of Mr. Bowden to be remunerated for introducing the Leeds Bank and running the risk of forfeiting the deposit. It is impossible to hold that the company were at liberty to say that Bowden was to receive no remuneration whatever for the risk he ran. It was, to my mind, a distinct and important contract, and one which under section 38 ought to have been set forth. It was a contract which, if its terms had been described, might have influenced the plaintiff and induced him not to take shares. It was said by counsel that it would not affect any intending subscriber to know that valuable services were to be properly remunerated. But an intending subscriber might in my view most certainly object to the additional remuneration of a promoter who was already to get £20,000. The last question is whether Mr. Shepheard can excuse himself by referring to his good faith and a certain belief which he had. On consideration I do not think he can. I cannot think he is excused merely because he says he did not appreciate the legal effect of circumstances which he knew. Still less can he avail himself of the advice of counsel. The prospectus must for these reasons be treated as "fraudulent" within the section.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is with reluctance that I am compelled to treat as fraudulent what is really not fraudulent, but section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, is now repealed, and a case like this will probably not occur again. I think it is difficult to imagine that any contract between company and promoter can be otherwise than material, and a contract is material if it is of such a nature that a reasonable investor might require to consider it before deciding whether to take shares or not. As to the company's liability to pay a proper sum to Bowden, we know that as a matter of fact the latter did sue the company on the contract, and did obtain judgment for £1,500.

SMITHERS v. WALLIS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Employment in agriculture—Partly or occasionally employed in other work—Liability of employer for accident which happened at a distance from his premises—Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, and 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 22), ss. 1 (i.) (3), 2.

A workman employed in agriculture is not debarred from compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1900, because the accident did not happen "in, on, or about" his employer's premises, as those words of limitation in the Act of 1897 are not applicable to the Act of 1900.

Appeal by the employer from an award in favour of the applicant made by the learned judge of the Aldershot County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1900.

The appellant, Mr. Wallis, lived at the "Cedars," Aldershot, and he had engaged Smithers, the husband of the applicant, as his handy man to look after his garden, which was about three quarters of an acre in extent, and to exercise and groom his horses.

On the 17th of February, 1902, Smithers was driving his master's horse in a trap to give it exercise when the trap collided with another vehicle and Smithers was thrown out and killed. The accident occurred about three and a-half miles from the "Cedars."

The widow claimed compensation, and the learned county court judge found as a fact that Smithers was employed "mainly in agricultural, but partly in other work" within the meaning of section 1 (3) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1900, and that the employer was liable, though the accident did not occur "on or in or about the premises." He accordingly made an award in favour of the applicant for £171 12s.

The employer appealed.

The following sections of the Act of 1900 are material: Section 1 (i.) enacts that "from and after the commencement of this Act the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, shall apply to the employment of workmen in agriculture by any employer who habitually employs one or more workmen in such employment." By sub-section 3, "where any workman is employed by the same employer mainly in agricultural, but partly or occasionally in other work, this Act shall apply also to the employment of workmen in such other work. The expression 'agriculture' includes horticulture, forestry, and the use of land for any purpose of husbandry, inclusive of the keeping or breeding of live stock, poultry, or bees, and the growth of fruit and vegetables."

By section 2, "this Act . . . shall be read as one with the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897."

Ruegg, K.C. (G. T. Sills and H. P. St. Gerrans with him), for the employer.—There is only one question of law raised by this appeal—namely, whether the Act applies if the accident does not occur on, in, or about the employer's premises. The appellant contends that as the accident happened some three and a-half miles away from the "Cedars," the master is not responsible. And for this reason. By section 2 of the Act of 1900, the provisions of the earlier Act of 1897 are to be read into it. Therefore the limitation in section 7 of the Act of 1897, that the accident must occur "on or in or about" the employer's premises, must be given effect to when construing the extending Act, in the same way as if the claim for compensation was being brought under the Act of 1897. The intention of the Legislature was to place workmen engaged in agriculture in the same position as, but in no better position than, men engaged in employments specified in section 7 of the earlier Act. The word "agriculture" is defined as including the use of land for certain purposes, and this localizes the employment in "agriculture" to employment in a certain locality—namely, "in or on or about" the land of the employer. No doubt the word "about" must have a reasonable meaning given to it, and its precise limits would vary in each case. But as the accident occurred in this instance between three and four miles away, to hold that it happened "about" the employer's premises would be to strike out this condition altogether, and would, in the case of a workman employed in agriculture, render the master liable for every accident to one of his employees so long as it happened to him while engaged in the master's business.

Herbert Reed, K.C., and D. Stephens, for the widow, were not heard.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion the contention of the appellant here, that as the workman was not at the time of the accident "on or in or about" the employer's premises, the employer was not liable under the Act, is untenable in face of the plain words of the Act of 1900. Section 1 of that Act makes applicable to the case of a man mainly employed in agriculture but partly or occasionally in other work the benefit of the earlier Act, and there are no words limiting the application of the Act to the employment in any particular located area. Having regard to the necessity in an agricultural employment of the workman being engaged elsewhere than on his employer's premises, as, for example, in driving cattle or taking produce to market, it would obviously defeat the object of the Act if we were to attempt to limit the language used and to exclude a workman employed in agriculture from the benefit of the Act if he met with an accident when away from his master's premises in the course of his employment. For these reasons I think the benefit of the Act of 1900 extends and is meant to extend to accidents to workmen employed in agriculture though the accident does not occur on or in or about his employer's premises, because it would be unreasonable to read the limitation in the Act of 1897 into the Act of 1900, for the reasons I have given.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

MATHEW, L.J. — I also think this appeal fails. The contention of the appellant amounts to a proposal that we should alter the language of section 1 (i.) of the Act of 1900 and read the sub-section thus: The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, shall apply to the employment "on or in or about the premises of the employer" of workmen in agriculture by any employer who habitually employs one or more workmen in such employment. Why should those words "on or in or about the premises of the employer" be introduced into the section? The Legislature did not think them necessary or they would have put them there. The object with which the Act of 1900 was passed is clear. It was passed for the purpose of protecting workmen employed in agricultural work in the ordinary course of their employment, and that kind of work included clearly employment often of necessity at a distance from their employer's premises.

HOW v. EARL WINTERTON. (a.)

Trustee—Real estate—Accounts—Disallowance—Payment of voluntary school rate—"Fair and reasonable" payment.

A payment of a mere voluntary subscription by a trustee cannot be allowed in his account, but where such payment, although in one sense voluntary, is made reasonably and in the honest belief that it will benefit the estate, either as saving a future compulsory payment of larger amount or as being fairly and reasonably necessary under the circumstances of the estate, it may be allowed.

Summons to vary certificate.

The plaintiff was an annuitant under the will of Mary Rabett (deceased), and the defendant was, as far as regarded the real estate of the testatrix, the sole surviving trustee of her will.

By an order made in the action on the 4th of March, 1896, an account was directed of (amongst other things) the rents and profits of the real estate of the testatrix received by the defendant during or in respect of a term of fourteen years created by the will, and which term had then expired. In an account lodged in chambers by the defendant in pursuance of the order, he included upon the disbursement side the following item—viz.: "Proportion of one year's school rate as above, due on the 1st of August, 1889, £1 5s."

This sum had been paid by the defendant in respect of the real estate of the testatrix as a voluntary school rate, and the master disallowed the payment.

A summons to vary the master's certificate, made under the said order, raised (amongst other questions) the propriety of the disallowance in question.

M. Romer, for the plaintiff.

KEKEWICH, J., stated the facts, and continued as follows: It is true that this payment was made to support a school not provided by the state, and so not supportable out of the rates. In one sense, therefore, the payment is a mere voluntary subscription. If it were that alone it could not be allowed to stand, but it is to be observed that it is a payment which, unlike other voluntary subscriptions, is not ascertained in amount by the generosity of the donor, but by an appeal to the rate books; moreover, there was this very strong argument to be met by the trustee—viz., that if he did not pay a small sum as a voluntary subscription there might be as a result partly of his omission a board school with both a higher and a compulsory subscription. The trustee may have come to the honest conclusion that if he did not pay this sum of £1 5s. he might subsequently be compelled to pay some larger sum, so that his payment of the smaller sum was in the nature of a compromise, and it is not suggested that the amount paid was in itself an unfair amount; the payment if made upon that footing seems to me to be justifiable. Again, I think the trustee might possibly have included it in his costs, charges, and expenses, if, having regard to the exigencies of the estate and the customs obtaining with respect to it, the payment was a reasonable and proper one. I prefer, however, to rest my judgment upon the former ground, and I order that the master's certificate be varied by allowing the payment.

Summons.

This was a summons under the Settled Land Acts, 1882-1890, raising the questions whether on a resettlement of estates trustees of the compound settlement should be appointed trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts by the court or by the settlors, and whether the court would appoint the solicitor to the tenant for life as one of such trustees. The facts of the case were as follows:

By a settlement made the 23rd of December, 1863, on the marriage of Mr. H. H. Spenser and Miss Kelson, certain freehold estates were limited to the use of the said husband for life and to the use that Miss Kelson should receive £500 per annum by way of jointure as therein mentioned and subject thereto to the use of trustees on trust to raise £5,000 as portions for younger children, and subject thereto to the use of the first and other sons of H. H. Spenser in tail male with remainders over. In 1898 the estate tail was duly barred by the applicant, H. A. H. Spenser, the eldest son of the said marriage; and by an indenture dated the 19th of April, 1898, being a settlement made on the marriage of the applicant, to which the three persons who at that time were trustees of the settlement of 1863, and also H. H. Spenser, H. A. H. Spenser, and his intended wife, were parties, the estates were limited to the use of the said H. H. Spenser in restoration and by way of confirmation of his prior life estate, with remainder to H. A. H. Spenser for life, with remainder over. And it was thereby declared that the trustees of the settlement of 1863 should be the trustees under the settlement made by these presents, and also under the compound settlement, if such there be, made by the settlement of 1863, the disentailing deed, and by these presents, "for all the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the Acts amending the same."

H. H. Spenser died in 1901, and the jointress was still alive.

The applicant, H. A. H. Spenser, was the tenant for life, and was desirous of selling portions of the estate, but doubts were raised as to whether the trustees of the compound settlement had been properly appointed trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts. He accordingly asked that the existing trustees should be appointed trustees of the compound settlement if the court was of opinion that the existing trustees were not already trustees of such compound settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

One of the trustees was the solicitor of the tenant for life.

Potts, for the applicant.—A settlor in such a deed of re-settlement has no power to appoint trustees of the compound settlement. They ought to be appointed by the court. It will be a great convenience for the applicant if the solicitor is appointed trustee. The special circumstances take the case out of the general rule.

In re Mundy and Roper's Contract, 47 W. R. 226, [1899] 1 Ch. 275; In re The Earl of Stamford, 44 W. R. 249, [1896] 1 Ch. 288; and Key and Elphinstone's Precedents (7th ed.), vol. 1, p. 653, were relied on.

J. G. Wood, for the trustees.—The trustees have been validly appointed under the Settled Land Act, s. 2, sub-section 8.

BYRNE, J.—In this case there is a settlement created by, and consisting of, three documents. The Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2, sub-section 1, provides that "any instrument or number of instruments under or by virtue of which any land stands limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession creates or is for the purpose of this Act a settlement." The use of the words "creates or is" rather, I think, points to the word "settlement" as including what is effected by the documents, but it also clearly means the documents making the settlement. In the events which have happened in this case there still remains the limitation of the jointure and a portions charge secured by a term of years. In the last of these deeds the parties to it have purported to appoint trustees for the purposes of the compound settlement, and the parties desire to know if these trustees have been validly appointed, because if they have been, the court has no jurisdiction to appoint new trustees. The Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2, sub-section 8, in defining the trustees of the settlement, provides that "the persons, if any, for the time being who are by the settlement declared to be trustees thereof for the purposes of this Act are for the purposes of this Act trustees of the settlement." Section 38 provides for the appointment of trustees by the court if there are no trustees, or in any other case if it is expedient so to do.

It is argued that because the three deeds constitute one settlement the appointment is good. In this case I do not think that they are validly appointed. I want to guard myself by saying that I am dealing only with the facts of this case, and I am not attempting to lay down a general definition for all cases. I am not going to say that the appointment of trustees for the purpose of the compound settlement in one or perhaps two or three or four documents may not under some circumstances be an effectual appointment; but in the present case I have only an appointment contained in the last of the documents forming the settlement, to which document some of the beneficiaries interested under the settlement are not parties and are not bound by its provisions, and it appears to me under these circumstances I should be wrong in saying that the declaration contained in the re-settlement of 1898 amounts to a declaration by "the settlement" of the persons who are to be "trustees thereof for the purposes of this Act" within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 8. I express no opinion about the precedents referred to, as they do not appear to have been followed in the present case. I therefore have jurisdiction to make an appointment of trustees and am willing to do so.

The remaining question is whether it was proper to appoint as one of the trustees the solicitor for the tenant for life, and on that In re The Earl of Stamford, 56 L. T. Rep. 484, 35 W. R. Dig. 180, has been referred to, the result of which is that the court has undoubted jurisdiction, if it thinks, fit to appoint him; but it is not the course for the court to make such an appointment, although Stirling, J., did it in one case (Marquis of Ailesbury v. Lord Iveagh, [1893] 2 Ch. 345), and no doubt it would have been done again in other cases if strong reasons were shown that that would be more beneficial than another appointment. I have considered the question and I do not find sufficient advantages to be derived from the appointment in this case to induce me to depart from the rule down by the Court of Appeal in In re Kemp's Settled Estates, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 485. I think I ought to follow that rule and must therefore decline to appoint the solicitor of the tenant for life as one of the trustees. I will appoint the other two gentlemen trustees of the compound settlement trustees upon production of affidavits of fitness in the usual way.

MAPPIN BROTHERS v. LIBERTY & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Highway—New street—Ownership of soil—Adjoining owner—Presumption of ownership usque ad medium filum viæ—Rebutting evidence.

The owners of land abutting on a road or street are only presumed to own the land usque ad medium filum viæ in the absence of facts to disprove such presumption.

Land was taken by commissioners under an Act of Parliament for the purpose of making a new street, and the Act gave the commissioners power to lease the premises abutting on the new street not wanted for the purposes of the Act, but it was doubtful whether this gave the commissioners power to lease the soil of the street. The commissioners leased one of the houses to the plaintiff's predecessor, and in the lease the property was described as abutting on the new street.

Held, that the presumption that the soil of the adjoining street usque ad medium filum viæ passed with such lease was rebutted by the circumstances of the case, regard being had to the provisions of the Act and the terms of the lease.

The plaintiff, who traded under the name of Mappin Brothers, prayed for an injunction directing the defendant company to remove a tunnel which they had made in front of the plaintiff's house and to restore the ground to the state it was before the making of the tunnel. The plaintiff carried on business at 220, Regent-street, and the defendants carry on business at 218 and 222, Regent-street, on either side of the plaintiff's premises. These three houses are situated on the east side of Regent-street. By an Act of Parliament (53 Geo. 3, c. cxxi.), entitled "An Act for making a more convenient communication from Marylebone Park and the northern parts of the metropolis in the parish of St. Marylebone to Charing Cross within the liberty of Westminster, and for making a more convenient sewage for the same," the Commissioners for Woods and Forests were empowered to purchase certain lands described on a map deposited in the office of the commissioners, and they were authorized to make certain new streets, including Regent-street. In laying out any new street the commissioners had to provide the paving, lighting, and watching of it in the first instance, but the parish was to bear the future cost of doing these things. The commissioners were also among other things required to make a new sewer in Regent-street. The provisions as to paving, lighting, and watching the streets, were, however, repealed by an amending Act (56 Geo. 3, c. cxxviii.), which created a new body of paving commissioners who were authorized to pave and repair the streets referred to in the principal Act and in whom the property in the pavement rested. By section 34 the principal Act authorized the commissioners to sell and dispose of all or any part of the houses, buildings, lands, tenements, hereditaments of or belonging to his Majesty, his heirs and successors on the lines of the said streets and places respectively to be erected and built, altered, repaired or improved under or by virtue of this Act or which shall be so purchased or acquired as aforesaid and shall not be wanted for the purposes of this Act . . . and also to demise or lease, or previous to any demise or lease to enter into any contract or agreement for the demising or leasing, all or any part of the houses, buildings, lands, tenements, or hereditaments to be purchased, erected, built, altered, repaired, and improved under or by virtue of this Act." The section further provided that all conversions, exchanges, and leases made by the commissioners might be made according to the forms set forth in the schedule to the Act.

On the 11th of September, 1820, the commissioners entered into an agreement with one George Thompson to grant him a lease of 218 and 220, Regent-street—the new street not being then completed.

On the 7th of February, 1823, a lease of No. 220 was granted to nominees of Thompson for a term of ninety-nine years, the parcel being delineated in colour on a map drawn on the deed and described as "all that parcel of land situate . . . on the east side of a street now forming therein called or intended to be called Regent-street," and the lease also contained the following general words "and also all outhouses, buildings, yards, areas, vaults, cellars, sollars, ways, paths, passages, waters, watercourses, lights, easements, profits, privileges, advantages, emoluments, rights, numbers, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said piece or parcel of ground, messuage, or dwelling-house and premises hereby demised or every part thereof belonging or in any wise appertaining." The map or plan did not include any part of the soil of Regent-street, but as a matter of fact certain vaults underneath the street partly in front of 220 and partly in front of 222 were always held under this lease, though they were not referred to in the lease more specifically than in the general words.

The plaintiff now held this property under an underlease.

The leases of 218 and 222 were in similar form and were granted in 1822.

At the date of the agreement that part of Regent-street was not staked out but was completed before the lease of 220 was granted in 1823. The sewer was made before 1820.

The defendants denied that any part of the soil of Regent-street vested in the plaintiff, but alleged that it was in the Crown.

The Attorney-General was therefore added as defendant in order to determine this.

Hughes, K.C., and Dighton Pollock, for the plaintiff.—When there are no facts rebutting, the presumption is that anyone in possession of a plot of land adjoining a highway is in possession usque ad medium filum viæ (Doe v. Pearsey, 7 B. & C. 304, when you know nothing of the facts possession raises the presumption. In London and North-Western Railway v. Westminster Corporation, 50 W. R. 268, [1902] 1 Ch. 279, the presumption was relied upon, and again in Micklethwait v. Newlay Bridge Co., 33 Ch. D. 133, at p. 145, 35 W. R. Dig. 71, and in Berridge v. Ward, 10 C. B. N. S. 400, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 20; and in Lord v. Commissioners of Sydney, 7 W. R. 267, 12 Moo. P. C. 473. This last case shows that the presumption applies and must be followed in the case of a grant from the Crown as much as in any other case. The presumption applies in the case of a lease as much as in conveyance in fee: Haynes v. King, 42 W. R. 56, [1893] 3 Ch. 439. The presumption applies to houses in a town: In re White's Charities, Charity Commissioners v. Mayor, &c., of London, 46 W. R. 479, [1898] 1 Ch. 659 at p. 663; London and North-Western Railway v. Westminster Corporation. Leigh v. Jack, 28 W. R. 452, 5 Ex. D. 264, which may be depended on as rebutting the presumption is directly contrary to Micklethwait v. Newlay Bridge Co. In Marquis of Salisbury v. Great Northern Railway, 7, W. R. 75, 5 C. B. N. S. 174, the land conveyed was described by plan, and the land and the roadway were separately numbered on the plan. We leave the other side to prove that the presumption does not apply or is rebutted by the deposited plan.

Younger, K.C., G. Cave, and A. F. C. C. Luxmore, for the defendants, Liberty & Co. (Limited).—We are here to make good paragraph 1 of the defence, that no part of the soil of Regent-street was included in the lease of 220, or was at the date of the lease vested in the lessor, or is otherwise vested in the plaintiff, as having regard to surrounding circumstances there was no demise of the soil: Duke of Devonshire v. Pattinson, 20 Q. B. D. 263 at p. 273, 36 W. R. Dig. 217. Assuming the soil vested in the Crown, both the terms of lease and the powers of the commissioners rebut the suggestion that any of the soil of Regent-street passed. The terms of the lease rebut the presumption as the parcels state that it is part of a larger piece of ground: Cotton, L.J.'s, judgment in Micklethwait v. Newlay Bridge Co., 33 Ch. D. at p. 147, and Lopes, L.J., at p. 155. The present case is plainly within Leigh v. Jack and Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co., 23 W. R. 634, L. R. 10 Q. B. 203. Except in the case of Haynes v. King, there is no decision to show that the presumption applies to leaseholds. In Landrock v. Metropolitan Railway, [1886] W. N. 195, it was held that a conveyance in which houses and a street were numbered separately on the plan rebutted the presumption. This case was not cited in In re Whites' Charities.

Sir E. Carson, S.G., and F. Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—It has never been decided that where land has been taken by the Crown for a public purpose with obligations to be performed that the presumption that the soil passed ad medium filum viæ could by the granting of leases be made applicable to the Crown. The origin of the presumption shows that there is no application to the Crown: Doe v. Pearsey; Berridge v. Ward. The presumption does not apply to the case of a street first laid out by a newly-created authority: Rex v. Hatfield (Inhabitants), 4 Ad. & E. 156. Lord v. Commissioners of Sydney was commented on in Beckett v. Corporation of Leeds, 20 W. R. 454, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 421. There is no reason why the presumption should be made applicable to the Crown.

Hughes, K.C., in reply.—It is allowable to take into consideration circumstances known to both parties at the time of the conveyance. Here at the time of the conveyance of 220, Regent-street was made and named. Leigh v. Jack is really in my favour. We have been in occupation of the vaults in front of 220 for over eighty years; according to the defendant we have been trespassers.

JOYCE, J.—I suppose there is a presumption where persons own land by the side of a street that, in the absence of evidence or knowledge of what the real facts were, they must be taken to own the soil of the street usque ad medium filum viæ. But, of course, that presumption is displaced, or rather cannot be considered true, in a case where we have evidence and knowledge of all the facts as to the acquisition of the land. In the present case we have evidence, and we really know the history of what has taken place with reference to 220, Regent-street and the neighbourhood. The presumption which I have mentioned really has no application in the present case. Here we have the history, we have the Act of Parliament and the deposited plans, and we have the minutes of the commissioners. The plaintiff claims to be entitled to half the soil of Regent-street as it now stands under the lease of the 7th of February, 1823, of No. 220, Regent-street. That lease mentions Regent-street as a street then forming and called or intended to be called Regent-street. Now if any ordinary person —I mean a layman, not a lawyer—were to read through that lease from beginning to end I am sure it would never occur to him that that lease passed the ownership in any part of the soil of any part of Regent-street having regard to the way in which the parcels are described. The contention of the plaintiff can only be supported by recourse to another presumption of law which is thus stated in Elphinstone's Interpretation of Deeds, p. 179: "By the conveyance of land abutting on a highway . . . the primâ facie presumption of law, in the absence of evidence of ownership, is that . . . the soil of the road usque ad medium filum passes"; then Beckett v. Leeds Corporation is cited, and there are various illustrations of and exceptions to that rule mentioned in the following pages. In particular I observe that Blackburn, J., in his judgment in Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co. says that it has always been held enough to rebut the presumption where there was anything to show that it was not the intention to convey any part of the road.

The lease of the 7th of February, 1823, as I mentioned, speaks of Regent-street as "now forming"; but the contract for the lease was made some two years or so previously, and, as at present advised, I am of opinion that it is the date of the contract and not of the conveyance which must be referred to for the purpose of settling the rights of the parties with reference to this point; in support of which view I will refer to the analogous case before the Court of Appeal of Broomfield v. Williams, 45 W. R. 469, at p. 471, [1897] 1 Ch. 602, at p. 616, especially the judgment of Rigby, L.J. But one thing is clear, that this presumption may be rebutted by evidence of surrounding circumstances which lead to the inference that no part of the soil of the highway was intended to pass. As has been mentioned in the course of the argument, doubts have been expressed by various judges as to whether the presumption ever applies to houses in a town, and as to whether it applies to a building estate: as to that see Cotton, L.J.'s, judgment in Leigh v. Jack. The reason for the presumption is said to be founded on a supposition which is variously stated. In Doe v. Pearsey, Bayley, J., says: "The rule is founded on a supposition that the proprietor of the adjoining land at some former period gave up to the public for passage all the land between his inclosure and the middle of the road." But none of the suppositions upon which the reason is founded is consistent with the facts of this case.

Upon perusal of the Act and of the map, I am of opinion that the site of the moiety of Regent-street next to No. 220 was land wanted for the purposes of the Act. If I am right in that, section 34 does not confer upon the commissioners any power to sell that particular land. Upon the construction of the section I very much doubt whether there was power to demise it. I agree there is a difficulty as to that; but looking at the terms of the section, and looking also at the language and at the object of the Act, I very much doubt whether the commissioners had power to demise anything that was wanted for the purposes of the Act. But whether that be so or not, in my opinion there is not one single reason for their leasing the subsoil, particularly having regard to the provisions of the Act with reference to the roadway, and to the circumstances of the case, while on the other, to my mind, there are a thousand and one reasons against their doing anything of the kind. In my opinion the very least which could be said is that in the present case it would have been a very ill-advised thing to do, if indeed it would not have been most improper and possibly illegal, to demise the soil of the adjacent street.

In the view I take it is not necessary for me to decide whether a lease stands on the same footing as a grant, or whether a grant or lease from the Crown stands upon any other footing than a lease or grant by a private individual. I think that in the circumstances it is in the highest degree improbable that it should ever have been intended to demise or part with the site of the portion of the subsoil of Regent-street which the plaintiff claims. In short, if ever there was a case where it was to be inferred from the surrounding circumstances that it was not intended to pass the site of the moiety of the adjacent street, when the parcels in the demise are described as they are here by dimensions and by map, in my opinion this is the case.

The result is that, in my opinion, no part of the subsoil of what is now Regent-street was intended to be included or is comprised in the demise made by the lease of the 7th of February, 1823, and there must be a declaration to that effect.

GALLOWAY v. HOPE (a.)

Power—Determination—Intention of donor that power should continue—Absolute vesting of estate—Incapacity of person entitled.

The question as to when a power of sale given to trustees becomes extinguished is a question of the intention of the donor of the power. Accordingly, where the beneficial interest in trust property has vested absolutely, but a conveyance of the property from the trustees has not been called for, the trustees' power of sale continues to exist in every case where this appears to have been the intention.

The reversion to property, held by trustees upon trusts for a lunatic for his life and with wide discretionary powers, became vested in the lunatic.

Held, that, nevertheless, the trustees were entitled to exercise their power of sale.

This was a summons, taken out in the Liverpool District Registry, for the determination of the question to whom the proceeds of sale of certain real estate held by trustees belonged—i.e., whether they devolved as personalty or as realty. The determination of this question depended upon whether at the time of sale a power of sale given to the trustees by the will of the testator in the action was still subsisting.

By his will the testator gave all his real and personal estate to his executors upon trust, after the death of his daughter, in their discretion and of their uncontrollable authority to manage and administer his said estate, and to pay, apply, and expend the same, or so much thereof as they should think expedient, to or for the clothing, board, lodging, maintenance, and support, or otherwise for the personal and peculiar benefit of his grandchildren (notwithstanding the competency of their parent), during their lives and the life of the survivor, whether infant or adult, and whether competent or incompetent to give an acquittance or discharge for the same, at such time or times, and in such proportions and manner in all respects as his said executors should think most conducive to their comfort and convenience; and on the decease of the survivor of his said grandchildren upon certain trusts for their issue which were held void for remoteness. And he empowered his trustees at any time after his decease, and when they in their own discretion should consider necessary, to sell and convert his estate and effects into money.

The testator died in 1842 and his daughter died in 1846.

There were only two grandchildren, Robert Eden and Jane Eden, who were the children of the daughter named in the will and who were both born in the testator's lifetime. Jane Eden died in 1882 without having been married. Robert Eden survived her and died in 1902 without having married and intestate.

The trustees sold a part of the real estate before the death of Jane Eden, and a further part after her death, but during the life of Robert Eden. The question in the summons related to the proceeds of sale of the latter part.

It was admitted that on the death of Jane Eden the reversion in the trust property vested absolutely in Robert Eden as the testator's heir-at-law, the ultimate trusts having failed for remoteness, and that he could if of sound mind have called upon the trustees to convey the property to him.

Micklem, K.C., and Cann, for the legal personal representative of Robert Eden.—The question whether the power of sale determined at the death of Jane Eden, though Robert Eden had not called and could not (being a lunatic) call for the conveyance of the estate to him, is a question of the intention of the testator: Lantsbery v. Collier, 4 W. R. 826, 2 K. & J. 709; In re Cotton's Trustees and the School Board for London, 30 W. R. 610, 19 Ch. D. 624; and In re Lord Sudeley and Baines, 42 W. R. 231, [1894] 1 Ch. 334.

Eve, K.C., and Methold, for the heir-at-law.—The general rule is that a power is extinguished when the purposes for which it was created have ceased (Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), p. 32, and Wheate v. Hull, 17 Ves. 80), and it must be taken to have ceased when a life estate coalesces with an absolute reversion in fee: Wolley v. Jenkins, 5 W. R. 281, 23 Beav. 53. There is only one exception—namely, that it may be exercised within a reasonable time when it is necessary to sell for purposes of division: Peters v. Lewes and East Grinstead Railway Co., 29 W. R. 422, 18 Ch. D. 429. Saunders v. Vautier, Cr. & Ph. 240, shows that directions for maintenance and accumulation after twenty-one will not prevent an absolute vesting at that age.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—In my opinion the power of sale, given to the trustees by the testator's will, continued to exist after the death of Jane Eden. The cases of In re Cotton's Trustees and the School Board for London, 30 W. R. 610, 19 Ch. D. 624, and In re Lord Sudeley and Baines & Co., 42 W. R. 231, [1894] 1 Ch. 334, show that where parties who have become absolutely entitled have not put an end to the power by calling upon the trustees to convey the trust property to them it is a question of the testator's intention whether the power is to continue. In this case the testator plainly intended that the trust for the maintenance of Robert Eden should continue during his life, and that the power of sale should continue for the same time. The power was therefore well exercised, and the proceeds belong to the estate of Robert Eden as personal estate.

A court of summary jurisdiction has no power under section 2 of the Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, to order the destruction of copies of pirated music seized by a constable when they were being offered for sale, unless the person from whom the copies have been seized has been served with a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

This was a case stated by Curtis Bennett, Esq., metropolitan magistrate, sitting at Marylebone police-court, raising the question whether under section 2 of the Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, a magistrate could order the destruction of copies of pirated music on an ex parte application.

The case set out the following facts:

On the 3rd of October, 1902, an authorized agent of the appellants requested a constable in writing to seize the copies of music in question, they being then offered for sale in and along the Kentish Town-road by a person who gave his name and address. The constable thereupon seized the music, and informed the person from whom it was seized of the time when and place where further proceedings with reference to the seizure under the statute would be taken.

The music was produced in court on the following morning, and on behalf of the appellants the magistrate was asked, upon proof being tendered, that the copies in question were infringements of copyright, to proceed at once to make ex parte an order under section 2 of the Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, that the copies should be forfeited or destroyed, or otherwise dealt with. The person from whom the copies had been seized, was not, nor was anyone on his behalf, present in court when the application was made.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 51, subsection 3, enacted that "where in any future Act any act or thing other than the payment of a sum of money is required or authorized by an order of a court of summary jurisdiction to be done the Summary Jurisdiction Acts shall apply accordingly."

By section 50 of the same Act the expression "Summary Jurisdiction Acts" includes the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.

Section 34 of the same Act provided that "where a power is given by any future Act to a court of summary jurisdiction . . . of requiring any act or thing to be done . . . other than the payment of money, and no mode is prescribed of enforcing such requisition, the court may exercise such power by an order or orders."

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 1, enacted that "in all cases where a complaint shall be made to any justice or justices of the peace upon which he or they shall have authority by law to make any order . . . it shall be lawful for such justice or justices to issue his or their summons directed to such person stating shortly the matter of such complaint and requiring him to appear at a certain time and place . . . to answer the said complaint, provided that nothing herein contained shall oblige any justice to issue any such summons in any case where the application for any order of the justices is by law to be made ex parte."

Section 33 of the same Act extended its operations to the Metropolitan police courts and magistrates.

The Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, by s. 2 provides, that "if any person shall hawk . . . any pirated copy of any musical work, every such pirated copy may be seized by any constable, without warrant, on the request in writing of the apparent owner of the copyright, at the risk of such owner. On seizure of any such copies they shall be conveyed by such constable before a court of summary jurisdiction, and on proof that they are infringements of copyright shall be forfeited or destroyed or otherwise dealt with as the court may think fit."

The magistrate held that, there being no provision in the Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, that applications for orders under it could be made ex parte, such applications could only be made in accordance with the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and that the person whose property it was sought to confiscate should be duly summoned; and he accordingly declined to make any order.

The magistrate came to this conclusion on the grounds that the question to be decided under the statute was one which might prove to be a very difficult and debatable one—viz., whether or no the copies of the work so seized were in point of law and fact infringements of copyright or not, and that the person from whom they were seized should have an opportunity of negativing, if he were able, such infringement; and having regard to the cases of Reg. v. Totnes Union, 14 L. J. M. C. 148; Gill v. Bright, 20 W. R. 248, 41 L. J. M. C. 22; and White v. Redfern, 5 Q. B. D. 15, 49 L. J, M. C. 19 (decided before the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879), he considered that before he could make any order under section 2 of the Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, it was necessary that a summons in accordance with the Summary Jurisdiction Acts should first have been legally served upon the person "hawking, carrying about, selling, or offering for sale" the alleged pirated music, calling upon him to show cause why such music should not be "forfeited or destroyed or otherwise dealt with." In the event of no order being made he would be entitled to have the music redelivered to him.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate upon the above statement of facts came to a correct determination in point of law, and if not, what should be done in the premises.

Scrutton, K.C. (Herman Cohen with him), for the appellants.—We submit that the magistrate has power in a case like the present to make an order for the destruction of the music seized without the complainant being required to take out a summons, where to the satisfaction of the magistrate the defendant has had notice either from him or from the police constable of when and where proceedings will be taken before the magistrate. If a summons must be served on the hawker the effect would be to render the Act practically nugatory. The difficulty is that there is no machinery under the Act under which if the names and addresses of the hawkers are refused or are wrongly given the hawkers can be detained. There is no machinery providing for the manner in which the seized copies are to be dealt with. In this case the hawker gave his correct name and address. The Commissioner of Police has intimated that he will not allow the police offices or courts to be made warehouses for copies seized for an indefinite time; but, if the magistrate's view is upheld, these copies cannot be dealt with promptly, in the case of a hawker giving a wrong address, because a summons could not be served. Where a magistrate's order is to be made against a thing, the procedure under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts does not apply, and oral notice to attend the hearing is sufficient notice to the defendant. That is clear from White v. Redfern, for there, as here, the object of the Act under which proceedings were taken would be defeated if the order for the confiscation of unsound meat in the one case and of pirated music in the other had to wait until the defendant had been served with a summons. The Act of 1848 could not refer to procedure against a thing, because no such procedure was then known. Thomas v. Van Os, [1900] 2 Q. B. 448, 48 W. R. Dig. 121, is also an authority for this proposition.

H. Sutton (Robertson with him) supported the magistrate's decision.—It has been laid down again and again that no order can be made ex parte that affects the property of a person unless he has had an opportunity of being present and stating why the order should not be made. That is recognized in Gill v. Bright, and Reg. v. Davey, [1899] 2 Q. B. 301, 47 W. R. Dig. 89. The only exceptions to that rule arise under statutes where express power is given to the magistrate to act on an ex parte application, and are limited to cases where in the general interest of the public, the order must be made without delay. That is not the case here and the statute neither gives the magistrate such power by express words, nor is it to be assumed from the character of the offence that the Legislature intended a magistrate to have that power by implication. The magistrate, moreover, could not order the copies to be destroyed without proof that they were infringements, and no court could be satisfied with regard to any particular fact affecting the property any more than the liberty of a person, unless the court had given that person an opportunity of opposing the order. Even if the names and addresses of the hawkers were not known, there is no hardship on the owner of the copyright, because the magistrate would not allow the hawker to regain possession of the songs without coming before him; and, therefore, it is only reasonable that a summons should be taken out if the complainant desires the copies destroyed.

Scrutton replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case raises a very important point, and it has been strenuously urged that this court ought to depart from a well-known principle of law, because, if we do not do so here, the object of the Act would be defeated. I hope that it will be quite clear from what I am about to say that I do not at all dissent from the view that if it were a necessary implication from an Act without any express words to that effect that any well-known principle should be departed from, we must act upon that necessary implication in the same way as the court would feel it their duty to act upon express words in the statute they were construing. It is also true that there are cases in which it has been recognized that ex parte proceedings might be taken, and ex parte orders made, although it is a principle that has been recognized for many years that the rights of persons in property are not to be affected by legal process without notice of those proceedings being given them. Numerous cases might be cited in support of this proposition, but perhaps Gill v. Bright, which was referred to during the argument, is as good an example as any. In that case liquors were kept for unlawful sale, and there was no reference to special procedure, but Lush, J., said, "It is quite clear that before the property of the appellant was forfeited the justices should have given him an opportunity of being heard; common sense and justice require that this should be so." As I before said, of course there are cases in which it has been held that by necessary implication ex parte proceedings might be taken and ex parte orders made. An instance of that is to be found in White v. Redfern, where a summons was not held necessary before an order could be made for the destruction of meat not fit for human consumption, and it is clear when that case is read that the decision was right in recognition of the principle of the necessity for the immediate destruction of unwholesome food exposed for sale. But, speaking generally, the authorities show that ex parte proceedings affecting rights in property are not to be allowed in the absence of express directions or necessary implication. The question here is, does this Act imply that the magistrate may make an order for the destruction of the music exposed for sale without summoning the person before him. In the view I take of the section it is no part of the implication of the section that the magistrate has power to act ex parte. The Act undoubtedly goes a very long way in the direction of interfering with the rights of property, because by section 2 it permits a constable to seize this property without a warrant, not under an order of a stipendary magistrate or a court, but at the request in writing of the apparent owner of the copyright or of his agent thereunto authorized in writing. Although the Act does go very far, the court nevertheless must not put a strained construction on the perfectly clear words of a section, when the doing so would cause the departure from a well-known principle of law. One great object of the Act was to get these pirated musical works taken off the streets at the request of the owner of the copyright. This privilege placed him in a better position than many other people whose rights are being infringed. I think it is material to notice that the second part of section 2 is substantially the same as the concluding words at the end of section 1. Then the question arises, is it a necessary implication from that clause that the magistrate may act ex parte and deprive the hawker of his property, the issue being one that might involve very nice questions as to whether there was an infringement of the copyright or not. Section 2 provides that if any person shall hawk or sell or offer for sale pirate music, it may be seized, and on proof that the copies seized are infringements they shall be forfeited, destroyed, or otherwise dealt with. In my opinion we cannot take the view that the words of the section give the magistrates power to act ex parte and make an order for the destruction of the music. The Act went further than mere hawking, for it deals with selling and offering for sale. It was argued that unless this strained construction was put on the section, and unless we saw fit to depart from the rule that an ex parte order affecting the rights of a person not before the court in respect of his property ought not to be made, the Act must become one of no practical value, because in many cases persons would not give their names and addresses, or even if they did, in many instances there might be a difficulty in serving them with a summons where these were given. I think this case is directly met by section 51 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, and I do not think it is necessary for me to make special reference to the other Summary Jurisdiction Acts. In my opinion, the word "person" in section 1 of the Act of 1848 must have a wider meaning than "a person who was to be ordered to do something," but, as I before said, I do not think it necessary to consider that further. On the other hand, section 51 (3) of the Act of 1879 enacts that where in any future Act any act or thing other than the payment of a sum of money is required or authorized by an order of a court of summary jurisdiction to be done, the Summary Jurisdiction Acts shall apply accordingly. So again section 34 of the Act of 1879 provides that "where a power is given by any future Act to a court of summary jurisdiction of requiring any act or thing to be done other than the payment of money, and no mode is prescribed of enforcing such requisition, the court may exercise such power by an order." Reading those sections, how can we hold that by implication a summons is not necessary in the case before us. It seems to me we ought to apply the principle of law laid down by Lush, J., in Gill v. Bright. Mr. Scrutton saw the difficulty, and he did not contend that the magistrate could directly act ex parte. He attempted to get over the difficulty by saying that because the constable had told the person whose songs were taken of the time and place at which the matter would be dealt with that that was sufficient, although, as was the case, that person decided not to be present when the case was called on. In one sense no doubt that was giving up the contention that the court by implication could make an order ex parte. It seems to me that it would be most dangerous if we were to hold in this case that the defendant must be satisfied with such a notice as the constable chose to give, and on receiving that notice must be treated as if he had been served with a summons to appear before the magistrate. In that case he might appear and contest the statement of the constable and take the point that a notice of the proceedings before the magistrate had not properly been given him. For this reason I cannot bring myself to hold that a notice by the constable can be sufficient. The conclusion I have come to is that in this case the magistrate came to a right decision, and that while that part of the Act which protects the copyright owner by having the goods taken off the streets without the necessity and delay of first applying for a summons is applicable, the other part of the Act, providing for the destruction of the pirated music after it has been seized, gives the magistrate power only to make the necessary order for its destruction after a summons has been duly served.

East London Waterworks v. Charles, 42 W. R. 702, [1894] 2 Q. B. 730, explained.

At a petty sessions held at the Guildhall, in the borough and county of Southampton, on the 13th of February, 1902, there was heard and determined before four of the justices of peace in and for the said borough and county, an information and complaint preferred on the 31st January, 1902, by John Arthur Russell, the respondent, against Frank Henty Elliot and Walter Pearson Elliot, the appellants, charging the appellants that they had wilfully not paid and refused to pay the sum of £3 3s. 9d., being charges for water supplied by meter for the quarter ending the 5th of June, 1901, by the urban sanitary authority of the said borough and county under the Public Health Act, 1875, although the same had been duly demanded in writing more than fourteen days before the date when the said information and complaint was laid.

At the hearing it was proved that the respondent was one of the collectors of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the county borough of Southampton, acting by the council as the urban sanitary authority; and that from the 2nd of April, 1896, water had been supplied to the appellants for trade purposes under a form dated the 2nd of April, 1896, at the price of 8d. per 1,000 gallons, with a provision for a minimum charge of 5s. per quarter.

On the 16th of March, 1901, the town clerk of Southampton sent to the appellants the following letter:

"I beg to inform you that my council have adopted new terms and conditions for the supply of water by meter for trade, manufacturing, and other than domestic purposes (copy whereof I send to you herewith) which will come into force on the 1st proximo. Should you on and after that date require a supply of water for any of the above-mentioned purposes, it will be necessary for you to fill in and sign the application form annexed to the copy terms and conditions, and return same forthwith to the Waterworks Engineer, 18, French-street, otherwise it will be assumed that you no longer require such supply after the 13th instant."

On the 21st of March, 1901, the appellant signed and returned to the waterworks engineer applications requesting a supply of water by meter, according to the aforesaid terms and conditions. These applications were agreed to by the authority.

By clause 15 of the agreement it was provided that the minimum charge for a supply of water by meter to the appellants' premises should be the amount which would be levied upon such premises if the same were supplied only for domestic purposes.

By clause 7 all charges for water were to be paid quarterly.

By clause 21 the corporation, in case of non-compliance with the terms of the agreement, were empowered to cut off the supply without notice and without prejudice to their right to recover any penalties which they were legally entitled to recover.

On the 18th of August, 1901, a demand in writing was made by the borough council upon the appellants for the water supplied during the quarter ending the 5th of June, 1901.

The appellants neglected to comply with the demand; and the present information was laid on the 31st of January, 1902.

The amount claimed by the respondent on behalf of the corporation was £3 3s. 9d., and was in respect of water supplied to the appellants for trade purposes from the 21st of March to the 5th of June, 1901, and was calculated at the minimum charge specified in clause 15 of the agreement, and was greater than would have been payable had the same been calculated under the form dated the 2nd of April, 1896.

At the hearing of the summons it was contended on behalf of the appellants that the aforesaid signed forms did not under the circumstances amount to an agreement by the appellants to pay any minimum charge differing from that provided for by the form of the 2nd of April, 1896; and that the time when the subject-matter of the information and complaint arose was some day in June, 1901, and that such information and complaint having only been preferred on the 31st of January, 1902, had not been laid within six calendar months from the date on which the subject-matter of the said information and complaint arose, and that the justices therefore had no jurisdiction to hear the same.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the town clerk's letter and the said signed forms amounted to a new agreement, and that the matter of the information and complaint arose on the 18th of August, 1901, and that the justices had jurisdiction.

The justices determined both contentions in favour of the respondent, and ordered that the appellants should pay the said sum of £3 3s. 9d. and 6s. costs.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a right decision in point of law.

S. H. Emanuel, for the appellants.—The sum claimed is not a "rate made under this Act" within the meaning of section 256 of the Public Health Act, 1875. Further, that section does not apply to the recovery of water rates; their recovery is specially provided for by sections 56 and 57. Section 256 applies to general district rates. The sum claimed is a water rent payable under the agreement entered into between the parties, and by virtue of section 56 the urban authority have the same power for recovering such rent as they have for recovering a water rate, but that does not make it a water rate. The authority can enforce this water rent by stopping the supply if the terms of the agreement are not observed, and in addition to this remedy they have the powers conferred by the Waterworks Clauses Acts, and a demand is not necessary to recover water rates under those Acts: East London Waterworks v. Kyffin, [1895] 1 Q. B. 55, 43 W. R. Dig. 190. Moreover, the justices had no jurisdiction to entertain the complaint because a claim by a water company being a complaint within section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, the summons must be taken out within six months from the time when the matter of complaint arose: East London Waterworks v. Charles, 42 W. R. 702, [1894] 2 Q. B. 730. That was not done here. In the present case the matter of complaint arose when the sum claimed became due, which is when the water was supplied, which at the latest was in June, 1901. The summons is therefore out of time. East London Waterworks v. Kyffin is to be distinguished from this case.

Llewellyn Williams (Temple Cooke with him), for the respondent.—The decision of the justices was right. The matter of complaint arose when the appellants failed to pay the rate demanded under section 256; the six months therefore begins to run from that time. A demand and a refusal are necessary before the matter of complaint can arise: Labalmondiere v. Addison, 1 Ell. & Ell. 41, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 55. Sections 56, 57, and 256 of the Public Health Act, 1875, must be read together. The local authority were entitled to take proceedings under section 256, as that section applies to the recovery of water rates or charges as well as to the recovery of other rates.

S. H. Emanuel, in reply, referred to Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Investment Building Society, 38 W. R. 85, 24 Q. B. D. 1.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The sole point we have to consider in this case is, whether or not the summons was taken out too late, so that the proceedings could not be entertained, having regard to the six months' limitation of section 11 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (Jervis's Act). The material dates are these. There was an agreement between the appellants and the corporation signed in March, 1901, which provided for the payment of all water charges quarterly, and gave the corporation the alternative of either charging according to the number of gallons supplied to the appellants, or of charging on a minimum of the annual value of the premises instead, if the charge for the number of gallons supplied did not exceed that minimum.

In this case the corporation demanded £3 3s. 9d. for water supplied during the quarter ending the 5th of June, 1901, which charge was the minimum, and was based upon the annual value. I do not wish to decide this case upon what I may call general principles by considering the question whether or not the actual amount due or claimed was known to the appellant. I have great doubt upon that point because the facts are not sufficiently stated. If the matter came to be investigated I think in all probability it would turn out to be similar to those cases which were referred to by Charles, J., in East London Waterworks v. Kyffin, where it was uncertain whether the person charged knew the actual amount he was going to be sued for. I think it is by no means clear it would not turn out to be one of those cases, so that the doctrine of Labalmondiere v. Addison would apply. I do not decide it upon that ground, because I have not the facts before me, and I must not be taken as expressing any opinion upon that question, which can be raised when the facts are properly stated.

In this case there is one plain ground upon which we ought to decide against the appellants.

There was a demand made upon the 18th of August, 1901, and there was an information laid on the 31st of January, 1902, clearly treating the matter as being a claim for money due and claimed under the authority of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The summons taken out which referred to the information that had been laid, was a summons for default of payment during fourteen days after demand. The question is whether that was a proceeding which could be taken. If it was, then the proceeding before the magistrates was a proceeding under section 256 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for non-payment within fourteen days after demand. It was contended for the appellants that that cannot be relied upon by the respondent because the provisions of sections 56 and 57 preclude section 256 from applying. Section 56 provides that "where a local authority supply water to any premises they may charge in respect of such supply a water rate to be assessed on the net annual value of the premises ascertained in the manner by this Act prescribed with respect to general district rates; moreover, they may enter into agreements for supplying water on such terms as may be agreed on between them and the persons receiving the supply, and shall have the same powers for recovering water rents or other payments accruing under such agreements as they have for recovering water rates." Section 57 incorporates a number of provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, and amongst them provisions "with respect to the payment and recovery of water rates"; and the result of the incorporation of those provisions seems to me to be that the water rate charged by the local authority does become a rate made under the Act of 1875. It is perfectly true that there are the special remedies of cutting off the water, certain rights of charging, and certain rights of inspection, breaking up the roads, and other things which are also adapted to this Act by virtue of the incorporation of the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act; but the rate does still seem to me to come within the words "a rate made under this Act," within the meaning of section 256. It is not the less a rate made under this Act because it is enforceable by virtue of certain provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act which are incorporated. If that be so, I do not see why section 256 of the Act does not apply. It provides that, "if any person assessed to any rate made under this Act by any urban authority fails to pay the sum when due and for the space of fourteen days after the same has been lawfully demanded in writing," then the magistrates may summon the defaulter to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction. It is to that state of things we have to apply section 11 of Jervis's Act, which enacts that "in all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint or laying any such information in the Act or Acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made and such information shall be laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose."

Upon the face of this proceeding here, it was a proceeding in respect of the appellants' failure to pay within fourteen days after demand. That seems to me to have been the matter of the complaint which arose. If that be so, the matter of complaint did not arise until the 18th of August, 1901, and these proceedings were in time.

I only desire to say I do not consider that the case of East London Waterworks v. Kyffin in any way conflicts with this, nor do I think that the court in that case intended to lay down any such general principle as that contended for on behalf of the appellants—namely, that no demand under any circumstances is necessary. If the language of my brother Mathew is looked at, it will be seen that he points out in that case that the dispute between the parties had been known some time, and the whole point was whether there was a necessity for a formal notice before the man could be summoned before the magistrate; but I do not understand him as laying down the proposition that, under no circumstances is any demand necessary before the time begins to run. I only say that, because in the argument before us that case was used by counsel for supporting a proposition larger than I think the decision was intended to apply to. For these reasons I think the magistrates were quite right in saying that these proceedings were taken in time.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to add one word, and that is that the head-note in the report of East London Waterworks v. Charles is erroneous and incomplete, because it makes it appear that the decision was that the six months' limitation must be from the time of the debt becoming due. There is nothing of the kind in the judgment to that effect. The facts were that the six months had elapsed since the demand was made, and if the head-note had been complete Mr. Emanuel would have known it had no application whatever to this case.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion.

"THE DUC D'AUMALE." (a.)

Practice — Ship — Collision — Action in personam— Service of writ out of jurisdiction — Foreign co-defendants—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1.

Where a collision occurred outside British territorial waters between a British steamship and a French sailing sloop, which was in tow of a British tug, and the owners of the British steamship commenced proceedings in personam in England against the owners of the French vessel and the owners of the tug, the vessel having been taken to a French port,

Held that, under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, after due service of the writ upon the owners of the tug, leave could be given to issue a concurrent writ and serve notice thereof out of the jurisdiction upon the owners of the French vessel, they being proper parties "to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction" within the meaning of the rule.

Motion.

This was an application to set aside an order giving leave to issue and serve notice of a writ under the following circumstances.

The plaintiffs were the Marychurch Steamship Co. (Limited), the owners of the British steamship Camrose. The defendants were La Compagnie Maritime Française, the owners of the French barque Duc d'Aumale. These were defendants under protest and the other defendants were the Elliot Steam Tug Co. (Limited), the owners of the British steam tug Challenge.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts were as follows: On the 22nd of June, 1902, the steamship Camrose collided with the Duc d'Aumale, which was at the time in tow of the British tug Challenge. The collision occurred in the English Channel, but outside British territorial waters. The Duc d'Aumale was taken to Dunkirk for repairs, and The Camrose proceeded to Antwerp.

On the 2nd of July the owners of The Duc d'Aumale instituted proceedings in the Tribunal de Commerce at Nantes against the owners of The Camrose.

On the 11th of July the owners of The Camrose issued a writ in personam against the owners of The Duc d'Aumale and the owners of the tug Challenge, claiming compensation against the defendants "as owners respectively of the steam tug Challenge and the barque or vessel Duc d'Aumale for damage occasioned by a collision which took place in the month of June, 1902, between the plaintiffs' steamship Camrose and the barque Duc d'Aumale whilst in tow, or having been in tow of the tug Challenge."

The writ was duly served on the owners of The Challenge, and on the 8th of August the plaintiffs obtained leave, ex parte, to issue a concurrent writ and serve notice of it at Nantes on the owners of The Duc d'Aumale under ord. 11, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, which is as follows: "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or judge whenever (g) any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction."

The plaintiffs made an affidavit that the owners of the French vessel were necessary and proper parties to the action brought against them and the owners of the British tug, inasmuch as the plaintiffs alleged that the collision was caused or contributed to by neglect or default in the navigation of The Duc d'Aumale and The Challenge.

The notice of the writ was served on the owners of The Duc d'Aumale in France within the twelve days' limit of time for appearance after service.

On the 20th of August judgment was given by the Nantes tribunal by default, holding the owners of The Camrose responsible for the damage occasioned by the collision, and The Camrose would have been arrested at Antwerp had not her owners given security, in the nature of bail without prejudice for 250,000 francs, and after ninety days it was alleged the proceedings in France by default would become final. On the 25th of August the owners of The Duc d'Aumale entered a conditional appearance, under protest, to the English writ, and on the 23rd of October applied in chambers (which application was adjourned into court and came on by way of motion) to set aside the order giving leave to issue the writ and serve notice of it.

Scrutton, K.C., for the defendants, contended that the action was not within the meaning of the rule "properly brought" against the owners of The Challenge as she herself had not been in collision, and that the purpose of commencing the action against her owners was to bring in the owners of The Duc d'Aumale, who were out of the jurisdiction, and who were sued in respect of a cause of action which arose out of the jurisdiction.

They cited Flower v. Rose, 7 Times L. R. 280; Witted v. Galbraith, 41 W. R. 395, [1893] 1 Q. B. 431, 577; and Williams v. Cartwright, 43 W. R. 145 [1895] 1 Q. B. 142.

Pickford, K.C., and Balloch, for the plaintiffs.—There is an actual bonâ fide cause of action alleged against the owners of The Challenge as well as against the owners of The Duc d'Aumale. If the owners of the tug and her tow had been within the jurisdiction they would both have been proper parties in a suit to recover for damage done to the plaintiffs' ship. The Elton, 39 W.
